bar because of the lack of similarity between the statutes of Wisconsin and the one in force in this state and the Michigan statute. Judge Cooley, who wrote the opinion in the Michigan case, noted this difference in the following very clear language: "The case of West v. State, 1 Wis. 217, which seems to hold otherwise, was decided upon the phraseology of the Wisconsin statute, which was thought to make the 'previous chaste character' of the person seduced an ingredient in the offense, to be made out by proofs. Our statute is very simple, and merely provides that 'if any man shall seduce and debauch any unmarried woman he shall be punished,' etc."

The statutes of Oklahoma and California are both similar to ours, and in both of those states the statute has been given the construction contended for by the appellant in this case. Harvey v. Territory, 11 Okla. 156, 65 Pac. 837; People v. O'Brien, 130 Cal. 1, 62 Pac. 297; People v. Wallace, 109 Cal. 611, 42 Pac. 159. And other cases to the same effect are: State v. Meister, 60 Or. 469, 120 Pac. 406; Knight v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 144 S. W. 967; Hay v. State, — Ind. —, 98 N. E. 712; State v. Lockerby, 50 Minn. 363, 36 Am. St. Rep. 656, 52 N. W. 958, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 617; Zabriskie v. State, 43 N. J. L. 640, 39 Am. Rep. 610; Oliver v. Com. 101 Pa. 215, 47 Am. Rep. 704; Com. v. Whittaker, 131 Mass. 224. Numerous decisions on this question will be found cited under § 2104, Wharton Crim. Law, 11th ed., and it is unnecessary to cite them all here. The great weight of authority, and certainly the better reason, seems to support the contention of the appellant. We believe the rule announced in West v. State, supra, to be grounded in reason and to be the sounder doctrine, and comes nearer to affording a fair trial to the defendant.

The clause "of previous chaste character" does not mean purity of mind, nor purity of heart, but merely purity of body; i. e., that the prosecutrix has never sustained illicit relations with anyone prior to the alleged offense of the defendant. The law makes her a competent witness on that point; and, if she is a woman of previous chaste character, it inflicts no hardship upon her to say so; and if she is not, the offense has not been committed, and the defendant, of course, is not guilty. While, under the rule followed in the Iowa cases it is altogether possible that the prosecutrix may have sustained illicit relations with one, or even two or more men, other than the defendant, and still, by reason of the invariable secrecy observed in the commission of this offense, the defendant might be wholly unable to prove a lack of chastity on her part.

The general rule is that where a criminal act consists of separate and distinct elements, as this does, the existence of all of the necessary elements must be alleged and proved, and this rule applies to prosecution for seduction. Wharton Crim. Ev. 9th ed. § 329.

It is true that the supreme court of Iowa, under a statute similar to ours, in State v. Bauerkemper, 95 Iowa, 562, 64 N. W. 609, approved an instruction to the jury that "chastity was the general rule, and the want of it the exception, and that the law presumes the woman to be chaste until the contrary is shown, and that, in the absence of evidence attacking the character of the prosecuting witness" whether or not "in that respect, the state is not called upon to offer evidence in support of her character for chastity." But the court adds this qualifying remark: "This statement of the law is not questioned, but it is argued," etc. The question involved in the case at bar was not before the court for decision in the Bauerkemper Case, and therefore the apparent rule above stated is not binding even upon that court. State v. McClintic, 73 Iowa, 663, 35 N. W. 696, is more nearly in point, though in that case the trial court instructed the jury that, "to warrant a conviction, the state must prove each and all of the allegations charged in the indictment beyond a reasonable doubt," but did not charge the jury that any presumption of chastity existed in favor of the prosecutrix. But in State v. Drake, 128 Iowa, 539, 105 N. W. 54, the court does announce the rule that "the burden was upon the appellant to overcome the legal presumption of her [meaning prosecutrix] prior chastity."

In this case, it is contended by the prosecution that there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding the prosecutrix was of previous chaste character, and that therefore the error committed by the court, if error it was, in instructing the jury that the prosecutrix was presumed to be of previous chaste character was without prejudice to the appellant. It is true there was evidence introduced at the trial tending to prove her previous chaste character, and, in connection with the other evidence, sufficient to warrant the jury, if they believed her, in finding her to be of previous chaste character; but that does not answer the question. Under the instruction as given by the court the jury would have been warranted in finding the prosecutrix to be of previous chaste character as a matter of fact, and still not have believed a word of her testimony on that point. In other words, the instruction dispensed with any evidence whatever on that subject. This we do not believe the court was warranted in doing. As well might the court hold in a prosecution, say for receiving stolen property, "knowing the same to have been stolen," that if the property was shown to have been stolen and thereafter found in the possession of the defendant, he would be presumed to have received it with guilty knowledge, although he may have purchased it for full value, and without any suspicion that it had been stolen. In the one case the gravamen of the offense is the guilty knowledge; in the other it is the debauching of a previously chaste woman. The presumption goes to the very substance of the offense in both cases, and proof of the fact can no more be dispensed with in the one case than in the other.

On the trial the state, for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of the prosecutrix relative to her illicit connection with the defendant, showed by the testimony of certain witnesses that, during the period of time within which these relations were claimed to have existed, the defendant was visiting the prosecutrix at her home, taking her out riding, to entertainments, being out with her alone at night, and otherwise "keeping company" with her. On her cross-examination she was asked by defendant's counsel if, during this same period of time, she had not received similar attentions from another young man in the neighborhood; if she had not been out alone with him, attended entertainments with him, and if she had not, on the 13th of August, 1911, asked him to take her to a dance on the next Saturday night, and had not also asked him to take her to another dance on the succeeding Saturday night. She was permitted to answer these questions, over the objection by the state that the testimony was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and not proper impeaching testimony. She answered the questions in the negative. To rebut this testimony defendant, on his own behalf, offered to prove by a certain witness that, during the period of time covered by the illicit relations of defendant and prosecutrix, she was on similar terms with another young man; that he also visited her at her father's house, took her to entertainments, was out with her alone, and that on the 13th day of August, 1911, she had asked this party to take her to a dance on the following Saturday evening, and that she had also asked him to take her to another dance on the succeeding Saturday night. To these questions the state interposed the objection that the testimony was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and that it was an attempt to impeach the testimony of the prosecutrix upon a collateral matter brought out on cross-examination. The objection was sustained, and the defendant contends that this was error on the part of the court.

We are inclined to take the view that the defendant is right in this contention. The undisputed evidence showed that, at the time of the trial, the prosecutrix was several months advanced in pregnancy. This, of course, removed all doubt as to her having had sexual intercourse with someone previous to that time. It was the theory of the state that it was the defendant with whom this intercourse had taken place. The prosecutrix testified to such fact, and it was for the purpose of corroborating her testimony and the theory of the state that the prosecution had proved that prosecutrix and defendant had shown a mutual fondness for each other, that they had been in each other's company to a considerable extent, and that the opportunity for sexual intercourse had existed. On the other hand, it was the theory of the defense that some person other than the defendant was responsible for the condition of the prosecutrix, and it was for the purpose of corroborating this theory that the defense offered to show a similar fondness existing between the prosecutrix and the other young man in question, and that an equal opportunity existed for sexual intercourse with him. This testimony was offered on the theory that it would tend to weaken the claim of the prosecutrix, that the defendant was under promise to marry, and that it was under this promise of marriage that the illicit intercourse was had. This testimony, if admitted, would have tended directly to rebut the testimony of the prosecutrix, and, if believed by the jury, would, to some extent at least, have impeached and discredited her. State v. Brown, 86 Iowa, 121, 53 N. W. 92; State v. Baldoser, 88 Iowa, 55, 55 N. W. 97; Stinehouse v. State, 47 Ind. 17.

In State v. Brown, supra, the Iowa court, in considering a similar question said: "The corroboration in this case was largely evidence that the defendant visited the prosecutrix at her home, accompanied her to church, and otherwise conducted himself as her suitor, but the effect of such evidence might well have been lessened, if not wholly destroyed, by showing that during the time the defendant was so visiting her she was accepting similar attentions from another, who had opportunities for sexual intercourse with her."

In Stinehouse v. State, supra, the defense undertook to show on cross-examination, by the witnesses who had testified to the relations existing between the defendant and prosecutrix, that at the same time she was receiving attentions from the defendant she was receiving similar attentions from others. The court held that the evidence should have been admitted, and in passing on the question used this language: "The facts stated by the witnesses in their direct examination were introduced to corroborate the testimony of the girl and as tending to show that a promise of marriage had been made by the appellant. The object of the cross-examination was to overthrow or weaken the effect of the evidence. For that purpose it was proper, and the court erred in refusing to allow it. We cannot tell how much weight it would have had with the jury, but we can see that it might have had some, and as we understand the evidence, after a pretty careful examination of it, very little would have satisfied the jury that the appellant was entitled to an acquittal."

It is true that some of the occurrences attempted to be shown by the defendant happened after the first act of sexual intercourse is alleged, by prosecutrix, to have taken place; but it must be remembered that the prosecutrix had testified that the acts of sexual intercourse between herself and the defendant took place on the 18th of June, the 29th of July, and the 12th and 23d days of August, 1911, and that the trial court charged the jury that the time of the commission of the offense was immaterial, so long as it was shown to have taken place within three years prior to the filing of the information. Under this instruction, the jury may have found, and properly so, that the seduction occurred on either one of the above dates. The prosecutrix also testified that, during all of this time and up until some time as late as the month of November, 1911, she was in love with the defendant, expected to marry him, and was regarding him as her future husband. It will be noted that one of the dates on which sexual intercourse was alleged to have taken place was August 12th. Defendant undertook to show that on the very next day, August 13th, the prosecutrix was soliciting the attentions of another young man. If it be a fact that she did solicit such attentions from the other party, was not evidence of such conduct material as tending to disprove the marriage engagement with the defendant, and as tending to weaken the effect of the corroborative evidence from which the promise of marriage was to be inferred? Would not such evidence also tend to impeach her credibility? We believe that it would, and that in the exclusion of such testimony the trial court committed prejudicial error.

It is true, that in the case of People v. Tibbs, 143 Cal. 100, 76 Pac. 904, cited and relied upon by respondent, the rule was announced by the court that "whether the prosecutrix had any other young man come to see her subsequent to the alleged seduction . . . was entirely immaterial," but in that case it does not appear that there ever was but a single act of sexual intercourse between defendant and the respondent, nor does it appear that they ever had anything to do with, or even saw, each other after that occurrence; so that the above rule is not applicable to the facts in this case. In the other case cited by respondent (State v. Abegglen, 103 Iowa, 50, 72 N. W. 305), there was only one act of intercourse proven, and the evidence showed that, immediately thereafter, the defendant abandoned the prosecutrix and paid her no further attention. In that case it was also held, and properly so, that evidence of subsequent relations with other men was immaterial.

Another of appellant's assignments questions the correctness of the following instruction given to the jury by the court: "That . . . [she] was an unmarried female of previous chastity, and that there was an act of sexual intercourse under a promise of marriage, are facts which may be found from her evidence alone." If you believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, that to which she has testified on these subjects, but you cannot find that he is the guilty party unless, as stated, there is evidence other than that of [prosecutrix] tending to prove that fact. The language of this instruction is taken verbatim from the opinion of this court in State v. King, 9 S. D. 628, 70 N. W. 1046. It is conceded that it has stood unchallenged as the law of this state upon this subject for more than fifteen years; but, notwithstanding this fact, the defendant contends that the court erred in giving the instruction in this case, and that he was prejudiced thereby. Whether or not the instruction is wrong depends upon the explanation and qualification of the same as given by the court to the jury therewith. In the King Case, supra, the instruction applied to the evidence in that case, and, in connection with the other instructions in the case, there is no question of its correctness. In this case the only instruction given to the jury in explanation of the matter complained of is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that these young people . . . (prosecutrix and defendant) kept company with each other, and acted as lovers usually do, and other like circumstances, if you find any disclosed by the evidence, are sufficient to constitute corroborating evidence to connect the defendant with the offense within the meaning of this law." [— S. D. —, 138 N. W. 956.] This, in our opinion, does not sufficiently explain to the jury what acts and conduct of the parties are to be considered as corroborative of the testimony of the prosecutrix, and left it almost wholly for the jury to decide for themselves what acts and circumstances of the parties would constitute corroborating evidence under this statute.

It is true, as stated in the instruction complained of, that the four elements of which this offense is composed may be shown to exist by the testimony of the prosecutrix alone. The statute does not require corroboration of those facts in themselves. All that is required to be corroborated is the testimony of the prosecutrix showing the connection of the defendant with the commission of the offense. The only elements of the offense with which he has, or can have, any connection are the promise of marriage and the illicit intercourse. With the other two elements of the offense, to wit, that the prosecutrix is unmarried and of previous chaste character, the defendant has nothing whatever to do. They relate wholly to the condition of the prosecutrix, or, in other words, are mere necessary qualifications that she must possess in order that the offense can be committed at all.

The question then is, What facts or circumstances are to be considered as corroborating evidence? Owing to the secrecy of the offense, it is very rarely that direct testimony, other than that of the prosecutrix, can be had. Where the defendant has made admissions or written letters of an incriminating character, they are corroborative in their nature, and are usually sufficient. But where this class of evidence is not available, the prosecution has been allowed to supply their place by showing the conduct and circumstances of the parties to the transaction. This question has presented considerable difficulty, but the rule now seems to be fairly well established that evidence showing that the prosecutrix and defendant, at about the time of the alleged offense, associated themselves together and conducted themselves as accepted lovers ordinarily do, is corroborative evidence connecting the defendant with the commission of the offense. This rule, however, is unsatisfactory, and subject to the criticism that it implies that the mere fact of two young persons of opposite sex, conducting themselves as accepted lovers would properly conduct themselves, is, in itself, evidence that they have indulged in illicit intercourse. This, of course, would not be correct, and no such inference can be drawn from such conduct, and no court would intentionally lay down any such rule. Such conduct, however, would corroborate the prosecutrix in her testimony that a promise of marriage existed between herself and the defendant; and, this fact and the illicit intercourse being conceded, it might be reasoned that the prosecutrix would be more likely to have indulged in sexual intercourse with the man she was expecting to marry than with anyone else. To this extent and in this indirect manner, the conduct of accepted lovers might tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; but the relationship shown between them would have to be something more than that of mere friendship, and the evidence would have to show that the conduct of each toward the other was different from the conduct of either toward any other party. This, of course, would require the court to admit evidence showing the relationship existing between both the prosecutrix and defendant with other persons during the time the marriage engagement is claimed to have been in existence; and this, as we have already seen, is the proper rule to be followed. These are all facts and circumstances that should be taken into consideration by the jury in considering the probative force of the corroborating evidence. The instruction complained of, while it correctly stated the law, so far as it went, should have proceeded and explained to the jury the particular elements of the offense in regard to which the testimony of the prosecutrix must be corroborated, and should have explained to the jury what facts and circumstances were to be considered as corroborative; and, for its failure to do this, prejudicial error was committed.

The only other assignment that will be considered relates to that portion of the instruction last above quoted, wherein the court told the jury that if the defendant and the prosecutrix had "acted as lovers usually do, and other like circumstances, if you find any disclosed by the evidence, are sufficient to constitute corroborating evidence to connect the defendant with the offense within the meaning of this law." The appellant contends that the meaning conveyed to the jury by this instruction was that there had been sufficient facts and circumstances shown to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. While we believe the court had reference to the character, rather than to the quantity or extent, of the corroborating evidence, we believe that, by the use of the word "sufficient," the jury might have been, and in view of the very meager corroboration that was shown probably were, misled. If the court had used the word "competent" in the place of "sufficient," then the sufficiency of the corroboration would have been properly left to the jury. Webster's New International Dictionary defines "sufficient" as "equal to the end proposed; adequate to wants; enough." It relates to quantity rather than quality, and, as this is the general understanding of the word, it is probable that the jury understood the court to say that the corroborating evidence was sufficient in quantity to corroborate the testimony of the prosecutrix in connecting the defendant with the commission of the offense.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Smith, J., dissenting:

I do not concur in the rule of law announced in this case. In State v. King, 9 S. D. 628, 70 N. W. 1046, this court, I think, correctly stated the law, when it said: "That" she "was an unmarried female of previous chastity, and that there was an act of sexual intercourse under a promise of marriage, are facts which may be found from her evidence alone;" if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that to which she has testified on this subject. But you cannot find that he "is the guilty person, unless," as stated, "there is evidence other than that of the prosecutrix tending to prove that fact." This instruction given in the King Case, and adopted by the trial court in this case, places the finding of the jury, as to the two facts specified in the instruction, squarely and wholly upon the truthfulness of the testimony of the prosecutrix herself. For this reason I do not believe that the statement in the opinion that the charge of the court dispenses with proof on the part of the prosecution can be maintained. Nor do I believe that the jury could have been misled when the court in its charge also said: "The law presumes a woman to be of chaste character unless the contrary is shown," when taken in connection with the further charge given by the trial court, which said: "But if there is a reasonable doubt, as I shall hereafter define it, of her chastity, under all of the evidence, he will be entitled to the benefit of that doubt." This language of the court again requires the question of chastity of the prosecutrix to be determined "under all of the evidence" beyond a reasonable doubt, and in effect instructs the jury that the guilt or innocence of the accused cannot rest upon any presumption of chastity, but that chastity must be shown by the evidence. The prosecutrix testified to her own previous chastity, and to a first act of intercourse under promise of marriage, which she alleged occurred on the 18th day of June. Either she was seduced on that day, or was not seduced at all. Under the law, no subsequent act of intercourse could amount to seduction. It is true that the pregnancy shown at the trial could have resulted from any of the various acts of intercourse at later dates, testified to by her, but seduction could occur but once, and that must have been at the time of the first act of intercourse. Hence the statement in the opinion that the seduction could have occurred on July 29th, August 12th, or August 23d cannot be correct. Because of this obvious distinction, much of the reasoning of the opinion as to the improper exclusion of evidence has no application in the case. I am inclined to the view that the extreme refinement of logic and reasoning found in the opinion furnishes convenient avenue of escape through one or the other of the doors designated as "elements of the offense," and practically wipes the crime of seduction under promise of marriage from the statute book. The opinion seeks to distinguish this case from State v. King, supra, by suggesting that there are "explanations and qualifications" which should have been given by the court to the jury in this case, not necessary in the King Case. This suggestion, it must be remembered, applies only to that part of the court's instructions which relate to the "presumption of chastity." The only "qualifications or explanations" which could have been made by the trial court on that subject in this case are those to which I have referred above, and in what manner appellant could have been prejudiced is not apparent. The whole instructions in this case were framed squarely upon the law as stated in the King Case, and, in my judgment, the rule there announced should be adhered to.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

OMAHA & COUNCIL BLUFFS STREET RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Appts.,

Statutes — construction — legislative debates.

1. The meaning of the interstate commerce act of February 4, 1887 (24 Stat. at

Note.—Applicability of commerce clause or statutes thereunder to street railways or to interurban roads.

That the transportation of passengers or freight across a state line is interstate commerce within the meaning of the commerce clause, although such traffic is of a local

3. An order of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to street railways, made prior to the act of June 18, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 552, chap. 309), amendatory of the act of February 4, 1887, and therefore without lawful authority, cannot be made effective by the courts as of the date of the amendatory act, where there is nothing to show that Congress thereby attempted an express ratification of the Commission's action with respect to street railways, and it is doubtful whether the amendment was intended to confer a jurisdiction not previously given.

APPEAL by petitioners from a judgment of the United States Commerce Court, which, reversing a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Nebraska, dismissed a bill filed to enjoin the enforcement of an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission reducing street railway rates. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Lee Webster and Frederic D. McKenney, for appellants:

The word "railroad," as used in the Constitutions and statutes of the various states, does not include street railway companies, and street railway corporations are not governed by laws relating to railroads. This distinction between the two kinds of railroads was well known at the time of the passage of the act to regulate commerce.

Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S. 204, 38 L. ed. 962, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 649, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1087, which holds that traffic across a bridge connecting two states is interstate commerce.

It does not necessarily follow, however, that every statute enacted in the exercise of the power of Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce is applicable to local traffic across a state line, as is demonstrated by OMAHA & C. B. STREET R. Co. v. INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has heretofore held that it had jurisdiction under the interstate commerce act to investigate a charge of unlawful discrimination by a trolley road between the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and Chevy Chase lake, in Maryland (Willson v. Rock Creek R. Co. 7 Inters. Com. Rep. 83); to establish through routes and joint rates between an interurban electric road and a steam road (Chicago & M. Electric R. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 13 Inters. Com. Rep. 20); to prescribe a fare to be charged by an electric railway engaged in the carriage of passengers and property between Washington, District of Columbia, and Mount Vernon, in Virginia (Beall v. Washington, A. & Mt. V. R. Co. 20 Inters. Com. Rep. 406); and to establish connections and joint rates for the interchange of interstate traffic, upon the complaint of an electric road extending from Norwood, a suburb of Cincinnati, Ohio, to Hillsboro, Ohio (Cincinnati & C. Trac-tion Co. v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 20 Inters. Com. Rep. 486).

In Willson v. Rock Creek R. Co. supra, Knapp, C., said referring to street surface roads for interurban and suburban passenger travel: "It may be conceded that this class of railroads was not specifically within the contemplation of the framers of that law, for the evils which it was intended to remedy would, in the nature of the case, but rarely arise in the management of such roads and their dealings with the public. But the terms of the statute in this regard are broad and general, and it contains no exception indicating a design to exclude from its operation those interstate roads which are constructed upon public highways, to provide the means for local passenger transportation in the streets of towns and cities and their various suburbs. We see no reason to doubt that the authority of this enactment may be invoked for the regulation of carriers like the defendant, if their business is actually interstate, whenever occasion arises for subjecting them to its restraints and requirements."

So, also, in Chicago & M. Electric R. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. supra, Harlan, C., said: "The act makes no distinction between railroads that are operated by electricity and those that use steam; nor has the Commission thought at any time to make such distinction. Both are subject to the act when engaged in interstate transportation."

It would seem, though the point has not been directly adjudicated, that the Federal employers' liability acts are applicable to trolley roads. In Employers' Liability Cases (Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co.) 207 U. S. 463 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141, Mr. Justice White, in delivering the opinion of the court, said (referring to the act of June 11, 1906): "From the 1st section it is certain that the act extends to every individual or corporation who may engage in interstate commerce as a common carrier. Its all-embracing words leave no room for any other conclusion. It may include, for example, steam railroads, telegraph lines, telephone lines, and express business, vessels of every kind, whether steam or sail, ferries, bridges, wagon lines, carriages, trolley lines, etc." And see South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Finan, 153 Ky. 340, 155 S. W. 742, where the Federal employers' liability act of April 22, 1908, was held to govern a case where a motorman on a street car had been killed while making a trip from Newport, Kentucky, across the Ohio river to Cincinnati.

In deciding whether the act to regulate commerce applies to street railways, it is proper to consider the inconveniences that would result to the public by compelling interchange of freight and cars and passengers between commercial railroads and street railway companies, as well as the fact that there exists no necessity nor public demand for the regulation of street railway companies by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

The Omaha & Council Bluffs Railway & Bridge Company was chartered as a street railroad company under the laws of Iowa. It owned street car lines in Council Bluffs, and, in 1887, was authorized by Congress to construct a bridge across the Missouri river, and to operate thereon "steam, cable, and street cars." 24 Stat. at L. 501, chap. 356. The Omaha & Council Bluffs Railway, chartered as a street railroad under the laws of Nebraska, owned the street car lines in Omaha and its suburbs, South Omaha, Benson, Dundee, and Florence. This street railroad had no right of eminent domain, and was not authorized to haul freight, being limited by its charter to carrying passengers only. By lease it acquired the bridge and car lines in Council Bluffs, which thereafter it operated as part of its system. Complaint having been made that certain interstate fares were unreasonable, a hearing was had before the Commerce Commission, which, on November 27, 1909 (17 Inters. Com. Rep. 239), ordered a reduction in the rate between Council Bluffs, Iowa, and points beyond the Loop, in Omaha, Nebraska. The two companies lessor and lessee, thereupon filed a bill in the United States circuit court for the district of Nebraska to enjoin the order. The case was heard before three circuit judges, who (179 Fed. 243) granted a temporary injunction.

The case was transferred to the commerce court, which, on October 5, 1911 (191 Fed. 40), dismissed the bill.

On the argument of the appeal in this court, the sole question discussed was whether the provisions of the commerce act as to the railroads applied to street railroads, the appellant relying, among other things, on the fact that during the discussion in the senate, the author of the bill and chairman of the senate committee to which it had been referred, said (17 Cong. Rec. pt. IV., p. 3472) that "the bill is not intended to affect the stage coach, the street railway, the telegraph lines, the canal boat, or the vessel employed in the inland or coasting trade, even though they may be engaged in interstate commerce, because it is not deemed necessary or practicable to cover such a multitude of subjects." After quoting § 1† and this statement, and construing it in the light of the broad scope of the act, the commerce court held that the meaning of the statute could not be determined from statements used in debate. We concur in that view. The act must be interpreted by its own terms, and we must look to it as a whole, in order to determine †Sec. 1. That the provisions of this act shall apply to any corporation or any person or persons engaged in the transportation of oil or other commodity except water, and except natural or artificial gas, by means of pipe lines, or partly by pipe lines and partly by railroad, or partly by pipe lines and partly by water, who shall be considered and held to be common carriers within the meaning and purpose of this act, and to any common carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property wholly by railroad (or partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used under a common control, management, or arrangement for a continuous carriage or shipment) from one state or territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other state or territory . . . or from one place in a territory to another place in the same territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States, and also to the transportation in like manner of property shipped from any place in the United States to a foreign country, and carried from such place to a port of transshipment, or shipped from a foreign country to any place in the United States, and carried to such place from a port of entry either in the United States or an adjacent foreign country: Provided, however, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to the transportation of passengers or property, or to the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of the property wholly within one state, and not shipped to or from a foreign country from or to any state or territory as aforesaid.

The term "common carrier," as used in this act, shall include express companies and sleeping car companies. The term "railroad," as used in this act shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under a contract, agreement, or lease, and shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property designated herein, and also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary in the transportation or delivery of any of said property. 24 Stat. at L. 379, chap. 104, [as amended, 34 Stat. at L. 584, chap. 3591], U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1284.

The statute in terms applies to carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers of property by railroad.

But, in 1887, that word had no fixed and accurate meaning, for there was then, as now, a conflict in the decisions of the state courts as to whether street railroads were embraced within the provisions of a statute giving rights or imposing burdens on railroads. The appellants cite decisions from twelve states holding that in a statute the word "railroad" does not mean "street railroad." The defense cite decisions to the contrary from an equal number of states. The present record discloses a similar disagreement in Federal tribunals. For not only did the commerce court and the circuit court differ, but it appears that the members of the Commission were divided on the subject when this case was decided and also when the question was first raised in Willson v. Rock Creek R. Co. 7 Inters. Com. Rep. 83.

This conflict is not so great as at first blush would appear. For all recognize that while there is similarity between railroads and street railroads, there is also a difference. Some courts, emphasizing the similarity, hold that in statutes the word railroad includes street railroad, unless the contrary is required by the context. Others, emphasizing the dissimilarity, hold that railroad does not include street railroad unless required by the context, since, as tersely put by the court of appeals of Kentucky, "a street railroad, in a technical and popular sense, is as different from an ordinary railroad as a street is from a road." Louisville & P. R. Co. v. Louisville City R. Co. 2 Duv. 175.

But all the decisions hold that the meaning of the word is to be determined by construing the statute as a whole. If the scope of the act is such as to show that both classes of companies were within the legislative contemplation, then the word "railroad" will include street railroad. On the other hand, if the act was aimed at railroads proper, then street railroads are excluded from the provisions of the statute. Applying this universally accepted rule of construing this word, it is to be noted that ordinary railroads are constructed on the companies' own property. The tracks extend from town to town, and are usually connected with other railroads, which themselves are further connected with others, so that freight may be shipped, without breaking bulk, across the continent. Such railroads are channels of interstate commerce. Street railroads, on the other hand, are local, are laid in streets as aids to street traffic, and for the use of a single community, even though that community be divided by state lines, or under different municipal control. When these street railroads carry passengers across a state line they are, of course, engaged in interstate commerce, but not the commerce which Congress had in mind when legislating in 1887. Street railroads transport passengers from street to street, from ward to ward, from city to suburbs, but the commerce to which Congress referred was that carried on by railroads engaged in hauling passengers or freight "between states," "between states and territories," "between the United States and foreign countries." The act referred to railroads which were required to post their schedules—not at street corners where passengers board street cars, but in "every depot, station, or office where passengers or freight are received for transportation." The railroads referred to in the act were not those having separate, distinct, and local street lines, but those of whom it was required that they should make joint rates and reasonable facilities for interchange of traffic with connecting lines, so that freight might be easily and expeditiously moved in interstate commerce.

Every provision of the statute is applicable to railroads. Only a few of its requirements are applicable to street railroads, which did not do the business Congress had in contemplation, and had not engaged in the pooling, rebating, and discrimination which the statute was intended to prohibit. This was recognized in Willson v. Rock Creek R. Co. 7 Inters. Com. Rep. 83, where, although it was held that the statute applied to a street railroad between Washington, District of Columbia, and a point in Maryland, the Commission nevertheless said (7 Inters. Com. Rep. 83): "It may be conceded that this class of railroads was not specifically within the contemplation of the framers of that law, for the evils which it was intended to remedy would, in the nature of the case, but rarely arise in the management of such roads and their dealings with the public."

Street railroads not being guilty of the mischief sought to be corrected, the remedial provisions of the statute not being applicable to them, commands upon every railroad "subject to the act" being such that they could not be obeyed by street railroads because of the nature of their business and character and location of their tracks, it is evident that the case is within that large line of authorities which hold that under such a statute the word "railroad" cannot be construed to include street railroad.

But it is said that since 1887, when the act was passed, a new type of interurban railroad has been developed which, with electricity as a motive power, uses larger cars, and runs through the country from town to town, enabling the carrier to haul passengers, freight, express, and the mail for long distances at high speed. We are not dealing with such a case, but with a company chartered as a street railroad, doing a street railroad business and hauling no freight. The case was heard on demurrer, with the opinion of the Commission treated as a part of the record. It indicates that at some points the line is on private property, but where this is and to how great an extent does not appear. Indeed, the record does not show that electricity was used as a motive power, though, in the light of modern methods, that may possibly be assumed. But it affirmatively appears that the company was chartered as a street railroad, and hauls no freight, and is doing only a business appropriate to a street railroad. So that whatever the motive power, or the size or speed of the cars, is immaterial. In any event, there were "street cars" referred to in the act of Congress authorizing the construction of the bridge from Council Bluffs to Omaha (24 Stat. at L. 501, chap. 356). The company used such cars and did a street passenger business only. It laid its tracks in crowded thoroughfares of those cities and their suburbs, and it is manifest that Congress did not intend that these tracks should be connected with railroads for hauling freight cars and long trains through and along the streets of Omaha and Council Bluffs.

It is contended, however, that the amendment of June 18, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. 522, chap. 309), shows that Congress considered that street railroads were under the jurisdiction of the Commission, inasmuch as it then provided that "the Commission shall not, however, establish any through route, classification, or rate between street electric passenger railways not engaged in . . . transporting freight . . . and railroads of a different character." It is contended, on the other hand, that in that statute Congress distinctly recognized that a street electric road was "a different character of railroad," and apprehending that the broad language of the amendment of 1910 might be construed to take in street railroads, this provision was inserted out of abundant caution to prevent that result, as in the case of establishing routes wholly by water, which certainly were not within the terms of the original act.

made by the Commission, November 27, 1909, is not before us for construction, and, manifestly, cannot be given a retrospective operation, though the government insists that it should be given a prospective operation, and in its brief contends that "even if the Commission's order was without lawful authority at the time it was made (November 27, 1909), the amendment of 1910 either ratified it altogether, or, at least, validated it for the future," and, therefore, it was contended "that the judgment should be affirmed; or, if not affirmed as rendered, should be modified to set aside the order only in its operation prior to June 18, 1910," on which day the amendment as to electric street passenger cars became effective. *Mattingly v. The first two decisions relate to transactions of a nature entirely different from that here involved; and, in the Baltimore Case, which was more like this on its facts, the parties, pending the suit, stipulated that the order should apply only to the future; and it was said that the "question of the authority of the Commission at the time the order was made has become a moot one" (621). There was no such stipulation here, and there being nothing to show that Congress attempted an express ratification, and it being open whether the amendment was intended to confer a jurisdiction not previously given, the motion of the government to make the order of November 27, 1909, effective from June 18, 1910, cannot prevail.

The decree of the Commerce Court is reversed, and that of the three Circuit Judges made permanent.

Mr. Justice Pitney did not hear the argument and took no part in the decision of this case.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

JAMES P. McGOVERN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
CITY OF NEW YORK.

Constitutional law — due process of law — award in eminent domain proceedings.

An award to the owner of one of many parcels of land taken by eminent domain for a site for a reservoir for a municipal water supply cannot be said to deny due process of law, where made without prejudice, in due form, and after full hearing, because the commissioners and courts refuse to take into consideration the value of the land as part of a natural reservoir site.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of New York to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, which in turn affirmed a final order of a Special Term for Ulster County, confirmed a report of commissioners of appraisal in eminent domain proceedings. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edward A. Alexander, George Gordon Battle, J. J. Darlington, and Jerome H. Buck, for plaintiff in error:

The commissioners of appraisal, and the courts of the state of New York, confiscated the claimant's property in entirety excluding from consideration, as an element of value, its adaptability for use as part of a reservoir site.

Note. — Special value of property for the purpose of which it is taken, as an element of compensation in condemnation proceedings.

This note is supplemental to a note in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996.

As pointed out in the note referred to, by the weight of authority, the value of property taken by eminent domain proceedings for the special purpose for which it is taken is not the basis on which the owner is entitled to be compensated. Its availability for that purpose, however, is an element to be considered in arriving at its market value, the market value being the true measure of compensation.

This doctrine is sustained by the majority of the later cases on the question. Thus, it has been held that the fact that a railroad company desires property for a railroad right of way does not preclude the owner's recovery of compensation measured by its adaptability for that use, if such adaptability added to its market value generally, although the value of the tract to the plaintiff by reason of its location, considered with reference to the plaintiff's connecting tracks, its established business, and its urgent need, should not be considered by the jury, nor shown by the evidence. Oregon R. Nav. Co. v. Taffe, — Or. —, 134 Pac. 1024, citing note in 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996.

And this is the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States. See United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co. 229 U. S. 53, 57 L. ed. 1063, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 667, holding that, although it is not proper to estimate land condemned for public purposes by the public necessities, or its worth to the public for such purpose, it is proper to consider the fact that the property is so situated that it will probably be desirable and available for such purpose. Thus, in condemning land for a canal and lock, its value for this purpose generally is properly to be included as an element to establish the market value of the property.

being that the refusal of the state court to include such special value as an element to establish the market value of the property did not, under the evidence as presented, constitute taking property without due process of law. In this case the decision of the New York court, that the measure of compensation is the fair value of the land taken, not its value to the owner or to the person or corporation seeking to acquire it, but the market value of the property, which means the fair value as between one who wants to purchase and one who wants to sell, and that the owner is not entitled to be paid more, merely because the land is peculiarly adapted to the use to which it is intended to be applied, does not in fact establish a measure of compensation contrary to that obtaining in a majority of the states, since it also conceded that the landowner is not limited in compensation to the condition which the property is in at the time, or to the use which he makes of it, but he is entitled to receive its market value for any purpose for which it is adapted to its owner. And where it is shown that it has a market value for some particular use, the availability and adaptability of the property to that use can be taken into account in determining its fair market value. Re Simmons, 130 App. Div. 350, 114 N. Y. Supp. 571, affirmed in 195 N. Y. 573, 88 N. E. 1132, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in McGOVERN v. NEW YORK.

That the New York court did not intend in the Simmons Case to assert a general rule of compensation so narrow as not to include, as an element establishing the market value of the property in general, its special value for the use to which it was intended to appropriate it, is borne out by the later decisions of that court on the question. Thus, in Re New York, W. & B. R. Co. 151 App. Div. 50, 135 N. Y. Supp. 234, it is said that compensation is measured by the present market value of the property, and does not include anything for the benefit to the party taking the property as distinguished from the injury to the owner. In determining such market value, however, any special intrinsic quality of the property taken, rendering it peculiarly adaptable for the purpose for which it is taken, must be taken into consideration.

And in Re Simmons, 158 App. Div. 206, 143 N. Y. Supp. 141, it is held that where a sand bank is located upon property which the city is seeking to condemn to be used for a reservoir, the fact that large quantities of sand would be required in constructing the dam which it would be necessary for the city to construct gives this sand bank some value. This added value should be considered in fixing the market value of the property. It is said that "it is clear that if the sand bank had been located immediately outside of the reservoir, the location of the reservoir would have added materially to the value of that bank, if there was not a surplus of sand in the locality. A purchaser desiring such property would necessarily have to pay a value enhanced by the fact that there was soon to be a market for sand in the locality, and that it was the only available supply. The same rule would apply where the sand is located upon property to be condemned."

It is also pointed out in Re Bensel, 206 Fed. 369, that the court is not convinced that, had the same testimony been presented in the Simmons Case as was presented in the case before the court, the same result would not have been reached in the Simmons Case. And reference is made to the fact that it is pointed out by the appellate division in disposing of the latter case, that the owner did not prove or attempt to prove that the value of the property in question, or any of the property included in the reservoir site, had been increased by its adaptability or availability for reservoir purposes before the commencement of the proceeding.

In Re Bensel, supra, an action subsequently presented to the Federal court, involving the measure of compensation for land which was to be used for the same purpose as that involved in the preceding case, and which was also favorably situated for that purpose, the court said that to value the land alone, according to the tons

In ascertaining the value of property taken for a public use, all the capabilities of the property and the uses to which it may be applied, or for which it is adapted, are to be considered, and not merely the condition which it is in at the time and the use to which it is then applied by the owner.

The saving accruing to the condemning party by taking the particular land in question in preference to other land of a of hay or the bushels of potatoes produced, ignores other elements of value, namely that possession thereof was necessary in order that water might be furnished the increasing millions along the banks of the Hudson. In this case it is of interest to note that, prior to the commencement of condemnation proceedings, a resident owner of the land transferred it to a nonresident. This transfer was attacked by the plaintiff on the ground that it was for the purpose of removing the case from the state to the Federal court in order that the owner might secure the benefit of the more liberal rule of damages applied by the Federal court. It is, however, held that, in the absence of fraud or collusion, the transfer could not be questioned, where it was made prior to the commencement of the condemnation proceedings.

In Grays Harbor Boom Co. v. Lownsdale, 54 Wash. 83, 102 Pac. 1041, an instruction to the jury was sustained to the effect that "in estimating the value or damage you must not take into consideration the special value to the company by reason of its necessity, but the market value. Nor should you take into consideration the value of defendant's property as a boom site." And this instruction was sustained although the land was being condemned to be used as a boom site. The owner of the land, however, which abutted on a river and slough, had no proprietary rights in any boom site furnished by the channels of these waters, and hence was held not entitled to have the value of such boom site considered in estimating the value of his land. That the court did not intend, by its decision, to hold that the owner of land which was available for the purpose for which it was sought to be condemned was not entitled to have its value for that purpose considered as an element to establish the market value, is made clear by a later decision wherein an instruction to the jury was sustained to the effect that the jury, in making up their verdict, should take into consideration the value of the land as a boom site, although it was being condemned to be used for that purpose. Columbia & similar character, which saving would accrue to any person using the land for the same purposes, must be taken into consideration as competent evidence of the market value of the property.

C. R. Boom & Rafting Co. v. Hutchinson, 56 Wash. 323, 105 Pac. 636. In its opinion in the latter case, the court refers to Grays Harbor Boom Co. v. Lownsdale, and points out that the two cases are not in conflict. It is said that "the distinction between the cases lies in the fact that in the present case the respondents are the owners of the shore as well as the uplands, and the appurtenant littoral and riparian rights that attach to ownership of shore lands in this state; and, furthermore, for the successful operation of the boom it is necessary to use a part of the uplands. It was not so in the case referred to. There the boom company itself owned the shore lands with the accompanying littoral and riparian rights, and it was not sought to appropriate any part of the uplands further than for a right of way for the passage of its employees, and possible consequent erosion caused by the use of the shore lands in front of the uplands as a booming place for logs. In other words, the use of the claimant's property in that case was not absolutely essential to the successful operation of the boom, but was rather a convenience than a necessity, while in the case at bar the boom cannot be operated at all without making use of the respondents' property."

In Burger v. State Female Normal School, — Va. —, 77 S. E. 489, it is said that, in fixing the market value of land in eminent domain proceedings, it is proper to consider the use of the land for all purposes, including the use for which it is sought by the plaintiff.

And this is also in effect the holding of the court in Sacramento Southern R. Co. v. Heilbron, 156 Cal. 408, 104 Pac. 979, wherein this measure of compensation was applied, although apparently not questioned.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding for the taking of land to be used for a reservoir to secure an additional supply of water for the city of New York. Commissioners were appointed, as provided by the Constitution of the state, to ascertain the compensation to be paid. Land belonging to the plaintiff in error, McGovern, was among the many parcels taken, and the question brought here arises on the refusal of the commissioners to admit certain evidence as to the exceptional value of the land for a reservoir site, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the exclusion of which, it was alleged, had the effect of depriving McGovern of his property without due process of law, contrary to the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The offer of proof as first made embraced many facts and covers six octavo pages of the record. This was rejected, the commissioners, as we understand their ruling, considering it only as a unit, and as containing inadmissible elements, which probably it did. The offer then was made "to prove the fair and reasonable market value of this piece of property, taking into consideration that element of value which gives it an enhanced value because it is part of a natural reservoir site;" also "to prove the fair and reasonable value of the Ashokan reservoir site which the city of New York is now condemning," and that the Ashokan reservoir site (as a whole) was the best and most available site for the purpose of obtaining an additional water supply. These offers were enough to raise the question discussed, although the last one was only a reiteration of what was alleged in the original petition for the taking of the land, and stood admitted on the record. The action of the commissioners was affirmed by the courts of New York. 130 App. Div. 350, 356, 114 N. Y. Supp. 571, 575, 195 N. Y. 573, 88 N. E. 1132.

The statute requires the commissioners to determine "the just and equitable compensation which ought to be made." If there has been any wrong done it is due not to the statute, but to the courts having made a mistake as to evidence, or at most as to the measure of damages. But of course not every judgment by which a man gets less than he ought, and that sense is deprived of his property, can come to this court. The result of a judgment in trover, at least, if satisfied (Lovejoy v. Murray, 3 Wall. 1, 18 L. ed. 129; Miller v. Hyde, 161 Mass. 472, 25 L.R.A. 42, 42 Am. St. Rep. 424, 37 N. E. 760), is to pass property as effectually as condemnation proceedings; yet no one would contend that a plaintiff could come here under the Constitution simply because of an honest mistake to his disadvantage in laying down the rule of damages for conversion. If the plaintiff could bring such a case to this court, one might ask why not the defendant for a mistake in the opposite direction that will deprive him of money that he is entitled to keep?

When property is taken by eminent domain, it equally is recognized that there must be something more than an ordinary honest mistake of law in the proceedings for compensation before a party can make out that the state has deprived him of his property unconstitutionally. A. Backus Jr. & Sons v. Fort Street Union Depot Co. 169 U. S. 557, 575, 576, 42 L. ed. 853, 861, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 445. As it is put in the case most frequently cited in favor of the right to a writ of error, "we are permitted only to require whether the trial court prescribed any rule for the guidance of the jury that was in absolute disregard of the company's right to just compensation." And again, the final judgment of a state court "ought not to be held in violation of the due process of law enjoined by the 14th Amendment unless by the rulings upon questions of law the company was prevented from obtaining substantially any compensation." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 246, 247, 41 L. ed. 979, 988, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581; Appleby v. Buffalo, 221 U. S. 524, 531, 532, 55 L. ed. 838, 841, 842, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 699.

The present case, of course, does not show disregard of McGovern's rights, or that he was prevented from obtaining substantially any compensation. Even if the plaintiff in error is right, it shows only that the commissioners and courts of New York adopted too narrow a view upon a doubtful point in the measure of damages. It hardly even is so strong as that; for the ruling of the commissioners is not to be taken as an abstract universal proposition, but the judgment concerning this particular case, found by men presumably, as the plaintiff in error says, men of experience, who had or were free to acquire outside information concerning the general conditions of the taking and the selected site. The plaintiff in error quotes authority that, probably for this reason, the New York courts will not set aside an award of such commissioners unless so palpably wrong as to shock the sense of justice. It is conceded 'that the owner is not permitted to take advantage of the necessities of the condemning party,' and it would seem that it well might be that the commissioners regarded it as too plain to be shaken by evidence, on the public facts, that the value of the land for a reservoir site could not come into consideration except upon the hypothesis that the city of New York could not get along without it, and that its only means of acquisition was voluntary sale by owners aware of the necessity, and intending to make from it the most they could. It is just this advantage that a taking by eminent domain excludes.

no element of the arbitrary, even if they should be thought to be wrong. The enhanced value of the land as part of the Ashokan reservoir depends on the whole land necessary being devoted to that use. There are said to have been hundreds of titles to different parcels of that land. If the parcels were not brought together by a taking under eminent domain, the chance of their being united by agreement or purchase in such a way as to be available well might be regarded as too remote and speculative to have any legitimate effect upon the valuation. See Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 249, 41 L. ed. 979, 989, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581. The plaintiff in error was entitled to be paid only for what was taken from him as the titles stood, and could not add to the value by the hypothetical possibility of a change unless that possibility was considerable enough to be a practical consideration and actually to influence prices. Boston Chamber of Commerce v. Boston, 217 U. S. 189, 195, 54 L. ed. 725, 727, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 459. In estimating that probability, the power of effecting the change by eminent domain must be left out. The principle is illustrated in an extreme form by the disallowance of the strategic value for improvements of the island in St. Mary's river in United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co. 229 U. S. 53, 57 L. ed. 1063, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 667, decided last month.

The plaintiff in error relies upon cases like Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. ed. 206, to sustain his position that while the valuation cannot be increased 'by the fact that his land has been taken for a water supply, still it can be by the fact that the land is valuable for that purpose. The difficulties in the way of such evidence and the wide discretion allowed to the trial court are well brought out in Sargent v. Merrimac, 196 Mass. 171, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 996, 124 Am. St. Rep. 528, 81 N. E. 970. Much depends on the circumstances of the particular case. We are satisfied on all the authorities that whether we should have agreed or disagreed with the commissioners, if we had been valuing the land, there was no such disregard of plain rights by the courts of New York as to warrant our treating their decision, made without prejudice, in due form, and after full hearing, as a denial by the state of due process of law.

Judgment affirmed.

JAMES J. KELLY, Sheriff of Hudson County,
New Jersey, et al.

Rep. 945.)

Habeas corpus — as substitute for writ of error.

1. Relief by habeas corpus will not be granted to inquire into a detention under an extradition warrant if the magistrate issuing such warrant had jurisdiction of the person of the accused and of the subject-matter, and had before him competent legal evidence of the commission of the crime

Note. — Insanity as a ground for refusing extradition.

As to right, in reviewing extradition proceedings, to be heard upon the merits of the charge against accused, see note to Com. ex rel. Flower v. Superintendent of County Prison, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 939.

Since a hearing upon an application for extradition is not intended for a trial upon the merits of the charge, but takes the nature only of a preliminary examination to determine whether the evidence establishes prima facie that the crime charged has been committed, and that it was committed by the accused, it is clear, as held in CHARLTON v. KELLY, that upon such a hearing the accused does not have the right to introduce all evidence which would be admissible upon a trial under an issue of not guilty, but only such evidence as is appropriate to a hearing having reference only to a commitment for future trial. Accordingly, it was there held that the examining magistrate does not exceed his authority in excluding evidence of insanity, but the court adds that at most the exclusion of such evidence is error not reversible by habeas corpus.

CHARLTON v. KELLY affirms Ex parte Charlton, 185 Fed. 880, where the discussion by the circuit court of the point here under annotation took the following form: When a man is put upon trial upon a charge of crime, it is upon the double presumption that he was sane when the act was committed, and that he is sane at the time he is put to his defense. An effort to prove insanity to overcome the latter presumption is not, properly speaking, a defense, but is preliminary to the trial; an effort to prove insanity to overcome the former presumption is a defense. The issue of insanity as a prevention of trial, i. e., to overcome the latter presumption, can be raised only at or immediately before his trial, and only in the forum provided by the jurisdiction which he is alleged to have outraged. Such an inquiry is not proper upon the hearing before the committing magistrate, whose function is merely to with which he was charged in the complaint, which, according to the local law, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been committed within the state.

Same — scope of review — evidence.

2. Mere errors in the rejection of evidence in extradition proceedings are not subject to review by a writ of habeas corpus.

Extradition — evidence — insanity of accused.

3. The right to introduce evidence of the insanity of the accused in proceedings for the extradition, conformably with the treaty with Italy of 1868 (15 Stat. at L. 629), of a fugitive from justice, was not given by the act of 1882 (22 Stat. at L. 215, chap. 378), § 3, providing the means, in foreign extradition proceedings, for obtaining the determine whether a crime has been committed, and whether the evidence indicates that the accused committed it. Therefore, upon extradition proceedings, an inquiry into the present sanity of the accused is improper as premature, and, moreover, a determination thereon would be inconclusive, since, even if he is now pronounced insane, he might be sane when the trial upon the merits shall be ready to be moved. The issue of insanity at the time of the commission of the crime as a matter of defense, i. e., to overcome the former presumption, can be raised only when the accused shall be put to his trial on the merits, and cannot be raised before the committing magistrate, since the proceeding before him is but a hearing, and not a trial. And, therefore, evidence of insanity as a defense to the charge is not a ground for refusing extradition.

Two early cases, although not precisely in point here, since they did not involve insanity as a defense, laid down principles which have since been generally followed, and with which the CHARLTON CASE is in harmony.

Thus, in Re Farez, 7 Blatchf. 345, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 346, Fed. Cas. No. 4,645, it was said that the evidence before the commissioner upon an application for extradition need not be so full as, in his judgment, if he were sitting on the final trial of the case, to warrant a conviction. The court remarks that the theory on which treaties for extradition are made is that the place where the crime was committed is the proper place in which to try the accused; and nothing is required to warrant extradition except that sufficient evidence of the fact of the commission of the crime by the accused shall be produced to justify his commitment for trial.

And in Re Wadge, 15 Fed. 864, it was said that if it should be recognized that the accused has a legal right in extradition proceedings to demand and produce evidence as to matters of defense (alibi in that case), it would give him the option of insisting upon a full hearing and trial of his case here; and that might compel the testimony and for the payment of the fees of witnesses whose evidence is material to the defense, and without which the accused cannot safely go to trial, since Congress cannot be deemed to have intended by this statute to depart from the provision of the first article of the treaty which requires that a surrender shall be made upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive shall be found, would justify his arrest and commitment if the crime had been there committed.

Foreign extradition — procedure — formal demand.

4. The requirement in the supplemental extradition treaty of 1884 with Italy, following provisions for arrest upon the exhibition of a certificate from the Secretary of State, attesting that a requisition has been made, and for the remand of the accused to prison until a formal demand for extradition shall be made and supported by evidence, that if "the requisition, together with the documents above provided for," shall not be made within forty days from the date of arrest, the accused shall be set at liberty, cannot be deemed to mean that "formal demand" must be proved in the preliminary proceedings within forty days after arrest, in view of the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5270, applicable to a demanding government to produce all its evidence here, both direct and rebutting, in order to meet the defense thus gathered from every quarter. The result would be that the foreign government, though entitled by the terms of the treaty to the extradition of the accused for the purpose of a trial where the crime was committed, would be compelled to go into a full trial on the merits in a foreign country, under all the disadvantages of such a situation, and could not obtain extradition until after it had produced a conviction of the accused upon a full and substantial trial here. This would be a plain contravention of the intent and meaning of extradition treaties. The phrase in the act of 1882, "that he (the accused) cannot safely go to trial without them" witnesses), cannot be construed as giving a right to a full trial in violation of treaty stipulations; but it must be confined to such a preliminary hearing only as was already allowable under the existing practice, viz., such as is appropriate to a hearing having reference only to a commitment for future trial.

But in 1 Moore on Extradition, § 346, it is related that in September, 1879, the British minister complained that one Catlow, charged with murder in a British vessel on the high seas, had been discharged by a commissioner in New York on the ground of his insanity. Upon the hearing, it was admitted that Catlow had committed the homicide in question; and the minister suggested that the commissioner, in admitting evidence of insanity, had exceeded his functions, the question of insanity being a matter of exculpation proper foreign extradition proceeding, authorizing the committing magistrate, upon complaint charging one of the crimes named in an extradition treaty, to issue his warrant of arrest, to hear the evidence of criminality, to commit the accused to jail, and to certify his conclusions to the Secretary of State, who, under §§ 5272, 5273, may issue his warrant for the surrender of the accused upon requisition of the proper authorities.

Same — citizens of country of asylum — persons.

5. There is no principle of international law by which citizens of the country of the asylum are excepted out of an extradition convention for the surrender of "persons," where no such exception was made in the treaty itself.

Same.

6. Citizens of the country of asylum are "persons" within the meaning of the extradition treaty of 1868 with Italy, by which the two governments mutually agree to deliver up all persons who, having been convicted of or charged with any of the crimes specified, committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, shall seek an asylum in the other.

Courts — political question — breach of extradition treaty — waiver.

7. Executive recognition of the obligation to be considered only by the jury on the trial. The rearrest of Catlow with a view to his extradition was requested. The Secretary of State having referred the minister's note to the department of justice, the Solicitor General, with the approval of the Attorney General, advised that, as the evidence as to insanity "did not tend to contradict or impugn the testimony introduced as to the fact of homicide, but only to explain it, so as to show that the consequence otherwise deducible did not in fact follow," such evidence was properly admitted. The Secretary of State accordingly declined to take any steps looking to the rearrest of the fugitive. The author refers for the facts to the case to MSS. Notes, Br. Leg. 16 Ops. Atty. Gen. 642, Phillips, Solic. Gen. 1879, and to a communication from Mr. Evarts, Secretary of State, to Br. Min. Feb. 4, 1880.

And in § 368 of the same work, it is related that the extradition of one Robbins was demanded for an assault committed while he was a passenger upon a British vessel, but that because he was a citizen of Maine, and because the death of the assaulted person occurred in a port of Maine, where the vessel landed, the offender was turned over to the authorities of that state, with the understanding that he should be surrendered to the British authorities in case he was not indicted there. He was indicted, but on trial was found by the jury to be insane, and was committed to an asylum. The British ministry was informed of these facts and the case was dropped. Reference is made to MSS. Notes, Gr. Br. & MSS. Notes, Br. Leg.

of the United States to surrender its own citizens under the extradition treaty with Italy of 1868, and the supplemental treaty of 1884, notwithstanding the refusal of the Italian government to surrender fugitives of Italian nationality committing crimes in the United States, is a waiver of the breach, if any, and leaves the treaty in force as the supreme law of the land, which must be recognized by the courts.

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of New Jersey dismissing his petition for a writ of habeas corpus and remanding him to custody under a warrant for his extradition as a fugitive from justice. Affirmed.

Statement by Mr. Justice Lurton:

This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and remanding the petitioner to custody under a warrant for his extradition as a fugitive from the justice of the Kingdom of Italy.

The proceedings for the extradition of the appellant were begun upon a complaint duly made by the Italian vice consul, charging him with the commission of a murder in Italy. A warrant was duly issued by the Hon. John A. Blair, one of the judges of New Jersey, qualified to sit as a committing magistrate in such a proceeding, under § 5270, Revised Statutes, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3591. At the hearing, evidence was produced which satisfied Judge Blair that the appellant was a fugitive from justice, and that he was the person whose return to Italy was desired, and that there was probable cause for holding him for trial upon the charge of murder, committed there. He thereupon committed the appellant, to be held until surrendered under a warrant to be issued by the Secretary of State. A transcript of the evidence and of the findings was duly certified as required by § 5270, Revised Statutes, and a warrant in due form for his surrender was issued by the Secretary of State. Its execution has, up to this time been prevented by the habeas corpus proceedings in the court below and the pendency of this appeal.

The procedure in an extradition proceeding is that found in the treaty under which the extradition is demanded, and the legislation by Congress in aid thereof. Thus, article 1 of the treaty with Italy of 1868 [15 Stat. at L. 629] (vol. 1, Treaties, Conventions, etc., of the United States, 1910, p. 96), reads as follows.

"The government of the United States and the government of Italy mutually agree to deliver up persons who, having been convicted of or charged with the crimes specified in the following article, committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, shall seek an asylum or be found within the territories of the other; Provided, that this shall only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his or her apprehension and commitment for trial, if the crime had been there committed."

One of the crimes specified in the section following is murder.

By article 5 it is provided that:

"When, however, the fugitive shall have been merely charged with crime, a duly authenticated copy of the warrant for his arrest in the country where the crime may have been committed, or of the depositions upon which such warrant may have been issued, must accompany the requisition as aforesaid. The President of the United States, or the proper executive authority in Italy, may then issue a warrant for the apprehension of the fugitive, in order that he may be brought before the proper judicial authority for examination. If it should then be decided that, according to law and the evidence, the extradition is due pursuant to the treaty, the fugitive may be given up according to the forms prescribed in such cases."

That article was amended by the additional treaty of 1884 (vol. 1, Treaties and Conventions, p. 985) by a clause added in these words:

"Any competent judicial magistrate of either of the two countries shall be authorized, after the exhibition of a certificate signed by the Minister of Foreign Affairs [of Italy] or the Secretary of State [of the United States], attesting that a requisition has been made by the government of the other country to secure the preliminary arrest of a person condemned for or charged with having therein committed a crime for which, pursuant to this convention, extradition may be granted, and on complaint duly made under oath by a person cognizant of the fact, or by a diplomatic or consular officer of the demanding government, being duly authorized by the latter, and attesting that the aforesaid crime was thus perpetrated, to issue a warrant for the arrest of the person thus inculpated, to the end that he or she may be brought before the said magistrate, so that the evidence of his or her criminality may be heard and considered; and the person thus accused and imprisoned shall from time to time be remanded to prison until a formal demand for his or her extradition shall be made and supported by evidence, as above provided; if, however, the requisition, together with the documents above provided for, shall not be made, as required, by the diplomatic representative of the demanding government, or, in his absence, by a consular officer thereof, within forty days from the date of the arrest of the accused, the 'prisoner shall be set at liberty.' [24 Stat. at L. 1002.]

The Italian government passed an act prohibiting the extradition of its citizens, and as a result, it is claimed, whatever obligations rested upon this government have become dissolved. The validity of this so-called legislative release is not a matter for the judiciary, and the question whether this government is justified in recognizing its obligations under the treaty is not for the court to determine.

Mr. Justice Lurton, after making the foregoing statement, delivered the opinion of the court:

A writ of habeas corpus cannot be used as a writ of error. If Judge Blair had jurisdiction of the person of the accused and of the subject-matter, and had before him competent legal evidence of the commission of this crime with which the appellant was charged in the complaint, which, according to the law of New Jersey, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been committed in that state, his decision may not be reviewed on habeas corpus. Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U. S. 270, 278, 46 L. ed. 534, 541, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 484, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 424; Bryant v. United States, 167 U. S. 104, 42 L. ed. 94, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 744; McNamara v. Kenkel, 226 U. S. 520, ante, 146, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 146.

By a stipulation filed in the case for the purpose of this review, it is agreed that the evidence presented to Judge Blair of the murder with which the accused was charged, and of his criminality, was sufficient to meet the treaty and statutory requirements of the case, and the errors assigned in this court, questioning its legality and competency, as well as those as to the alleged absence of a warrant or deposition upon which such warrant was issued, have been withdrawn. But neither this stipulation, nor the withdrawal of the assignments of error referred to, is to affect any of the matters raised by other objections pointed out in other assignments.

The objections which are relied upon for the purpose of defeating extradition may be conveniently summarized and considered under four heads:

1. That evidence of the insanity of the accused was offered and excluded.

2. That the evidence of a formal demand for the extradition of the accused was not filed until more than forty days after the arrest.

3. That appellant is a citizen of the United States, and that the treaty, in providing for the extradition of "persons" accused of crime, does not include persons who are citizens or subjects of the nation upon whom the demand is made.

4. That if the word "person," as used in the treaty, includes citizens of the asylum country, the treaty, in so far as it covers that subject, has been abrogated by the conduct of Italy in refusing to deliver up its own citizens upon the demand of the United States, and by the enactment of a municipal law, since the treaty, forbidding the extradition of citizens.

We will consider these objections in their order:

1. Was evidence of insanity improperly excluded?

It must be conceded that impressive evidence of the insanity of the accused was offered by him and excluded. It is now said that this ruling was erroneous. But if so, this is not a writ of error, and mere errors in the rejection of evidence are not subject to review by a writ of habeas corpus. Benson v. McMahon, 127 U. S. 457, 461, 32 L. ed. 234, 236, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1240; Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U. S. 270, 278, 46 L. ed. 534, 541, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 484, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 424; McNamara v. Henkel, 226 U. S. 520, 57 L. ed. 330, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 146. In the McNamara Case, certain depositions had been received for the prosecution over objection. This court said that there was legal evidence on which to base the action of the commissioner in holding the accused for extradition, irrespective of the depositions objected to.

But it is said that the act of 1882 (22 Stat. at L. 215, § 3, chap. 378, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3594), requires that the defendant's witnesses shall be heard. That section is most inartificially drawn. It reads as follows:

"That on the hearing of any case under a claim of extradition by any foreign government, upon affidavit being filed by the person charged, setting forth that there are witnesses whose evidence is material to his defense, that he cannot safely go to trial without them, what he expects to prove by each of them, and that he is not possessed of sufficient means, and is actually unable to pay the fees of such witnesses, the judge or commissioner before whom such claim for extradition is heard may order that such witnesses be subpoenaed; and in such cases the costs incurred by the process, and the fees of witnesses, shall be paid in the same manner that similar fees are paid in the case of witnesses subpoenaed in behalf of the United States."

The contention is that the effect of this provision is to give the accused the right to introduce any evidence which would be admissible upon a trial under an issue of not guilty. To this we cannot agree. The prime purpose of the section is to afford the defendant the means for obtaining the testimony of witnesses, and to provide for their fees. In no sense does the statute make relevant, legal, or competent evidence which would not have been competent before the statute upon such a hearing. True, the statute speaks of evidence "material for his defense, without which he cannot go safely to trial," but we cannot discover that Congress intended to depart from the provisions of the 1st article of the treaty, which requires that a surrender shall be made "upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his or her apprehension and commitment, if the crime had been there committed. The provision is common to many treaties, and Congress, by § 5270, Revised Statutes, has, in aid of such treaties, prescribed the procedure upon such a hearing in these words:

"Whenever there is a treaty or convention for extradition between the government of the United States and any foreign government, any justice of the Supreme Court, circuit judge, district judge, commissioner, authorized so to do by any of the courts of the United States, or judge of a court of record of general jurisdiction of any state, may, upon complaint made under oath, charging any person found within the limits of any state, district, or territory, with having committed within the jurisdiction of any such foreign government any of the crimes provided for by such treaty or convention, issue his warrant for the apprehension of the person so charged, that he may be brought before such justice, judge, or commissioner, to the end that the evidence of criminality may be heard and considered. If, on such hearing, he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the proper treaty or convention, he shall certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the Secretary of State, that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities of such foreign government, for the surrender of such person, according to the stipulations of the treaty or convention; and he shall issue his warrant for the commitment of the person so charged to the proper jail, there to remain until such surrender shall be made."

Judge Blair made the certificate in form and substance in conformity with the statute, and upon the receipt of that, a warrant was duly issued for the surrender of the appellant to the agents of the Italian government.

In Benson v. McMahon, supra, this court said of a similar provision in the treaty with Mexico [12 Stat. at L. 1199], in connection with § 5270, Revised Statutes,—

"Taking this provision of the treaty and that of the Revised Statutes above recited, we are of opinion that the proceeding before the commissioner is not to be regarded as in the nature of a final trial by which the prisoner could be convicted or acquitted of the crime charged against him, but rather of the character of those preliminary examinations which take place every day in this country before an examining or committing magistrate for the purpose of determining whether a case is made out which will justify the holding of the accused, either by imprisonment or under bail, to ultimately answer to an indictment or other proceeding, in which he shall be finally tried upon the charge made against him. The language of the treaty which we have cited, above quoted, explicitly provides that 'the commission of the crime shall be so established as that the laws of the country in which the fugitive or the person so accused shall be found would justify his or her apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been there committed.' This prescribes the proceedings in these preliminary examinations as accurately as language can well do it. The act of Congress conferring jurisdiction upon the commissioner, or other examining officer, it may be noted in this connection, says that if he deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the provisions of the treaty, he shall certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony, and issue his warrant for the commitment of the person so charged.

"We are not sitting in this court on the trial of the prisoner, with power to pronounce him guilty and punish him, or declare him innocent and acquit him. We are now engaged simply in an inquiry as to whether, under the construction of the act of Congress, and the treaty entered into between this country and Mexico, there was legal evidence before the commissioner to justify him in exercising his power to commit the person accused to custody to await the requisition of the Mexican government."

To repeat, the act of 1882 does not prescribe the extent to which evidence thus obtained shall be admitted, and we quite agree with the view expressed by Judge Brown, in Re Wadge, 15 Fed. 864, who said:

"The phrase in § 3 of the act of August 3, 1882, 'that he (the accused) cannot safely go to trial without them' (witnesses), cannot be construed as giving a right to a full trial in violation of treaty stipulations; but it must be confined to such a preliminary hearing only as was already allowable under the existing practice; viz., such as is appropriate to a hearing having reference only to a commitment for future trial."

There is not and cannot well be any uniform rule determining how far an examining magistrate should hear the witnesses produced by an accused person. The proceeding is not a trial. The issue is confined to the single question of whether the evidence for the state makes a prima facie case of guilt sufficient to make it proper to hold the party for trial. Such committing trials, if they may be called trials in any legal sense, are usually regulated by local statutes. Neither can the courts be expected to bring about uniformity of practice as to the right of such an accused person to have his witnesses examined, since if they are heard, that is the end of the matter, as the ruling cannot be reversed.

In this case the magistrate refused to hear evidence of insanity. It is claimed that because he excluded such evidence, the judgment committing appellant for extradition is to be set aside as a nullity, and the accused set at liberty. At most the exclusion was error, not reversible by habeas corpus. To have witnesses produced to contradict the testimony for the prosecution is obviously a very different thing from hearing witnesses for the purpose of explaining matters referred to by the witnesses for the government. This distinction was taken by Mr. Justice Washington in the case of United States v. White, 2 Wash. C. C. 29, Fed. Cas. No. 16,685, when he said:

"Generally speaking, the defendant's witnesses are not examined upon an application to bind him over to answer upon a criminal charge. The defendant's witnesses are never sent to the grand jury, except where the attorney for the prosecution consents thereto. But in this incipient stage of the prosecution, the judge may examine witnesses who were present at the time when the offense is said to have been committed, to explain what is said by the witnesses for the prosecution; and the cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution is certainly improper."

We therefore conclude that the examining magistrate did not exceed his authority in excluding evidence of insanity. If the evidence was only for the purpose of showing present insanity by reason of which the accused was not capable of defending the charge of crime, it is an objection which should be taken before or at the time of his trial for the crime, and heard by the court having jurisdiction of the crime. If it was offered to show insanity at the time of the commission of the crime, it was obviously a defense which should be heard at the time of his trial, or by a preliminary hearing in the jurisdiction of the crime, if so provided for by its laws. By the law of New Jersey, insanity as an excuse for crime is a defense, and the burden of making it out is upon the defendant. Graves

v. State, 45 N. J. L. 203, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 386; State v. Maioni, 78 N. J. L. 339, 341, 74 Atl. 526, 20 Ann. Cas. 204; State v. Peacock, 50 N. J. L. 34, 36, 11 Atl. 270. A defendant has no general right to have evidence exonerating him go before a grand jury, and unless the prosecution consents, such witnesses may be excluded. 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 318; United States v. White, supra; Res publica v. Shaffer, 1 Dall. 236, 1 L. ed. 116; United States v. Palmer, 2 Cranch, C. C. 11, Fed. Cas. No. 15,989; United States v. Terry, 39 Fed. 355, 362.

2. It was next objected that no formal demand for the extradition of the appellant was made within forty days after his arrest, and that he was therefore entitled to be set at liberty. The objection is founded upon the supplemental convention with Italy of 1884, heretofore set out.

A "certificate," such as was indicated by that convention, was undoubtedly "exhibited" to the committing magistrate, and was the basis of his action. The other parts of the provision are not clear. What is referred to by the phrase, "the requisition, together with the documents above provided," etc., which is required to be made within forty days, or the person set at liberty? The "certificate" attesting "that a requisition has been made," etc., was "exhibited" to Judge Blair; and we fail to find in this clause of the treaty any requirement that the subsequent "formal demand" for the extradition shall be filed with the magistrate within forty days after the arrest of the accused, or at any other time. The whole of the convention should be read together and in connection with § 5270, Revised Statutes, which is applicable to all treaties. Under § 5270, any one of the judicial officers named therein may, upon complaint, charging one of the crimes named in the treaty, issue his warrant of arrest and hear the evidence of criminality. This done, his duty is, if he deems the evidence sufficient to hold the accused for extradition, to commit him to jail, and to certify his conclusion, with the evidence, to the Secretary of State, who may then, "upon the requisition of the proper authorities of such foreign government, issue his warrant for the surrender of the accused. Revised Statutes, §§ 5272, 5273. Of course, the effect of the supplementary treaty of 1884, being later than the statutory requirements above referred to, is to supersede the statute in so far as there is a necessary conflict in the carrying out of the extradition obligation between this country and Italy. But, as observed in Grin v. Shine, 187 U. S. 181, 191, 47 L. ed. 130, 136, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 98, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 366, "Congress has a perfect right to provide for the extradition of criminals in its own way, with or without a treaty to that effect, and to declare that foreign criminals shall be surrendered upon such proofs of criminality as it may judge sufficient. Castro v. DeUriarte, 16 Fed. 93. This appears to have been the object of § 5270, which is applicable to all foreign governments with which we have treaties of extradition." This section, by its very terms, applies "in all cases in which there now exists or hereafter may exist, any treaty or convention for extradition." Had there been no law of Congress upon the subject, the method of procedure prescribed by the supplementary treaty of 1884 would necessarily have been the proper one, and the committing magistrate could have proceeded only according to the treaty, for that would have been the only law of the land applicable to the case and the only source of his authority.

It was therefore competent for Judge Blair to act upon the complaint made before him independently of any preliminary mandate or certificate, such as was in fact issued and "exhibited" to him in this case, being plainly authorized so to do by the terms of § 5270. The personal rights of the accused are saved by the provisions of the same section, since he could only have been surrendered upon the warrant of the Secretary of State, based upon the evidence presented upon the hearing, and the conclusion of the sufficiency of the evidence of criminality certified to the Secretary of State, and upon a formal requisition for extradition. Castro v. DeUriarte, 16 Fed. 93, 97; Grin v. Shine, supra.

Construed in the light of the original and supplementary conventions with Italy, and of § 5270, Revised Statutes, we do not find that it was obligatory that the "formal demand" referred to in the 1884 clause should be proven in the preliminary proceeding within forty days after the arrest. That is a demand made upon the executive authority of the United States by the executive authority of Italy. Its presentation was not necessary to give the examining magistrate jurisdiction. Such a formal demand was in fact made on July 28, 1910, less than forty days after the arrest. That, together with the certificate of the magistrate and the evidence submitted to him, was the authority of law under which the Secretary of State issued his warrant of extradition. Every requirement of the law, whether it appears in the treaty or in the act of Congress, was substantially complied with. This was the construction placed upon the treaty by Mr. Secretary Knox in answer to the same objection made to him before he issued his warrant, and also of Judge Rellstab, who dismissed the petition for a writ of habeas corpus, and from whose decree this appeal comes.

3. By article 1 of the extradition treaty with Italy, the two governments mutually agree to deliver up all persons who, having been convicted of or charged with any of the crimes specified in the following article, committed within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, shall seek an asylum in the other, etc. It is claimed by counsel for the appellant that the word "persons," as used in this article, does not include persons who are citizens of the asylum country.

That the word "persons" etymologically includes citizens as well as those who are not can hardly be debatable. The treaty contains no reservation of citizens of the country of asylum. The contention is that an express exclusion of citizens or subjects is not necessary, as by implication from accepted principles of public law, persons who are citizens of the asylum country are excluded from extradition conventions unless expressly included. This was the position taken by the Foreign Minister of Italy in a correspondence in 1890 with the Secretary of State of the United States, concerning a demand made by the United States for the extradition of Bevivini and Villella, two subjects of Italy whose extradition was sought, that they might be tried for a crime committed in this country. Their extradition was refused by Italy on account of their Italian nationality. The Foreign Minister of Italy advanced in favor of the Italian position these grounds: (a) That the Italian Penal Code of 1890, in express terms provided that, "the extradition of a citizen is not permitted;" (b) that a crime committed by an Italian subject in a foreign country was punishable in Italy, and, therefore, there was no ground for saying that unless extradited the crime would go unpunished; and (c) that it has become a recognized principle of public international law that one nation will not deliver its own citizens or subjects upon the demand of another, to be tried for a crime committed in the territory of the latter, unless it has entered into a convention expressly so contracting; and that the United States had itself recognized the principle in many treaties by inserting a clause exempting citizens from extradition. United States Foreign Relations 1890, p. 555. Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State of the United States, protested against the position of the Italian government, and maintained the view that citizens were included among the persons subject to extradition unless expressly excluded. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

His defense of the position is full and remarkably able. It is to be found in United States Foreign Relations for 1890, pp. 557, 566.

We shall pass by the effect of the Penal Code in preventing the authorities of Italy from carrying out its international engagements to surrender citizens, for that has no bearing upon the question now under consideration, which is whether, under accepted principles of international law, citizens are to be regarded as not embraced within an extradition treaty unless expressly included. That it has come to be the practice with a preponderant number of nations to refuse to deliver its citizens is true; but this exception is convincingly shown by Mr. Blaine in his reply to the Foreign Minister of Italy, and by the thorough consideration of the whole subject by Mr. John Basset Moore, in his treatise on extradition, chap. V., pp. 152, 193, to be of modern origin. The beginning of the exemption is traced to the practice between France and the Low Countries in the 18th century. Owing to the existence in the municipal law of many nations of provisions prohibiting the extradition of citizens, the United States has in several of its extradition treaties clauses exempting citizens from their obligation. The treaties in force in 1910 may therefore be divided into two classes: those which expressly exempt citizens, and those which do not. Those which do contain the limitation are by far the larger number. Among the treaties which provide for the extradition of "persons," without limitation or qualification, are the following:

With Great Britain, November 10, 1842, [12 Stat. at L. 572], extended July 12, 1889 [26 Stat. at L. 1508], United States Treaties 1910, pp. 650 and 740.

With Venezuela, August 27, 1860, id. p. 1845 [12 Stat. at L. 1143].

The treaty with Japan of 1886, id. p. 1025, contains a qualification in these words:

"Art. 7. Neither of the contracting parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens or subjects under the stipulations of this convention, but they shall have the power to deliver them up, if, in their discretion, it be deemed proper to do so." [24 Stat. at L. 1017].

The conclusion we reach is, that there is no principle of international law by which citizens are excepted out of an agreement to surrender "persons," where no such exception is made in the treaty itself. Upon the contrary, the word "persons" includes all persons when not qualified as it is in some of the treaties between this and other nations. That this country has made such an exception in some of its conventions and not in others demonstrates that the contracting parties were fully aware of the consequences unless there was a clause qualifying the word "persons." This interpretation has been consistently upheld by the United States, and enforced under the several treaties which do not exempt citizens. That Italy has not conformed to this view, and the effect of this attitude, will be considered later. But that the United States has always construed its obligation as embracing its citizens is illustrated by the action of the executive branch of the government in this very instance. A construction of a treaty by the political department of the government, while not conclusive upon a court called upon to construe such a treaty in a matter involving personal rights, is nevertheless of much weight.

The subject is summed up by Mr. John Bassett Moore in his work on Extradition, vol. 1, p. 170, § 138, where he says:

"Persons' includes citizens. In respect to the persons to be surrendered, the extradition treaties of the United States all employ the general term 'persons,' or 'all persons.' Hence, where no express exception is made, the treaties warrant no distinctions as to nationality. Writing on the general subject of the extradition treaties of the United States and the practice thereunder, Mr. Seward said: 'In some of the United States' extradition treaties it is stipulated that the citizens or subjects of the parties shall not be surrendered. Where there is no express reservation of the kind, there would not, it is presumed, be any hesitation in giving up a citizen of the United States to be tried abroad.' Such has been the uniform and unquestioned practice under the treaty with Great Britain of 1842, in which the term 'all persons' is used."

The effect of yielding to the interpretation urged by Italy would have brought about most serious consequences as to other treaties then in force. One of these was the extradition treaty with Great Britain, made as far back as 1843. Inasmuch as under the law of that country, as of this, crimes committed by their citizens within the jurisdiction of another country were punishable only where the crime was committed, it was important that the Italian interpretation should not be accepted.

4. We come now to the contention that by the refusal of Italy to deliver up fugitives of Italian nationality, the treaty has thereby ceased to be of obligation on the United States. The attitude of Italy is indicated by its Penal Code of 1900, which forbids the extradition of citizens, and by the denial in two or more instances to recognize this obligation of the treaty as extending to its citizens.

During a preliminary correspondence between the Department of State, and the Italian Chargé d'Affaires, in reference to the provisional arrest and detention of the appellant under articles 1 and 2 of the treaty, as extended by article 2 of the additional convention of 1884, Mr. Knox, the then Secretary of State, inquired "whether or not the Department is to understand that by initiating extradition proceedings for the surrender of this American citizen accused of committing murder in Italy, your government wishes to be understood as surrendering its view heretofore entertained, and as being now willing to adopt as to cases which may hereafter arise between the two governments, the view that the extradition treaties of 1868, 1869 [16 Stat. at L. 767], and 1884, between the United States and Italy, require the surrender by each government, of any and all persons, irrespective of the nationality, who, having been convicted for or charged with, commission of any of the crimes specified in the treaty, within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting parties, shall seek an asylum or be found within the territory of the other; and further and specifically to inquire whether the government of Italy now proposes as to all cases arising in the future, to deliver to the government of the United States, under and in accordance with the treaty provisions, those Italian subjects who, committing crimes in the United States, take refuge in Italy."

The reply to this was as follows:

July 1, 1910.

Mr. Secretary of State:—

By telegram of June 24, last, your Excellency inquired whether, in instituting extradition proceedings in the case of Porter Charlton, who confessed having committed murder at Moltrasio, the King's government intended to depart from the rule, heretofore observed, not to surrender its own subjects, and whether it was to be inferred that Italians guilty of an offense committed on American territory, who should take refuge in Italy, should hereafter be delivered without fail to the American government.

I now have the honor to inform your Excellency that the King's government cannot depart from the principle established by our law, that our nationals cannot be surrendered to foreign powers. Furthermore, this principle does not conflict with the provisions of the extradition convention. Indeed, it seems logical that so far as parity in the matter of extraditing their respective citizens or subjects is concerned, each party should, in the absence of specific provisions in the convention itself, be guided by the spirit of its own legislation.

The Italian law does not consent to the extradition of nationals, but the Italian courts are competent to try, on the request of a foreign government, their nationals who may have committed offenses on that government's territory.

Contrariwise, the laws of the United States, by not permitting local tribunals to try American citizens for offenses committed abroad, seem to admit of their being extradited. Otherwise an offender would, under theegis of the law itself, escape the punishment he deserves.

I have the honor to inform your Excellency that the requisite extradition papers in the case of Porter Charlton will be forwarded to me without delay, and in the meanwhile I beg you kindly to cause the prisoner to be held in provisional detention.

On July 28, 1910, the following communication was addressed to the Secretary of State, and was received on July 30, 1910:

Mr. Secretary of State:—

Referring to previous communications, and in accordance with the provisions of article 5 of the extradition convention of March 23, 1868, I have the honor to lay before your Excellency a formal request for the extradition of Porter Charlton, who has confessed the crime of murder committed on the person of his own wife at Moltrasio, Como, which crime is specified in article 2, § 1, of the said convention.

Your Excellency has already been so good as to forward to me, in note No. 864 of June 28 last, the preliminary certificate of arrest provided by article 2 of the additional convention of June 11, 1884, with a view to the provisional arrest of the above-named accused.

In support of this request, I have the honor to transmit herewith to your Excellency the record of proceedings conducted by the court of Como in the case of the aforesaid murder. The papers are regularly viséed by the Embassy of the United States at Rome.

Awaiting the Federal "warrant" and the kind return of the inclosed papers for submission to the competent court, I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your Excellency, together with my thanks in advance, the assurance of my highest consideration.

To this the Secretary of State, after the conclusion of the hearing before Judge Blair, and the receipt by the Department of his judgment and the evidence produced before him, replied as follows:

Washington, December 10, 1901.

Excellency:—

In compliance with the request made by your Embassy in its note of July 26 last, and in pursuance of existing treaty stipulations between the United States and Italy, I have the honor to inclose a warrant of surrender in the case of Porter Charlton, charged with murder, committed within the jurisdiction of the Kingdom of Italy, and examined and committed for surrender by the Honorable John A. Blair, judge of the court of common pleas in and for the county of Hudson, in the state of New Jersey.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

The attitude of the Italian government, indicated by proffering this request for extradition "in accordance with article 5 of the treaty of 1868," is, as shown by the communication of July 1st, set out above, substantially this,—

First. That crimes committed by an American in a foreign country were not justiciable in the United States, and must therefore go unpunished unless the accused be delivered to the country wherein the crime was committed for trial.

Second. Such was not the case with Italy, since, under the laws of Italy, crimes committed by its subjects in foreign lands were justiciable in Italy.

Third. That as a consequence of the difference in the municipal law, "it was logical that so far as parity in the matter of extraditing their respective citizens or subjects is concerned, each party should, in the absence of specific provisions in the convention itself, be guided by the spirit of its own legislation."

This adherence to a view of the obligation of the treaty as not requiring one country to surrender its nationals while it did the other presented a situation in which the United States might do either of two things; namely, abandon its own interpretation of the word "persons" as including citizens, or adhere to its own interpretation and surrender the appellant, although the obligation had, as to nationals, ceased to be reciprocal. The United States could not yield its own interpretation of the treaty, since that would have had the most serious consequence on five other treaties in which the word "persons" had been used in its ordinary meaning, as including all persons, and, therefore, not exempting citizens. If the attitude of Italy was, as contended, a violation of the obligation of the treaty, which, in international law, would have justified the United States in denouncing the treaty as no longer obligatory, it did not automatically have that effect. If the United States elected not to declare its abrogation, or come to a rupture, the treaty would remain in force. It was only voidable, not void; and if the United States should prefer, it might waive any breach which, in its judgment, had occurred, and conform to its own obligation as if there had been no such breach. 1 Kent, Com. p. 175.

Upon this subject Vattel, Nations, *452, says:

"When the treaty of peace is violated by one of the contracting parties, the other has the option of either declaring the treaty null and void, or allowing it still to subsist; for a contract which contains reciprocal engagements cannot be binding on him with respect to the party who, on his side, pays no regard to the same contract. But, if he chooses not to come to a rupture, the treaty remains valid and obligatory."

Grotius says (bk. 3, chap. 20, ¶ 38):

"It is honorable and laudable to maintain a peace, even after it has been violated by the other party: as Scipio did, after the many treacherous acts of the Carthaginians. For no one can release himself from an obligation by acting contrary to his engagements. And though it may be further said that the peace is broken by such an act, yet the breach ought to be taken in favour of the innocent party, if he thinks proper to avail himself of it."

In 5 Moore's International Law Digest, page 366, it is said:

"A treaty is primarily a compact between independent nations, and depends for the enforcement of its provisions on the honor and the interests of the governments which are parties to it. If these fail, its infraction becomes the subject of international reclamation and negotiation, which may lead to war to enforce them. With this judicial tribunals have nothing to do."

In the case of Re Thomas, 12 Blatchf. 370, Fed. Cas. No. 13,887, Mr. Justice Blatchford (then district judge) said:

"Indeed, it is difficult to see how such a treaty as that between Bavaria and the United States can be abrogated by the action of Bavaria alone, without the consent of the United States. Where a treaty is violated by one of the contracting parties, it rests alone with the injured party to pronounce it broken, the treaty being, in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

such case, not absolutely void, but voidable, at the election of the injured party, who may waive or remit the infraction committed, or may demand a just satisfaction, the treaty remaining obligatory if he chooses not to come to a rupture."

In the case of Terlinden v. Ames, 184 U. S. 270, 285, 46 L. ed. 534, 544, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 484, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 424, the question was presented whether a treaty was a legal obligation if the state with whom it was made was without power to carry out its obligation. This court quoted with approval the language of Justice Blatchford, set out above, and said:

"And without considering whether extinguished treaties can be renewed by tacit consent under our Constitution, we think that on the question, whether this treaty has even been terminated, governmental action in respect to it must be regarded as of controlling importance."

That the political branch of the government recognizes the treaty obligation as still existing is evidenced by its action in this case. In the memorandum giving the reasons of the Department of State for determining to surrender the appellant, after stating the difference between the two governments as to the interpretation of this clause of the treaty, Mr. Secretary Knox said:

"The question is now for the first time presented as to whether or not the United States is under obligation under treaty to surrender to Italy for trial and punishment citizens of the United States fugitive from the justice of Italy, notwithstanding the interpretation placed upon the treaty by Italy with reference to Italian subjects. In this connection it should be observed that the United States, although as stated above, consistently contending that the Italian interpretation was not the proper one, has not treated the Italian practice as a breach of the treaty obligation necessarily requiring abrogation, has not abrogated the treaty, or taken any step looking thereto, and has, on the contrary, constantly regarded the treaty as in full force and effect, and has answered the obligations imposed thereby, and has invoked the rights therein granted. It should, moreover, be observed that even though the action of the Italian government be regarded as a breach of the treaty, the treaty is binding until abrogated, and therefore the treaty not having been abrogated, its provisions are operative against us.

"The question would therefore appear to reduce itself to one of interpretation of the meaning of the treaty, the government of the United States being now for the first time called upon to declare whether it regards the treaty as obliging it to surrender its citizens to Italy, notwithstanding Italy has not and insists it cannot surrender its citizens to us. It should be observed, in the first place, that we have always insisted not only with reference to the Italian extradition treaty, but with reference to the other extradition treaties similarly phrased, that the word 'persons' includes citizens. We are therefore committed to that interpretation. The fact that we have for reasons already given ceased generally to make requisition upon the government of Italy for the surrender of Italian subjects under the treaty would not require of necessity that we should, as a matter of logic or law, regard ourselves as free from, the obligation of surrendering our citizens, we laboring under no such legal inhibition regarding surrender as operates against the government of Italy. Therefore, since extradition treaties need not be reciprocal, even in the matter of the surrendering of citizens, it would seem entirely sound to consider ourselves as bound to surrender our citizens to Italy, even though Italy should not, by reason of the provisions of her municipal law, be able to surrender its citizens to us."

The Executive Department having thus elected to waive any right to free itself from the obligation to deliver up its own citizens, it is the plain duty of this court to recognize the obligation to surrender the appellant as one imposed by the treaty as the supreme law of the land, and as affording authority for the warrant of extradition.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the First Division of the Territory of Alaska to review a judgment convicting defendant of inciting the commission of the crime of furnishing liquor to an Indian. Reversed.

Statement by Gilbert, Circuit Judge:

The plaintiff in error was convicted in the commissioner's court in Alaska of the offense of soliciting and inciting another to commit the crime of furnishing liquor to an Indian, in that he solicited and incited the other to sell whisky to him, the said plaintiff in error, he being an Indian. An appeal was taken to the district court, where the matter was brought on de novo, and the plaintiff in error was again found guilty. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, on the ground that the facts set forth therein did not constitute a crime, and a motion in arrest of judgment was made on the same ground. The conviction was had under § 142 of the Alaska Criminal Code (act March 3, 1899, chap. 429, 30 Stat. 1274, as amended by act Feb. 6, 1909, chap. 80, § 9, 35 Stat. at L. 603), which provides as follows: "That if any person shall, without the authority of the United States, or some authorized officer thereof, sell, barter, or give to any Indian or half-breed who lives and associates with Indians, any spirituous, malt, or vinous liquor, or intoxicating extracts, such person shall be fined not less than one hundred nor more than five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term not to exceed two years."

Argued before Gilbert and Morrow, Circuit Judges, and Wolverton, District Judge.

Messrs. Kazis Krauczunas and William J. Claassen for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Roy V. Nye for the United States.

Gilbert, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question which this case presents is whether an Indian who attempts to purchase liquor from another, or solicits another to sell him liquor, solicits or incites the other to commit the offense prohibited sale, see the note to State v. Johnson, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 872.

For effect of participating in purchase and division of quantity of liquor, to render one guilty of unlawful sale, see the note to Strong v. State, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 560.

As to whether one who obtains liquor for, by § 142 of the Alaska Criminal Code, so as to be liable to indictment and punishment therefor. That statute does not differ in its essential features from the ordinary state statutes prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, except in the fact that it provides for punishment in the penitentiary for a term not to exceed two years, and therefore, under § 335 of the new Criminal Code, the offense is made a felony. It is uniformly held that statutes prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors are directed against the act of selling only, and that the offense is committed only by the vendor or someone who aids him in selling, and that the purchaser and those who aid him in the purchase are not guilty of aiding or abetting in the commission of the offense.

In Wakeman v. Chambers, 69 Iowa, 169, 58 Am. Rep. 218, 28 N. W. 498, the court said: "The sale of intoxicating liquor is lawful at common law, and it becomes unlawful simply because the statute so provides. Under the statute, the sale, or keeping with intent to sell, is a public offense, because the statute so declares. The statutory crime is bounded by the statute creating it, and the statute operates on, and has force and effect against, the persons therein named, and no others. As the prohibitory statute does not provide that the purchaser is guilty of any crime, it seems to us this fact practically ends the inquiry. If such had been the intent, it would certainly have been so provided in express terms."

In State v. Baden, 37 Minn. 212, 34 N. W. 24, the court said that the prosecuting witnesses were not accomplices within the meaning of the statute. "The section of the statute under which this prosecution is brought is directed against the seller, not the purchaser."

In Com. v. Willard, 22 Pick. 476, the court held that a purchaser of intoxicating liquors sold in violation of law was not subject to prosecution. The court said:

and delivers it to, another, using the latter's money, is guilty of selling the same, see the notes to Reed v. State, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 268; and State v. Lynch, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 334.

As to purchasing or procuring liquor for another as a substantive offense, see note to Martin v. Com. 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 957.

For the general subject of instigating sales for purposes of prosecution, see the notes to Connor v. People, 25 L.R.A. 346, and State v. Smith, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 946.

As pointed out in the earlier note, it is the rule to refuse to recognize any liability on the part of the purchaser at an illegal sale of intoxicating liquor. The quotations from the authorities in the opinion in Lott v. UNITED STATES point out the general reasoning of the courts on the subject, to which may be added the statement in People v. Smith, 28 Hun, 626, where, the court, in holding that the buyer of liquor was not an accomplice, said: "This witness in no manner participated in the act declared by the statute to be an offense. That was made out by the sale itself without license, and the person making the sale is the only one declared by the law to be criminal. The purchaser has been subjected to no criminal accountability whatsoever, and by the mere purchase he could not be a participant in the performance of the act which the statute has declared to be an offense. That was performed wholly and exclusively by the defendant, for she, unaided by the purchaser, acted alone in making the sale."

The cases other than those concerning the status of witnesses are few.

In State v. Turner, 83 Kan. 183, 109 Pac. 983, the court quotes the official head note to State v. Cullins, 53 Kan. 100, 24 L.R.A. 212, 36 Pac. 56 (prefixed to the earlier note), to wit: "The purchaser of intoxicating liquor which is sold in violation of law is not a participant with the seller, and therefore is not guilty as the principal offender;" but in the Turner Case the question was whether the accused was an agent for the purchaser, or a seller on his own account.

The purchaser of liquor does not aid, abet, counsel, or procure the sale. Ex parte Armstrong, 30 N. B. 423, where the court, in setting aside the purchaser's conviction as an aider, etc., said: "In my opinion a buyer cannot, in respect of a sale made to him, be considered an accessory. He is not, in law, an aider, abettor, counselor, or procurer; but if guilty at all, it must be as a principal in the first degree. Buyer and seller are both principals. It is impossible that there can be a seller without a purchaser, and if the legislature had intended that the buyer should be liable as well as the seller, there would have been words in the Canada temperance act to that effect. I can find no precedent or authority in English or United States cases for such a prosecution."

Of course, buying may be made a substantive offense by statute. See Reg. v. Southwick; 21 Ont. Rep. 670.

It may be noted that it has been held that it is not an offense for a person to enter an unlicensed place for the purpose of buying liquors, or to be found therein, where the offense prohibited by the statute is such entry, etc., into licensed places in prohibited hours. State v. Penner, 85 Conn. 481, 83 Atl. 625.

Purchaser as witness.

The purchaser's testimony as a witness will not show him guilty of crime. Ex parte Barker, 30 N. B. 406, where it was held that the purchaser of liquor was not an aider, abettor, counselor, or procurer of the sale, and consequently could not re-

"The statute imposes a penalty upon any person who shall sell. But every sale implies a purchaser; there must be a purchaser as well as a seller. . . . This must have been known and understood by the legislature. Now, if it were intended that the purchaser should be subject to any penalty, it is to be presumed that it would have been declared in the statute, either by imposing a penalty on the buyer in terms, or by extending the penal consequences of the prohibited act to all persons aiding, counseling, or encouraging the principal offender."

In Harrington v. State, 36 Ala. 236, the indictment was for violating the law prohibiting the sale of liquor to slaves. The court said: "The statutory offense consists in the act of selling, not in that of buying; and neither the purchaser, nor one participating in the purchase, can be deemed an accomplice of the seller."

In State v. Teahan, 50 Conn. 92, the fuse to testify as a witness on the ground that he might criminate himself.

Most of the recent cases on the subject of purchasers as witnesses have related to the question whether they were accomplices.

While the cases are not unanimous, by the weight of authority, a witness who was the purchaser of the liquor is not an accomplice of the seller. State v. Wright, 152 Mo. App. 510, 133 S. W. 664.

The same was held in Gamble v. State, 4 Ga. App. 845, 62 S. E. 544, apparently on a question of corroboration, where, however, the court pointed out that corroboration was not required.

In State v. Ryan, 7 Boyce (Del.) 223, 75 Atl. 869, the court (citing State v. Fulman, 7 Penn. (Del.) 123, 74 Atl. 1) considered the purchaser an accomplice, and instructed the jury that, "although a purchaser of spirituous liquor from one who sells it in violation of law participates in the unlawful sale, a jury may convict upon the uncorroborated testimony of such purchaser." But in the Fulman Case the person held to be at least an accomplice was either an intermediary or the seller.

In Steele v. State, 19 Tex. App. 425, the court was inclined to think that purchasers who were detectives hired by citizens were, as witnesses, accomplices, "they being hired to procure the sale," but the question was not decided. But this decision was soon followed by a statute providing that "the fact that a person purchases intoxicating liquor from anyone who sells it (in violation of the local option laws) shall not constitute such person an accomplice." And the statute has established the character of the purchaser as a witness in such cases. Walker v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 72 S. W. 401; Dane v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 84, 35 S. W. 661; Smith v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 77 S. W. 801; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

court said: "The fact that the question has not before been raised in this state is an indication that the almost universal sentiment of the profession is that the purchaser is guilty of no offense."

And referring to the statute which provided that every person who shall aid or abet, etc., another to commit any offense, might be prosecuted and punished as if he were the principal offender, the court said: "But we are satisfied that the purchaser is not an abettor of the offense within the meaning of the statute. . . . The abettor, within the meaning of the statute, must stand in the same relation to the crime as the criminal,—approach it from the same direction, touch it at the same point. This is not the case with the purchaser of liquor. His approach to the crime is from the other side; he touches it at wholly another point."

In State v. Rand, 51 N. H. 361, 12 Am. Rep. 127, the court approved the language

Terry v. State, 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 75, 79 S. W. 320; Marmar v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 424, 84 S. W. 830; Fox v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 150, 109 S. W. 370; Moreno v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 143 S. W. 156; Trinkle v. State, 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 257, 127 S. W. 1060; Ray v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 138, 131 S. W. 542; Trinkle v. State, 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 187, 131 S. W. 583; Neal v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 157 S. W. 1192; Creech v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 158 S. W. 277.

Where two bought liquor together from the defendant, each buying a bottle, and one buyer testified as to these facts against the seller, who was charged with selling to the other buyer, it was held that the witness was not an accomplice. Terry v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 411, 71 S. W. 908.

Irrespective of statute, it would seem that the Texas courts would now consider that the purchaser was not an accomplice. Thus, in Sears v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 442, 34 S. W. 124, it was held on a charge of selling liquor to a minor, that the purchaser (a witness) was not an accomplice. So, it was held on a charge of giving away liquor on election day, where the recipient of the liquor was a witness, that he was not an accomplice. Keith v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 678, 44 S. W. 847.

While without the scope of this note, reference may be made to Baehner v. State, 25 Ind. App. 597, 58 N. E. 741, where it was urged that the prosecuting witnesses, who were the purchasers, were employed by the state, which could not take advantage of its own wrong. The court said: "A purchase of liquor during prohibited days or hours does not make the purchaser a party to the crime. The law makes the sale charged an unlawful sale, and whatever motive the purchaser may have had in making the purchase, it can be no justification to the seller violating the law."

of Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Willard: "That such a prosecution is unprecedented in this state 'shows very strongly what has been understood to be the law upon the subject.'"

Similar decisions are State v. Miller, 26 W. Va. 106; Dale v. State, 90 Ark. 579. 120 S. W. 389; Keith v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 678, 44 S. W. 847; Hiers v. State, 52 Fla. 25, 41 So. 881; State v. Cullins, 53 Kan. 100, 24 L.R.A. 212, 36 Pac. 56; State v. Turner, 83 Kan. 183, 109 Pac. 983; State v. Clark, 66 Vt. 309, 29 Atl. 461; State v. Smith, 135 Iowa, 583, 113 N. W. 336; Reed v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. Rep. 16, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 268, 103 Pac. 1070. In the case last cited, the court said: "We know of no law that prohibits the purchase of liquor."

But it is urged that the authorities above cited are not applicable here for the reason that the offense is made a felony, and that § 218 of the Penal Code of Alaska adopts the common law of England as adopted and understood in the United States, and provides that it shall be in force in Alaska except as modified by statute, and that at common law it was an indictable offense to incite anyone to the commission of a felony. We do not find that those considerations are conclusive of the question. The fact that the offense of selling liquor to an Indian in Alaska has been made a felony is not in itself alone ground for holding the plaintiff in error indictable for soliciting a sale to himself. The nature of the principal offense, whether a felony or a misdemeanor, makes no difference as to the liability to indictment of one who solicits the commission thereof. At common law, he who solicits another to commit either a felony or a misdemeanor is guilty of the misdemeanor of solicitation, and it was generally held immaterial whether the thing proposed was technically a felony or a misdemeanor. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 768; Rex v. Higgins, 2 East, 5, 6 Revised Rep. 358; Rex v. Phillips, 6 East, 464, 2 Smith, 550, 8 Revised Rep. 511; State v. Keyes, 8 Vt. 67, 30 Am. Dec. 450. It may be conceded that the common law is extended to Alaska, and that Congress is clothed with full legislative power over that territory, and may provide for the punishment therein of those offenses which are punishable at common law, without specifically defining the nature thereof. But the question here is: What was the intention of Congress in enacting the law? Was it intended to make unlawful the act of purchasing intoxicating liquor? If the answer is in the negative, it follows that an Indian who attempts to purchase intoxicating liquor, or solicits another to sell it to him, is guilty of no offense.

The meaning of the act should be found in the light of the anterior legislation on the same subject, legislation not of Congress only, but of the states, and the decisions of the courts, and the general understanding as to the meaning and scope of similar statutes, resulting, in a sense, in a common law of the states on that subject. Section 142 of the Criminal Code of Alaska, as it was originally enacted, made the act of selling intoxicating liquor to Indians a misdemeanor only. In February, 1909 (act Feb. 6, 1909, chap. 80, § 9, 35 Stat. at L. 603), it was so amended as to increase the severity of the punishment. The amendment did not declare the violation of the section to be a felony, but such is the effect of § 335 of the Criminal Code of 1910. Congress must have been aware of the universal ruling of the courts that, under laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, the purchaser committed no offense. We are not justified in assuming that, in so amending the law and increasing the punishment for its violation, it was the intention to make criminal, and subject to punishment as a crime, the act of purchasing or attempting to purchase intoxicating liquors, which theretofore had been innocent acts. If such had been the intention of Congress, it is but reasonable to presume that it would have been expressed in such clear terms as to admit of no doubt. In the absence of such express legislation, we are authorized to presume that Congress deemed it of greater advantage to the government in enforcing the law, to leave the Indian who might succeed in purchasing liquor in Alaska free to testify in the courts against the seller thereof, than to punish the Indian for purchasing or offering to purchase the same.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the complaint.

JAMES HENRY, Resp't.,
v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.

(— Wash. —, 131 Pac. 812.)

Telegraph — altered message — notice of error.

1. A sheep buyer receiving a quotation

Note. — Measure of damages where one purchases goods in reliance upon a misquotation of price in telegram.

The measure of damages in HENRY v. WESTERN U. TELEG. CO., namely, the differ-of prices by telegram, varying 80 cents per hundredweight between January 1st and February 1st deliveries, is not, as matter of law, chargeable with notice that there is error in the lower price, at least, where he had refused to purchase at the price named in the message tendered for transmission.

Damages — altered telegram — price quotations.

2. A sheep buyer who contracts for sheep on the faith of prices at price quotations in a telegram which was altered during ence between the price the plaintiff was compelled to pay in consequence of the error and the market price, at least if taken with the qualification that the recovery shall in no case exceed the difference between the price paid and the amount which, in consequence of the error, the plaintiff supposed he was to pay, seems to be clearly correct as applied to a case where there was a resale after learning of the mistake, with a profit or without a loss, and even as applied to a case where the resale was at a loss, if the purchase was made for the purpose of filling a contract for resale previously made by the plaintiff, though in the latter case it is not necessarily the market price at the date of the purchase that is to be regarded.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Spivey, 98 Tex. 308, 83 S. W. 364, where the amount which the principal authorized his agent to offer for a stock of goods was raised in transmission, it was held that the measure of damages was the difference between the price paid and the value of the goods purchased, not to exceed the difference between the authorized price and the paid price. It is stated in this case that there was no proof that the stock of goods could have been purchased for less than the amount actually paid for them.

So, in Jackson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. — Mo. App. —, 156 S. W. 801, where the price which the plaintiff's agent was authorized to pay for wool was raised in transmission, the court said that it perceived no good reason why the measure of damages should not be the difference between the market value of the thing purchased and the higher price paid because of the error in transmission.

And the rule is not affected by the fact that an actual profit was realized by a resale of the property. HENRY v. WESTERN U. TELEG. CO. and Jackson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. supra.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 56 L.R.A. 741, 39 S. E. 443, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 254, where the plaintiff purchased eggs in reliance on a telegram which as delivered understated the price, the court said that the record disclosed an entire failure on the part of the plaintiff to prove the amount of his damages, that there was no evidence as to the prices at which the eggs were resold and no evidence that if the telegram had been properly transmission may hold the company liable for the difference between the price which he is compelled to pay under his contract and the market price plus the cost of sending the message, although he is not shown to have ultimately suffered loss in the transaction.

Evidence — market value — how determined.

3. To determine the damages to be paid by a telegraph company for error in transmitting a message quoting prices on sheep, their market value may, where there was mitted the plaintiff would have received more for the eggs than he did receive.

In Stewart, M. & Co. v. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. 131 Ga. 31, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 692, 127 Am. St. Rep. 205, 61 S. E. 1045, it is held that the recovery in tort by the addressee of a telegram for a negligent mistake of the telegraph company in increasing the price at which he is directed to buy goods, where he buys them in good faith at the increased price, in accordance with the message, is the amount of the damages that proximately result to him from the purchase, but the case does not otherwise pass upon the measure of damages.

In De Rutte v. New York, A. & B. Electric Magnetic Teleg. Co. 1 Daly, 547, it appeared that through error in transmitting a telegram plaintiff was led to purchase a cargo of grain at an increased price and charter a vessel, but, upon discovering the mistake before the vessel sailed, he sold the grain at a loss and disposed of the charter party, and it was held that the loss sustained was the proper measure of damages.

In Wolf Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 129, it appeared that the price named in a telegram from the manufacturer of certain machinery was made the basis of a contract between the receiver of the telegram and a third person, and by mistake in transmitting the telegram the price announced was considerably less than that originally stated by the sender, and it was held that the telegraph company was liable to the receiver of the telegram for the difference between the amount actually and necessarily paid for the machinery, in order to make good his contract, and the amount stated in the telegram as delivered by the telegraph company as the cost of the machinery.

Some of the cases seem to hold or at least assume that the measure of damages is the difference between the amount paid and the amount which the plaintiff, in consequence of the error, supposed he was to pay. It seems clear, however, that while that difference may properly be regarded as the maximum recovery in any case, and in some cases, e. g., where the market price was less than the amount the plaintiff supposed he was to pay, represents mathematically the actual amount that should be recovered, it does not give the true general measure of damages, at least unless it appears that a contract of resale was made before the discovery of the error at a price based upon no market where they were located, be determined by the ruling price at the nearest market, less cost of getting them there and the probable shrinkage in transportation.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for mistake in the transmission of a telegram. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

the mistaken quotation. If it did, the plaintiff might in consequence of the mistake make a large profit, or avoid a large loss or a pre-existing contract of sale, which could not have been realized or avoided but for the mistake. In other words, it might enable him to realize a dream of profit engendered solely by the mistake of the telegraph operator.

In some of the cases referred to, the question was really whether the plaintiff could recover at all, rather than the amount of recovery, and in some, so far as the report shows, the amount paid and the amount plaintiff supposed he was to pay are the only data bearing on the measure of damages.

Thus, in Western U. Tele. Co. v. McCants, — Miss. —, 46 So. 535, where it merely appeared that the principal authorized his agent to purchase cotton at 9½ cents per pound, but by mistake the telegram was made to read 9¼ cents per pound, it seems to have been assumed, without discussion, that the measure of damages was ½ of a cent per pound. This would doubtless be the correct measure of damages on the assumption that the plaintiff would not have made the purchase but for the mistake, and that he sustained a loss equal or exceeding ½ of a cent per pound, or upon the assumption that cotton could have been purchased at 9½ cents per pound even though he may have made a profit on the resale; or perhaps on the assumption that the mistake deprived him of an opportunity to make a resale of the cotton at an advance of ½ of a cent per pound over the true price.

So, in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Dubois, 128 Ill. 248, 15 Am. St. Rep. 109, 21 N. E. 4, it was held that a restaurant keeper who was induced to purchase a quantity of fruit which he otherwise would not have purchased but for the erroneous transmission of a telegram, whereby he was led to believe that the price was less than in fact quoted by the seller, was entitled to recover the difference between the price that he was compelled to pay and that mentioned in the telegram. The amount of recovery in this case was small, and the court probably did not attempt to define the measure of damages with the accuracy that would have 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. George H. Fearons, and Hughes, McMicken, Dovell, & Ramsey, for appellant:

The discrepancy as to the price for January delivery between the telegram of December 7th and the telegrams of December 3d and 5th was such as to put any reasonable man upon notice that a possible error existed.

Western U. Tele. Co. v. Wright, 18 Ill. App. 337, Gray, Communication by Tele. § 76.

Even if misled, he cannot recover any sum other than the amount paid for sending the telegram, unless he proves by a fair pre-been appropriate in a case involving a larger amount. Perhaps the amount allowed might be sustained as a prima facie measure of damages, in the absence of any evidence as to what the fruit was worth to the plaintiff or as to what he could have sold it for.

In some cases where the amount allowed was just equal to the difference between the amount paid and the amount which the plaintiff supposed he was to pay, the result, upon the facts at least, may be reconciled with the rule stated at the beginning of the note, for the reason that the market value was equal to, or less than, the amount the plaintiff supposed he was to pay.

Thus, in Turner v. Hawkeye Tele. Co. 41 Iowa, 458, 20 Am. Rep. 605, where the plaintiff was allowed to recover the difference between the price paid for grain and the amount named in an incorrect market report furnished by a telegraph company; it appeared that the plaintiff purchased for the purpose of meeting a contract for future delivery, and that before the expiration of the time of that contract he could have purchased the grain for even less than the price named in the false report upon which he acted.

In Western U. Tele. Co. v. Bradford, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 392, 114 S. W. 686, where the plaintiff, in reliance on the telegraph company's erroneous quotations of the market price, bought grain to meet a contract for future delivery previously made by him, the trial court instructed the jury that the measure of damages was the difference between the amount the plaintiff paid for the grain and the lowest amount at which he could have purchased the grain between the date of the purchase and the date at which he must make good on his contract of resale, not lower, however, than the prices quoted in the telegram. The appellate court, however, said that the instruction was erroneous and the true measure of damages was the difference between the erroneous prices quoted and the correct or real prices on the date the quotation was made. As it appeared in this case that before the expiration of the time for filling the contract of resale, the market prices of the grain fell below the prices quoted in the telegram, it would seem that ponderance of the evidence that the purchase of the Maurer sheep for January delivery resulted in an actual loss to him.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 56 L.R.A. 741, 39 S. E. 443, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 254; Muser v. Magone, 155 U. S. 240, 249, 39 L. ed. 134, 138, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77.

Messrs. John E. Ryan and Grover E. Desmond, for respondent:

The issue of contributory negligence was purely a question for the jury.

Strong v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 18 Idaho, 380, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 409, 109 Pac. 910, Ann. Cas. 1912 A, 55; Tobin v. Western U.

Teleg. Co. 146 Pa. 375, 28 Am. St. Rep. 802, 23 Atl. 324; Garrett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 83 Iowa, 257, 49 N. W. 88; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Beals, 56 Neb. 415, 71 Am. St. Rep. 682, 76 N. W. 903; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Virginia Paper Co. 87 Va. 418, 12 S. E. 755.

There was in fact an actual loss sustained by respondent, because there was an actual purchase at a higher price than respondent would have been compelled to pay if the message had been properly transmitted and delivered.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 56 L.R.A. 741, 39 S. E. 443, 10

the measure of damages given by the trial court, if correctly applied, would have produced the same result as the measure given by the appellate court. As a precedent, the measure given by the trial court seems preferable, since it avoids the implication inherent in that given by the appellate court, that there could be a recovery of the difference between the correct or real price and the erroneous prices quoted, even though the market prices never fell as low as the quoted prices.

In Hays v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 S. 16, 67 L.R.A. 481, 106 Am. St. Rep. 731, 48 S. E. 608, 3 Ann. Cas. 424, where a telegram purporting to give the market price of different sizes of mules by a mistake in transmission, quoted one size at $10 less per head than the actual price, it was held that the plaintiff, who purchased a number of mules in reliance thereon, could recover from the telegraph company an amount equal to $10 per head.

In this case, however, it appeared that but for the mistake the plaintiff could, and would, have purchased smaller mules, which were worth practically the same on the resale market, for the amount erroneously stated in the telegram as the price of the larger mules which he did purchase. Although the opinions in both cases were written by the same judge, the importance of the feature just alluded to in connection with the Hays Case seems to have been overlooked when upon the supposed authority of that case, it was held in Bowie v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 78 S. C. 424, 59 S. E. 65, that where the plaintiff having purchased flour in reliance upon a telegram underquoting the price immediately, before learning of the mistake, resold at an apparent profit of 10 cents per barrel over the quoted price, he was entitled to recover from the telegraph company an amount equal to the difference between the price stated in the telegram and the price he was obliged to pay (it being held under the evidence that the latter price represented the market value). It will be observed that the measure of damages thus applied not only made the plaintiff good for the loss of 20 cents per barrel due to the mistake, but also gave him the 10 cents per barrel profit which he would have realized if he could have bought flour at the price stated in the telegram. But there was nothing to show that he could have purchased the flour, or other flour that would have answered his purpose equally well, at that price, and in that respect the case differed from the Hays Case. The case of an action by the buyer against a seller for breach of contract is not analogous, since in that case the buyer has a contract right to receive the goods at the price named in the contract, whereas in case of an erroneous quotation in a telegram he has merely a mistaken belief that they can be purchased at the price named therein. It will be observed that in the Bowie Case, however, the plaintiff resold the flour at a price, apparently based on the mistaken quotation, after the receipt of the telegram and before the discovery of the mistake, and the measure of damages allowed by the court may, perhaps, be sustained upon the assumption that, if the price had been correctly quoted, he could, and would, have sold the flour at an advance of 10 cents per barrel over the real price. This theory, however, only applies to a case where the contract of resale is made after, and in reliance upon, the telegram, and before the discovery of the mistake, and it cannot be properly applied to a case like the Bradford Case, supra, where such contract was made before the receipt of the telegram, and was therefore not influenced by the mistaken quotation.

In T. P. Sims & Sons v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 89 S. C. 237, 71 S. E. 783, where it appeared that a telegram by mistake stated the price of flour at $5 per barrel, instead of $5.50, and, in reliance upon the telegram, plaintiff accepted the offer and resold the flour at $5.50 per barrel, it was held, in reliance on the Bowie Case, that he was entitled to recover from the telegraph company an amount equal to the difference between the price quoted in the telegram and the market value which was found to be the price he was obliged to pay, although that amount apparently included a net profit on the transaction. Here, as in the Bowie Case, it will be observed that the contract of resale was made after the receipt and in reliance upon the erroneous telegram.

The evidence is sufficient to establish the value of the sheep at Dillon.

Ellis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained through error in the transmission of a telegram. The plaintiff is a wholesale and retail butcher and packer in the city of Seattle, and in the conduct of his business employs live stock buyers throughout the several states of the Northwest. Among these, in the month of December, 1910, was one C. F. Walker, employed as a cattle buyer in Montana. He was not an expert sheep buyer, but in buying sheep he would report their condition and the price asked, and be guided by the plaintiff's instructions as to purchases. Early in December this buyer was directed by the plaintiff to investigate a certain band of 2,500 sheep near Dillon, Montana, referred to throughout the record as the "Maurer sheep." On December 5, 1910, Walker wired the plaintiff to the effect that these sheep could be purchased 1,000 for delivery January 1st at $4.70 a hundredweight, 1,000 February 1st at $5.30 per hundredweight, and the balance February 20th at $5.70 a hundredweight. On the next day the plaintiff answered: "Maurer sheep too high. Could not use them." On December 7th Walker delivered to the defendant's agent at Dillon for transmission to the plaintiff a message reading as follows:

Dillon, Mont., 12/7, 190—.

To James Henry, 818 Western Ave., Seattle: I contracted three loads of steers and calves at four and five delivered Jan. fifteenth Belgrade grain fed stuff. I think I can contract Maurer sheep thousand Jan. first four seventy thousand Feb. first five. Answer as soon as you get this.

C. F. Walker.

As delivered to the plaintiff at Seattle, that portion of the message referring to the sheep read: "I think I can contract Maurer sheep thousand Jan. first four twenty, thousand Feb. first five." Plaintiff, in response, wired as follows:

12/8—10.

C. F. Walker, Dillon, Montana: Contract all good cattle you can get some bulls. Get Idaho Falls Cattle. If you can get proper shrinkage buy Maurer sheep. Can't you get some good lambs also load small calves answer. James Henry.

Upon the receipt of this telegram Walker immediately entered into a contract to purchase the sheep in question at the price of $4.70 per hundredweight; the total weight of the sheep contracted for January delivery being 115,905 pounds. Walker telegraphed to plaintiff that he had bought the sheep, but as the price was not again given it was several days before the error in the transmission of the message of December 7th was discovered. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the market price of the sheep at Dillon for January 1st delivery was approximately $4.25. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $522.17; this being the difference between the market price and the price paid, plus 60 cents paid for the transmission of the message. Motions for a nonsuit, a new trial, and for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, were made at appropriate times and overruled. Judgement having been entered on the verdict, defendant appealed.

The several assignments of error are all directed to two grounds, a consideration of which will be determinative of the case:

1. It is first contended that the respondent was not misled by the error in the transmission of the telegram. As to the actual fact of deception, the respondent and his manager, who consulted and determined upon purchases, both testified, in substance, that they were misled by the erroneous telegram of December 7th; that they would not have authorized the purchase at $4.70 the hundredweight; and that when they authorized the respondent's purchaser in the field to contract for these sheep it was in the belief, induced by the telegram as received, that the purchase was being made at $4.20 a hundredweight. The appellant argues, however, that the respondent should not have been misled; that the difference between the prices stated in the two telegrams as received and the discrepancy between the price for January 1st delivery and February 1st delivery, as stated in the erroneous telegram, were so great as to put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry, and make it his duty to have the telegram repeated, or bear the consequences of his failure to do so.

This argument presents the simple question of contributory negligence as a defense. It must be determined upon the same principle as when the same question arises in other relations. Jones, Teleg. & Teleph. Cos. § 314. Were these discrepancies so extraordinary as to challenge the attention and excite the caution of a man of ordinary business prudence and experience? The uncontradicted evidence shows that sheep for January delivery would be very little corn fed; that they would be practically grass-fed sheep; and that the expense of feeding to keep in fit condition for later deliveries would be much greater. The jury might easily find from this circumstance that the caution of a man of ordinary prudence would not be aroused by the wide difference in price for January 1st and February 1st deliveries contained in the erroneous telegram. Nor can we say, in view of respondent's flat refusal to purchase at the prices stated in the prior telegram, that the discrepancy in prices between the offer contained in that telegram and the later erroneous message should be held, as a matter of law, to impose notice of the error. Was it not natural that the respondent, as an ordinarily prudent man, would assume that his purchasing agent, fortified by the refusal to consider the price stated in the prior message, had succeeded in reducing the offer to what the evidence shows was about the market price for January delivery? There was obvious ground for reasonable difference of opinion on these things. The question was properly submitted to the jury, and we are concluded by the verdict. Tobin v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 146 Pa. 375, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

28 Am. St. Rep. 802, 23 Atl. 324; Garrett v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 83 Iowa, 257, 49 N. W. 88, 90; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Beals, 56 Neb. 415, 71 Am. St. Rep. 682, 76 N. W. 903, 905; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Virginia Paper Co. 87 Va. 418, 12 S. E. 755.

2. It is next contended that, assuming that he was misled, there was no competent proof that respondent was damaged. The argument is that the respondent might have made a profit on these sheep at the price actually paid; that, there being no evidence as to whether he did or not, there was no evidence that he was damaged. It seems to us that the matter of profits was not involved. The respondent did not sue for loss of profits, but for damages suffered by reason of the purchase to which he was committed through appellant's negligence. That the loss of profits could not be the correct measure of damages is demonstrated by the obvious fact that, even if it had been proven that there could have been no profit on a purchase at $4.20 a hundredweight, still the respondent would have been damaged by the purchase at $4.70 a hundredweight in just the amount in which that price exceeded the market price at the time and place of the purchase. On the other hand, if it had been proven that the sheep, as mutton, were resold by the respondent at a clear profit above the $4.70 a hundred paid, his profits would be diminished by just the excess of the price paid over the market price. His loss in either case would be the same. The message itself gave notice to the appellant that it might become the basis of a business transaction, and that a failure to properly transmit it might result in a purchase at a price greater than intended to be paid, and that in such a case, whatever the profit might be, there would be a certain loss equal to the excess of the price paid over the market price.

The only measure of damages, therefore, both free from uncertainty and speculation, and within the reasonable contemplation of the sender and the appellant when it undertook to transmit the message, was the excess of the price paid through its error over the market price of sheep at Dillon on December 7, 1909, for January delivery, plus the cost of sending the message. Nothing less would compensate the respondent; anything more would penalize the appellant. The inevitable tendency to this conclusion was emphasized by a colloquy between the court and appellant's counsel during the argument of the motion for a nonsuit. The contention was made that the respondent had made no effort to minimize the loss. The court asked: "How could he have minimized the loss? He bound himself on a written contract to take the sheep." And counsel replied: "If he had turned around and immediately sold the sheep for what he could get at the market price, he could have recovered from us the difference. As soon as he found the mistake, he could have sold them at the market, and he could have recovered his actual loss from us. If he kept them, the question is whether he can turn around and say: 'I can take care of these sheep and save myself from loss; I will keep them; I will butcher them and retail them out and save myself from a loss.' He may have done that. We don't know in this case. It is up to him to show whether he actually suffered any loss. It is not a question of whether he should be allowed to have made a profit on this transaction." We can hardly formulate a clearer demonstration than this that the certain loss determinable by the excess of the price paid over the market price, and not the speculative loss contingent upon the profits of a butchering business and the future fluctuations of the meat market, must be the true measure of damages. The minimum attained by the course suggested by counsel would be reached by exactly the same process which we hold fixes the true measure of damages. The minimum so attained is all that this measure requires the appellant to pay. That the measure above stated is the true measure is sustained both by what we conceive to be the better reasons and the more persuasive authorities. This principle, under varying conditions, is exemplified and sustained by the following decisions: Strong v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 18 Idaho, 389, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 409, 423, 109 Pac. 910, Ann. Cas. 1912 A, 55; Wallingford v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 53 S. C. 410, 31 S. E. 275, 276; Hays v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 S. C. 16, 67 L.R.A. 481, 483, 106 Am. St. Rep. 731, 48 S. E. 608, 3 Ann. Co.* 116 Mo. App. 441, 91 S. W. 976, 977; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Shotter, 71 Ga. 760, 767; Turner v. Hawkeye Teleg. Co. 41 Iowa, 458, 464, 20 Am. Rep. 605; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Landis, 9 Sadler (Pa.), 357, 12 Atl. 467, 469; United States Teleg. Co. v. Wenger, 55 Pa. 262, 267, 93 Am. Dec. 751; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Spivey, 98 Tex. 308, 83 S. W. 364, 365; Ayer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 79 Me. 403, 1 Am. St. Rep. 353, 10 Atl. 495, 498; Squire v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 98 Mass. 232, 238, 93 Am. Dec. 157; Rittenhouse v. Independent Line of Telegraph, 44 N. Y. 263, 265, 4 Am. Rep. 673.

of recovery advanced by the appellant. We have been cited to one, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 56 L.R.A. 741, 39 S. E. 443, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 254. It is not convincing. It seems to us that to measure the damages by the difference between the price paid and the sum realized on a resale at a different time and place, under different conditions, would in many cases render the telegraph company liable for a loss in excess of that traceable to its error, and in others cause the purchaser to sustain a loss traceable solely to the error in the telegram. The measure which we approve is not subject to these possibilities. Of course, if the market price was equal to or greater than that paid because of the error, there would be no loss traceable to the error; but where it is less there is an inevitable loss in just that amount, regardless of the actual profits realized through a resale by the purchaser at another time and place and under different conditions.

The contention of the appellant that there was no evidence as to the market price of sheep at Dillon, Montana, at the time of respondent's purchase is not tenable. The evidence shows, without contradiction, that the market price at Dillon at a given time would be determined by the then market prices at Portland and Chicago by deducting from the market prices at those points the freight, shrinkage, and other losses and expenses incident to transportation, amounting to about $1 on the hundredweight; Chicago and Portland being the two competing sheep markets for that part of Montana. While neither the respondent nor his business manager could recall the exact prices prevailing at Chicago and Portland on December 7, 1910, both stated that it was in the neighborhood of $5.25 a hundredweight, and both testified in substance that respondent received current Chicago and Portland quotations; that they knew these prices at that time, and then on the prices then quoted estimated that a purchase at $4.20 a hundredweight would approximate or be a little under the then market price at Dillon so determined. No evidence was offered to the contrary. This evidence was competent as tending to establish the market price of sheep at that time at Dillon, Montana. Graham v. Frazier, 49 Neb. 90, 68 N. W. 367; Rothrock v. Hunter, 66 Wash. 543, 119 Pac. 1114; 35 Cyc. 638; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1154.

The weight of this evidence was for the jury, which evidently found that the then market price at Dillon was $4.25 a hundredweight. We cannot say that the finding was not justified by the evidence.

Other claims of error are predicated upon the instructions given by the court. These, however, present the same questions which we have considered in the foregoing discussion, and it will be unnecessary to notice them further. We find no error in the instructions.

The judgment is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 2.)

B. A. KENNEDY, Appt.,
v.

SPOKANE, PORTLAND, & SEATTLE
RAILWAY COMPANY, Respnt.

Release — consideration — medical attention.

1. Medical attention furnished by an employer to an employee injured by his negligence is not a sufficient consideration to support a release of liability to make compensation for the injury.

Master and servant — injury — insufficient treatment — effect.

2. An action by a servant against his master to recover damages for injuries due to the latter's negligence is not defeated by the fact that the plaintiff did not give proper attention to his injury.

Note. — Furnishing medical attention as a consideration for release of liability for personal injuries or death.

It will be observed that the decision in KENNEDY v. SPOKANE, P. & S. R. Co. was not upon the ground that the furnishing of medical attention was not an adequate consideration for the release, but upon the ground that it constituted no consideration at all, inasmuch as the company's physician did not expect any compensation from the plaintiff, and he at no time considered that he was incurring a personal obligation therefor. In this respect the case is quite similar to Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Walker, 92 Ga. 485, 17 S. E. 604, where the reviewing court upheld the charge of the trial court to the effect that, if "the plaintiff made no agreement to pay that (medical) bill, and none is reasonable and fairly inferable or to be implied on his part to pay it," its assumption and payment by the releasee was not sufficient consideration for the release, and it would be a mere nudum pactum.

The syllabus by the court in the same case deals with the other phase of the same question in declaring that, since the injury was the result of negligence of the releasee, it was liable for the expenses of the treatment which the injury occasioned, although 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, as a defense to which defendant set up a release. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. C. Moore and Robert Corkery, for appellant:

Medical services furnished do not constitute a consideration for a release of damages.

1 Page, Contr. § 311; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 289; 34 Cyc. 1051; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Helm, 121 Ky. 645, 89 S. W. 709; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Walker, 92 Ga. 485, 17 S. E. 604.

Gratuitous services already performed do not constitute consideration for a release of damages.

Bartholomew v. Jackson, 20 Johns. 28, 11 Am. Dec. 237; Page, Contr. § 319; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 693; 9 Cyc. 358, 365.

The release was secured under a mutual mistake of fact, and by fraud, as to injuries.

Pattison v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 55 Wash. 625, 104 Pac. 825; Bjorklund v. Seattle Electric Co. 35 Wash. 439, 77 Pac. 727, 1 Ann. Cas. 443, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 139; Pederson v. Seattle Consol. Street R. Co. 6 Wash. 202, 33 Pac. 351, 34 Pac. 665, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 77; Lumley v. Wabash R. Co. 22 C. C. A. 60, 43 U. S. App. 476, 76 Fed. 66; Great Northern R. Co. v. Fowler, 69 C. C.

such was furnished at the request of the injured party, and that, consequently, the assumption of such liability was no advantage to the injured party, and was inadequate as consideration for the release.

These two cases appear to be the only ones holding that the furnishing of medical attention constituted no consideration at all. In the other cases the question was whether the consideration, including, inter alia, medical attention, was adequate or inadequate, or whether the release was executed under such circumstances as to invalidate it.

In Kelly v. Homer Compress Co. 110 La. 983, 35 So. 256; Jennings v. Ft. Worth, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 329, 26 S. W. 927; and Pederson v. Seattle Consol. Street R. Co. 6 Wash. 202, 33 Pac. 351, 34 Pac. 665, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 77, where the validity of the release was upheld, it appeared that the consideration consisted in part of medical attention. These cases are doubtless distinguishable from the KENNEDY CASE and the Walker Case, supra, in that the discharge by the releasor of the bill for medical attention relieved the releasee of an obligation that would otherwise have rested upon him.

On the other hand, in Great Northern R. Co. v. Fowler, 69 C. C. A. 106, 136 Fed. 118, the court refused to sustain a release,

A. 106, 136 Fed. 119; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Ehlert, 25 Ohio C. C. 37; Nelson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 111 Minn. 193, 126 N. W. 902, 20 Ann. Cas. 748; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Brown, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 69 S. W. 651; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Goodholm, 61 Kan. 758, 60 Pac. 1066.

Messrs. Cannon, Ferris, & Swan and W. A. White, for respondent:

Appellant failed to introduce any testimony to show that said release was not supported by an adequate consideration; the release so recites, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, consideration will be presumed.

A releasor cannot subsequently avoid his release on the ground that his injuries consideration for which, inter alia, was payment of doctors' and nurses' bills, which had been executed under a mutual mistake of fact induced by statements of the railroad company's physician, who expressed the opinion that the injuries were slight, and that plaintiff could go to work in two weeks, whereas it developed that the injuries were serious and permanent.

And also in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cunningham, 59 Kan. 722, 54 Pac. 1055, where part of the consideration was care to be given the plaintiff at a hospital, the release was held invalid as based on such terms as condemned it as a fraud and imposition, the amount paid being trifling and utterly disproportionate to any just compensation, and unseemly haste having been made in inducing the settlement.

And in Davis v. Diamond Carriage & Livery Co. 146 Cal. 59, 79 Pac. 596, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 443, an action for personal injuries resulting from the defendant's negligence, the defense was a "receipt in full of all demands," given by the plaintiff in consideration of a sum of money alleged by the plaintiff to be his wages then due and $10 on his doctor bill. The question of the sufficiency of this as consideration for the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) release was not considered, the contention of the plaintiff being that the intention of the parties was not to release all damages resulting from the injury. The court held that the intention of the parties governed the effect of the contract, implying that if the intention had been to create a release of all damages, the agreement would have been so construed. When it is considered that the court declared the jury to be warranted in finding the defendant negligent, it clearly appears that, according to the doctrine of Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Walker, supra, the paying of the doctor's bill would not have been sufficient as a consideration to support such release, and it would hardly be contended that paying plaintiff his wages then due would constitute a consideration. However, the conclusion reached was against the operation of the receipt as a release, and it was not necessary for the court to look further to find other reasons for its decision.

A note appended to Pattison v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 660, considers the necessity of return or tender of consideration for release of claim for personal injuries set aside on the ground of fraud.

Main, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The defendant corporation owns and operates a steam railway line extending from the city of Spokane, Washington, in a southwesterly direction through the states of Washington and Oregon until it reaches Portland. At a point on the line of the road known as Cliffs, in Klickitat county, Washington, it maintains a roundhouse and repair shops. On September 23, 1909, and for some time prior thereto, the plaintiff had been employed in the roundhouse in the capacity of locomotive hostler. His duties in this position were to receive the engines in the yard from the crew when they came off of the line, and take them from there into the roundhouse. On the night of September 23, 1909, at about 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, the plaintiff received an engine in the manner described and conducted it into the roundhouse. When he went aboard the engine in the yard, he ascended from the left-hand side. After getting the engine into the roundhouse, owing to the fact that there was some obstruction which prevented his easy getting down from the engine on the left-hand side, he got down on the right-hand side, and in passing down, owing to a defective step, he fell and was precipitated upon a pile of scrap iron which was on the floor of the roundhouse. The point of one piece of scrap iron penetrated his foot. The injury apparently not being serious, he continued with his work the remaining portion of that night and for five or six nights thereafter, but, the injury to the foot becoming more or less painful, and there being no physician at Cliffs, or medical supplies, he went to Stevensburg, which was about 45 miles distant, and consulted the company's doctor located at that point. The doctor here dressed the foot and kept him under treatment for about ten days, when he, the doctor, then advised him to go to Portland to see the company's head physician. In going to Portland the plaintiff stopped off at Vancouver to consult with the master mechanic relative to his returning to work, and was there informed, according to his testimony, that it would be necessary first for him to go into the offices in Portland and fix up some papers. He went to Portland and went to the company's offices, and there saw the claim agent, also the company's head physician, and was presented by the claim agent with a written release of damages, with the request that he sign the same, which he did. This release recites: "That, in consideration of medical and surgical attention furnished to me by the Spokane, Portland, & Seattle Railway Company, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I have released, acquitted, and discharged, and do by these presents release, acquit, and discharge, said railway company, its successors and assigns, of and from any and all liability, causes of action, costs, charges, claims, or demands of every nature and description, in any manner arising or growing out of, or to arise or grow out of, personal injuries received by me, B. A. Kennedy, while working as hostler at or near Cliffs, Washington, on or about the 23d day of September, 1909, while getting off engine 462 in roundhouse, slipped on account of defective step and injured right foot, which became infected." It will be noted that this release specifies, as a consideration for the signing thereof by the plaintiff, "medical and surgical attention furnished."

After leaving Portland, the plaintiff returned to Vancouver, where he was told by the master mechanic that they had no work for him, and gave him transportation to Spokane, saying that when they had work they would send for him. While the plaintiff was at Spokane, his foot became in a greatly inflamed condition, which finally resulted in an operation and the removal of a portion of the foot. Thereafter the plaintiff brought this action for damages. The cause in due time came on for trial before the court and a jury. When the plaintiff had rested his case, the defendant challenged the legal sufficiency of the evidence upon two grounds: First, that the injury to the plaintiff's foot was due to his own neglect of the wound which he received; and, second, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover because he had executed a release of damages. The challenge was sustained by the trial court, and the case dismissed. From which judgment the plaintiff appeals.

Did the medical services furnished by the defendant's physician to the plaintiff constitute a consideration for the release? It is apparently a fair inference, though there is no positive evidence to that effect, that the company's physicians for the services rendered did not expect compensation from the appellant therefor; neither did he at the time the services were rendered, or thereafter, consider that he was incurring a personal obligation therefor. The release recited that the consideration therefor was medical and surgical attention furnished by the Spokane, Portland, & Seattle Railway Company.

If the rendition of these services by the physician, and the acceptance of them by the appellant, did not create the relation of debtor and creditor between them, then the services would not be a consideration for the release. In other words, if they were rendered under such circumstances that a recovery could not have been had for them in an action against the appellant, then they would be insufficient as a consideration.

In Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. vol. 6, p. 693, it is said: "A person cannot make another his debtor by the rendering of voluntary services, and, as such services impose no liability upon the person for whose benefit they are rendered, they cannot be a consideration for his subsequent promise to pay for them. But, on the other hand, from the statement of the rule it follows that, when the thing given or done imposes a liability upon the promisor, it is a sufficient consideration for his subsequent promise to discharge it."

It was not contended in the trial court, neither is it urged here, that the evidence fails to make out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the respondent which produced the original injury.

When negligence is once established, the person or corporation being guilty thereof becomes liable for the expenses incurred for medical attention and physician's services. And, on the hypothesis that there was negligence which produced the original injury, the services of a physician, being an element of legal liability, would not be a consideration for the release of damages.

In Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. vol. 24, p. 289, the author states the rule thus: "Payment of doctor's fees by the company inflicting the injuries is no consideration for the employee's release; the company being liable for expenses which the injuries occasioned."

In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Walker, 92 Ga. 485, 17 S. E. 604, in the syllabus written by the court, it is said: "Where a railroad company negligently inflicts a personal injury on one of its employees, and thereupon has him treated for the injury by the company's surgeon, a payment made by the company to the surgeon, even at the employee's request, is no consideration for a release by the employee to the company for all damages occasioned by the injury; the company being liable for expenses of treatment which the injury occasioned."

In the second place, it is urged that the appellant's condition is due to his own neglect of the original injury, and therefore he cannot recover. But this is an argument which goes to the amount of the recovery rather than to the right to recover. And the neglect of the appellant, if he did neglect the wound after the injury was inflicted, would not support a judgment of dismissal.

The case will be reversed and remanded for new trial.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

FRANCIS QUINN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
STATE OF WISCONSIN.

(153 Wis. 573, 142 N. W. 510.)

Rape — assault with intent — intoxicated woman.

1. That a woman arranges by telephone to meet a man upon the street, and after meeting him drinks intoxicating liquor and permits familiarities from him, does not per se show consent to sexual intercourse, so as to prevent his attempt to secure it at a time when she is intoxicated to a state of insensibility from being an assault with intent to rape, especially when he denies the attempt.

Appeal — omission in instruction — evidence — prejudice.

2. Omission to instruct the jury that, to be guilty of rape by intercourse with an intoxicated woman, accused must have knowledge of her intoxicated condition, is not prejudicial error where the evidence discloses that he himself had brought about her intoxicated condition.

Note. — Giving liquor or drugs to female with view to having sexual intercourse with her as constructive rape or assault with intent to commit rape.

A necessary ingredient of the crime of rape is the use of force, but that the force necessary to the commission of the crime need not be actual, but may be constructive, is the practically unanimous opinion of the authorities; and the same unanimity of Rape — assault with intent — producing intoxication.

3. One who gives intoxicating liquor to a woman with the intention of putting her in a condition of insensibility, so that she has no power of opposing sexual intercourse, and of then having intercourse with her, is guilty of assault with intent to rape.

Criminal law — failure to instruct — absence of evidence.

4. Failure to charge upon the effect of absence of outcry is immaterial in a trial for assault with intent to rape, where the victim was in a state of insensibility produced by intoxication.

Appeal — failure to charge — circumstantial evidence.

5. It is not reversible error to refuse a charge on circumstantial evidence in a prosecution for assault with intent to rape, if no issue in the case depends entirely upon such evidence.

opinion prevails, that this constructive force exists where intoxicating liquors or drugs are administered for the purpose of rendering a woman unconscious, so that sexual connection may be had without her consent.

As was said in Reg. v. Sweeney, 8 Cox, C. C. 223: "Force actual or constructive is an essential element in the crime of rape; that any mode of overpowering the will without actual personal violence, such as the use of threats or drugs, is force in the estimation of law; and that any degree of force is sufficient in law to constitute the crime of rape, if it is sufficient in fact to overcome the opposing will of the woman, but it must be force employed to overcome the will."

And again where sleep in a woman is induced by the use of drugs, the will might justly be said "to have been overcome with a view to the possession of her person without her consent, just as in the case where, through fear and dread by threats of death, the woman has been thrown into a state of prostration, or as when through such threats, or through actual personal violence at the first meeting of the parties, she has been thrown into a swoon and then her person ravished."

And also the "drugging to the extent of insensibility is even less remote from direct personal violence than presenting a pistol to the forehead, or a dagger to the breast, for such drugging overpowers the will by means of physical appliances to the body (no matter whether to the stomach internally, or by chloroform or the like externally), just as much as if the insensibility had been produced by a blow. That the woman, by deception or persuasion, may have been made the instrument of introducing into her own stomach the deleterious ingredient, or may have been induced to allow the man to hold chloroform to her nostrils, does not make the resulting insensibility less an act of physical violence and injury to the person, than if the man had ERROR to the Walworth County Court to review a judgment convicting defendant of assault with intent to rape. Affirmed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

The plaintiff in error prosecutes a writ of error to review a judgment sentencing him to confinement in the state reformatory at Green bay for the crime of assault with the intent to commit rape upon one Agnes Secquist.

The crime is alleged to have been committed on the 22d day of February, 1912, in the city of Whitewater. Agnes Secquist was eighteen years of age in June, 1911. She had resided at La Crosse with her father up to August, 1909, when she had been committed to the industrial school for girls at Milwaukee, where she remained until September, 1911, at which time she induced her to take into her own hands a machine which immediately exploded and left her stunned and helpless."

An early English case which is a leading one in that country on the question under annotation, and which has been cited extensively by the courts in this country, is Reg. v. Camplin, 1 Car. & K. 746, 1 Cox, C. C. 220, 1 Den. C. C. 89. In that case there was a conviction of rape where accused got the prosecutrix drunk, and while she was in a state of insensibility violated her, though the evident purpose of accused in giving her the liquor was to excite in her an uncontrollable desire for sexual intercourse, and not to render her insensible, and then to have intercourse with her. The court, in pronouncing sentence, said that the young woman upon whose person the offense was committed refused her consent so long as she had sense or power to express such want of consent; but that when made quite insensible by the administration of liquor to her, and while she was in a state of insensibility, accused took advantage of it and violated her person; that the only ground upon which any doubt could possibly arise on this state of facts was that the jury found that the liquor was given for the purpose of exciting her and then having sexual intercourse with her, and not for the purpose of rendering her insensible. But the court was of the opinion that the evidence that rape was committed without the consent and against the will of the prosecutrix was sufficient, and consequently that the offense had been completely proved, because the prosecutrix showed, by her words and conduct up to the very latest moment at which she had any sense or power to express her will, that it was against her will that intercourse should take place. And it was by accused's illegal act alone, that of administering liquor to her to incite her to consent to his unlawful desire, that she was deprived of the power of continuing to express such want of consent. Whatever the was paroled and put into the home of Ralph Tratt, a farmer residing near the city of Whitewater. It is shown that she had led a wayward life and was insubordinate to parental control, and therefore had been committed to the industrial school. She was informed that she was paroled upon condition of good behavior, and that she must refrain from communicating and associating with men. It appears that she violated this condition, and that she soon began to call up men and boys by phone, secretly, and planned to have them call for and meet her. She learned of the defendant by telephone communication under the name of Frank Johnson, in January, 1912, and thereafter they repeatedly communicated by telephoning. They first met on Sunday, February 18th, on the city streets, pursuant to a telephone call by her at the saloon of one Kraft, where she had been in the habit of calling him. After meeting him they made an unsuccessful attempt to go to this saloon to secure something to drink, and after spending some time on the street, they upon parting exchanged kisses in the street, and she went home.

On February 22d she called defendant on the phone at Kraft's saloon and arranged original intention was in giving her the liquor, accused knew that it was calculated in its natural consequences to make her insensible, and he knew also that it had produced that effect upon her at the time he took advantage of her insensibility, and therefore the case fell within the description of those cases in which force and violence constituted the crime, but in which fraud is held to supply the want of both.

And in the later case of Reg. v. Page, 2 Cox, C. C. 133, it was said that the effect of the decision in the Camplin Case was that where the state of unconsciousness is caused by an act of the accused, connection with the woman while in such state would constitute rape. Alderson, B., in commenting on the judgment in the Camplin Case, stated that he had concurred in that judgment at the time only on the ground that, though the taking of the wine was the voluntary act of the girl, yet it was offered to her by the accused, and there was evidence that he had induced her to take it.

The Camplin Case, it will be seen, turned in great measure, if not wholly, upon the wrong conduct of the accused, for the purpose of obtaining the woman's consent, by which he deprived her of the power of refusal and resistance which she had manifested up to the time of becoming insensible.

In Reg. v. Ryan, 2 Cox, C. C. 115, it was said that one who has connection with a girl who is in a state of utter unconsciousness, whether occasioned by his act or otherwise, is guilty of rape.

It will be seen from these English decisions that they are in harmony with QUINN v. STATE, and so also are the American cases which have considered this question.

As in Harlan v. People, 32 Colo. 397, 76 Pac. 792, a verdict of assault with intent to rape was sustained by evidence that chloroform was administered for the purpose of so stupefying a woman that the act could be accomplished without her resistance.

And also in State v. Hairston, 121 N. C. 579, 28 S. E. 492, it was held that one who gets a female drunk for the purpose of having carnal intercourse with her is guilty of rape.

In Com. v. Childs, 2 Pittsb. 395, in the charge to the jury the court said: "If a man, by giving a woman drugs or liquors, renders her insensible, and then has connection with her in that condition, it is rape, although his original intention was simply to excite criminal desires for the purpose of more easily persuading her to consent to the act, and not with the purpose of rendering her insensible and having connection with her in that state."

And in Com. v. Burke, 105 Mass. 377, 7 Am. Rep. 531, in affirming a conviction of rape where one had carnal intercourse with a woman he knew to be so drunk as to be utterly senseless and incapable of consenting, though in this case the liquor was not given by the defendant, the court said that the crime is rape where a man has carnal intercourse with a woman without her consent while she is, as he knows, wholly insensible so as to be incapable of consenting, and with such force as is necessary to accomplish the purpose. That if it were otherwise, any woman in utter stupefaction whether caused by drunkenness, sudden disease, the blow of a third person, or drugs which she had been persuaded to take even by the man himself, would be unprotected from personal dishonor.

In Territory v. Edie, 6 N. M. 555, 30 Pac. 851, where by statute rape is committed when "resistance is prevented by stupor or weakness produced by an intoxicating, narcotic, or anesthetic agent administered by or with the privy of defendant," it was held that it was a question of fact for the jury as to what extent prosecutrix, a girl of fifteen, was affected by the use of wine given her by accused, and, further, that it was not error to instruct the jury upon the degree of stupor or extent of weakness essential for her to prove in order to warrant conviction.

In Texas, where the offense is committed by administering to a woman, without her knowledge or consent, some substance producing unnatural sexual desire, or such stupor as prevents or weakens resistance, the offense is rape by fraud.

And so it has been held that the use of chloroform as a means of accomplishing the purpose comes within the meaning of fraud, and it cannot be construed as force with him to meet him near the home where she was staying. After having put the children to bed, she and the hired man of Mr. Tratt went to meet the defendant at the place suggested; they saw the defendant and Hughes coming along the middle of the street; the hired man then went home, and she went to meet the two men. When they met she put her arm about Quinn and kissed him. Quinn introduced Hughes to her as George Miller; she knew that this man introduced to her as Miller was not one Carlson, whom she had requested the defendant to bring with him. She and Hughes saluted by kissing, and the defendant then produced a bottle and asked her to drink, which she declined, stating that she had already had two drinks of Canadian rye and some Miller's high life, but in fact she had drunk neither, and did not know what Canadian rye was. She took a drink from the bottle, filling her mouth and then swallowing it; it was strong, and she could hardly swallow it; she then returned the bottle to the defendant, who gave it to Hughes, who took a drink, and the defendant then took a drink and put the bottle in his pocket; they walked eastward toward town; she calculated to walk as far as Hall's, where Mr. and Mrs. Tratt were.

to sustain an indictment for assault with intent to rape. Milton v. State, 23 Tex. App. 204, 4 S. W. 574; Ford v. State, 41 Tex. Crim. Rep. 270, 96 Am. St. Rep. 787, 53 S. W. 846.

The court in the Ford Case said that where the party attempting the rape uses some substance producing unnatural sexual desires, or such stupor as prevents or weakens resistance, he would be guilty of rape provided he had sexual intercourse with the female while she was under the influence of such substance; and using such means, but failing in the ultimate design, he would be guilty of an attempt to commit rape by fraud.

And in the Milton Case, that an assault with intent to rape can be established only by proof of force or attempted force. This offense cannot be committed by means of threats or fraud; the offense of attempting to commit rape may, however, be committed by the use of such means.

The California statute provides that "rape is an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, under either of the following circumstances," among which is the administration of intoxicating or narcotic substances, and so, in People v. Crosby, 17 Cal. App. 518, 120 Pac. 441, it was held that a verdict of guilty of rape will be sustained where the evidence tends to show that the failure to make resistance or outcry was due to the fact that the prosecutrix was drugged by a narcotic placed in wine by the accused, and that she was weak and dizzy.

And also in People v. O'Brien, 130 Cal. 1, 62 Pac. 297, by the administration of intoxicating liquor.

In People v. Snyder, 75 Cal. 323, 17 Pac. 208, it was contended that the indictment under such a statute must set out the means by which the offense was committed, and that charging it to have been committed by force is insufficient; but it was held that an indictment charging the crime to have been committed by force, violence, etc., will be sustained by evidence that it was committed by means of an intoxicating or narcotic substance administered by accused, as any matters mentioned in the statute as a means by which the act may be committed are included in the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) words "by force and violence, and against her will," and "did felonious ravish," and so such facts could be proved as fully under the statute as they could formerly at common law.

And to the same effect is People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 61 Pac. 776, which follows, as authority on this question, People v. Snyder, supra.

And it has been held that a distinction should be made between a case where the drug or liquor is given for the purpose merely of creating an uncontrollable desire for sexual intercourse, so assent will be readily given, and cases where it is for the purpose of rendering the woman incapable either to assent or resist.

Thus, in State v. Lung, 21 Nev. 209, 37 Am. St. Rep. 505, 28 Pac. 235, it was held that an attempt to administer cantharides to a woman with the purpose of creating in her an uncontrollable desire for sexual intercourse is not an attempt to commit rape, where there is no offer or effort to have sexual connection. And it was said that, even though a man intended to have connection with a woman, and believed that the operation of such a drug would materially assist in accomplishing his purpose by inducing her to consent, it would not, even if he was successful, be rape.

The court said that, to constitute rape where there is no actual force used, the woman must have been unconscious or unable fairly to comprehend the nature and consequences of the sexual act. It must necessarily go thus far, or else there is no distinction between rape where the force used is constructive, and seduction. Anything which may excite the woman's passion, leaving her at the same time in the full possession of her mental and physical power, capable of comprehending the nature of the act, and of exercising her own volition in the matter, is classed rather among the arts of the seducer, than the weapons of him who would destroy female virtue by force. And the court pointed out that in Reg. v. Camplin, 1 Car. & K. 746, 1 Cox, C. C. 220, 1 Den. C. C. 89, the crime was held to be rape only because accused had taken advantage of prosecutrix's unconscious condition.

J. H. B.

They stopped at times on their way and drank, when they reached the Normal school they stopped and drank and embraced and kissed. Then she thought that she saw some persons coming and feared that they would recognize her and suggested that they turn north on Graham street; she remembered nothing of any drinking on this street, and of no insult to her by either of the men. They then left Graham street, crossed Main street to Hall's residence, and saw Mrs. Tratt through a window, and from there they went to Center street, where she offered to go home, and the defendant suggested, and started ahead, to get some more whisky, and she and Hughes followed him to a large building where there was a light on the street corner; she feared that they would be seen by others, and she and Hughes walked to the middle of the block on the side street, where they stopped, and Hughes embraced and kissed her, proposing that she treat him right, and she declined to do so, understanding full well what he meant. When Quinn returned, he whistled and came across the street, and they then walked down Center street homeward. They drank at the Esterly schoolhouse, from the fresh bottle which Quinn had procured, until it was empty. She drank freely, and as much or more than the men; while at this school they embraced and kissed; but neither of the men made an indecent proposal there; the last she remembers at this point was that she suggested going home, and that she could not walk; they crossed the Esterly school yard to the side street leading to the Normal school. She remembers they were carrying her, but does not remember walking on the walk; at the Normal school her impressions were vague, but she had an impression of passing a large building with lights in it, and that she fell down and was carried, and recalls being in bed in a strange place and of seeing Dr. Miller, whom she had seen at Tratt's home. She testifies to having no recollection of having, or of anyone attempting to have, sexual intercourse with her.

The defendant Quinn was then twenty-five years old, living with and supporting his mother at Whitewater, and had been a factory worker for three years immediately preceding this day. The evidence discloses that he was a liquor drinker. Hughes was twenty-six years old, and had been married for two years; he and his wife were living with her mother. Hughes was arrested and jointly informed against with the defendant; but demanded a separate trial, which was awarded him. The men's version of the transactions of the evening after meeting Agnes Secquist, as to their walking on the streets, drinking of liquor, and the conversation they had, is in substantial accord, except as to what occurred between Hughes and Agnes Secquist when Quinn left them on the Esterly school grounds, while he procured the second bottle of liquor and returned thereto, and as to what occurred between her and defendant when Hughes first left them on the Normal school grounds and returned, at which time Hughes testified he observed them as he approached, and saw defendant on top of her, in the position of having sexual intercourse with her; that after defendant arose, he saw her lying on her back, her legs stretched out, and her garments raised up to her waist; that she was in a condition of stupor and unconsciousness; that she made no effort to put her clothes down to cover the exposed parts of her person; and that he, after the defendant spoke suggesting to him to help himself, pulled up one of her stockings, which had come down, and she said, "Stop that;" and that he then pulled her clothes down to cover her, and to him she appeared unconscious, and as if she knew nothing. It appears that she could not walk nor give intelligible replies to inquiries when found by others immediately after she was left by the defendant and Hughes; and that she was in a maudlin stupor, the result of alcoholic liquors.

The defendant denies that he had, or attempted to have intercourse with her at any time on the occasion in question, and denies that he was in the position on her as testified by Hughes, or that he did or said anything tending to show he was guilty of outraging her, as is alleged and claimed by the state.

The jury found that defendant assaulted her with intent to commit the crime of rape, and upon this verdict the court adjudged the defendant guilty of this crime, and sentenced him to two years' confinement in the state reformatory. This judgment is before us for review.

Mr. D. S. Tullar, with Messrs. E. T. Cass and Henry Lockney, for plaintiff in error:

Stiebecker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant contends that the evidence fails to establish the fact of his guilt of the crime charged in the information, and that the court erred in refusing to direct a verdict of not guilty. The grounds for this contention are that the evidence affirmatively shows that the defendant did not assault Agnes Secquist as alleged, and that the defendant and she, from the time they met on the evening in question, had an understanding by which she consented to sexual intercourse, and hence the essential elements of the crime were not proven. The finding of the jury that the defendant committed an assault upon her is abundantly supported by the positive and circumstantial evidence of the case. The jury were fully justified to find this fact from the evidence of Hughes, the parties at the Normal school, and all of the details of what took place there, and the defendant's conduct as regards giving her the liquor, shown by his evidence and that of the girl and Hughes. Whether such an assault was made with the intent to commit rape is the serious question presented upon this branch of the case. It is insisted that Agnes Secquist's conduct from the time she communicated with the defendant on the evening of February 22d, to the time of the alleged assault on the Normal school grounds, conclusively shows that she consented to having sexual intercourse with the defendant, and that the evidence therefore fails to establish an essential element of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape. Under the facts and circumstances as disclosed by the evidence, it is important to ascertain how the fact of Agnes Secquist's intoxication affects the question of the defendant's guilt in the matter. The evidence leaves no room for argument but that the jury were warranted to find that she was intoxicated so as to be insensible and in a stupor at the time it is claimed defendant assaulted her on the Normal school grounds. Her evidence, as well as that of Hughes and others who saw her, clearly tends to show that she was in a mental stupor from alcoholic drink which made her insensible and incapable of consenting. This fact has an important bearing in characterizing the assault on her by the defendant, which the jury must be presumed to have found by their verdict. In Whittaker v. State, 50 Wis. 521, 36 Am. Rep. 856, 7 N. W. 432, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 391, in discussing the effect of intoxication as regards the element of nonconsent of the female in rape cases, it is declared: "In further explanation and palliation of this use of the word, it has been held that forcible connection with a female who is insane, or an idiot, or intoxicated so as to be insensible, or who is deceived, believing the defendant to be her husband, and in other like cases, where the will of the female does not concur with the act, or oppose it, and does not act at all, and where she has no power of consenting or dissenting, the act is said to be 'against her will,' and this necessary ingredient of rape is present. 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1142, and note a; and as in Walter v. People, 50 Barb. 144; People v. Quin, 50 Barb. 128; and Crosswell v. People, 13 Mich. 427, 87 Am. Dec. 774. In such cases it is consistent to hold that the act is 'against the will' only because it was not approved by the will, or the will did not concur with the act. In all cases where there is no sensibility or consciousness, or freedom of the will, the act is said to be against the will."

As above stated, the evidence adduced fully sustains the conclusion that Agnes Secquist was intoxicated so as to be insensible, and that if the defendant assaulted her with the intent to commit the crime of rape, she was incapable of consenting thereto, and his act must be considered in the light of her incapacitated condition of approving it by her will, and be treated as being against her will. The court fully informed the jury that the alleged assault upon her could not be found to constitute the offense of assault with intent to commit rape under the facts and circumstances adduced in evidence, unless they found beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant in fact assaulted her with such intent, and that she was so intoxicated as to be insensible and thus rendered incapable of consenting thereto. The claim that her conduct in arranging with the defendant to meet him, and her conduct after meeting him and Hughes, shows that she thereby gave her consent to sexual intercourse, cannot be considered established as a matter of law in the light of her intoxication, and his denial that he had or attempted to have intercourse with her. We therefore consider that the court properly refused to direct the jury to acquit the defendant of the charge preferred against him upon these grounds.

The court informed the jury that the crime of rape necessarily included an assault with intent to rape, and that a defendant charged with the latter offense could be convicted thereof if the jury found a rape had been committed, and proceeded by instructing them as follows: "If the testimony convinces you beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Francis Quinn, actually had sexual intercourse with Agnes Secquist at the time and place alleged, and that at the time of such intercourse the said Agnes Secquist was so intoxicated as to be incapable of either resisting or consenting to such act, then you should find the defendant guilty as charged. Or, if the testimony convinces you beyond a reasonable doubt that the witness, Agnes Secquist, on the night in question, was so intoxicated as to be incapable of either resistance or consent to sexual intercourse, and then the defendant, with knowledge that she was so incapable of either resisting or consenting, laid hands upon her with the intent then and there to have sexual intercourse with her, then you should find him guilty as charged." The first part of this portion of the charge is assailed as prejudicially erroneous because it asserts that it is not necessary that the defendant knew of her intoxicated condition to warrant a verdict of guilty. It must be borne in mind that the charge preferred against the defendant was an assault with the intent to commit rape, and that the jury were repeatedly informed that this was the offense for which the defendant was being tried. The foregoing instructions must be considered in the light of this fact and that the jury must be presumed to have acted in accordance therewith. Examining it from this view point, we do not find the instructions prejudicially erroneous, though the first part omits the element of knowledge by the defendant of her intoxication. The jury had their attention specifically directed to the necessity of finding that he must have had knowledge of her condition to authorize them to find him guilty as charged. We cannot think that the omission to bring this to their attention specifically in the first part of this portion of the charge misled them to defendant's prejudice. Furthermore, the evidence on the subject is indisputable, to the effect that defendant must have known the actual condition as to her intoxication brought about through his own acts, and hence the alleged omission complained of in the charge could not have operated to his prejudice by having any of his rights substantially affected thereby. Reg. v. Camplin, 1 Den. C. C. 89, 1 Car. & K. 746, 1 Cox, C. C. 220; Com. v. Burke, 105 Mass. 376, 7 Am. Rep. 531.

It is urged that the court erred in charging that, if defendant gave Agnes Secquist the liquor with the intention fully formed in his mind of putting her in a condition of insensibility, so that she had no power of opposing sexual intercourse with him, and with the intent then present in his mind to have such intercourse with her while in such powerless condition, then the giving of the liquor constituted an assault with intent to commit rape. The charge immediately following this instruction directed the jury that, if defendant gave her liquor for the purpose only of inducing her to submit to sexual intercourse with him, then no assault was committed in giving it to her, and he could not be held guilty of the crime charged against him. It is clear that the instruction complained of informed the jury that the giving of the liquor by the defendant constituted an assault only if it was done by him with the intent to destroy her power of resistance by reducing her to insensibility, and the present intent to have sexual intercourse with her when in that condition. Under such circumstances, the assault with intent to commit rape is complete, and we find no objection to the instruction, because it did not require that some additional force must be employed by the assailant to that involved constructively in the acts of giving her the liquor with these intents in his mind. There is no dispute but that he took the actual steps of giving her the liquor, and, since the jury found this was done with the criminal intent charged, the essentials of the offense are present. State v. Lung, 21 Nev. 209, 37 Am. St. Rep. 505, 28 Pac. 235.

It is argued that the court erred in its charge to the jury, in that it did not correctly state the law upon the question of reasonable doubt. We have examined the charge on this subject and find it substantially correct. The phraseology employed is in no way misleading to the jury, and they undoubtedly gave him the benefit of every reasonable doubt.

It is argued that the court erred in refusing to charge as requested upon the effect, in cases of this nature, of outcry or its absence by the person assaulted. Under the evidence of Agnes Secquist's condition, the instruction was immaterial, and its omission deprived the defendant of no right.

It is also argued that the refusal to give the requested charges as to circumstantial evidence was error. The evidence in the case is largely direct and positive in character, and no necessity is shown requiring the jury to resolve any issues on such evidence alone. While the instruction might, properly, have been given as requested, its rejection cannot reasonably be said to have affected any substantial right of the defendant.

We examined the case with care, and find no reversible error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

NASHVILLE, CHATTANOOGA, & ST.
LOUIS RAILWAY, Appt.,

v.

W. F. GARTH.

(— Ala. —, 59 So. 640.)

Railroad — injury to stock — statutory requirements.

1. The statute requiring a railroad com-

Note. — Duty of train men where animals are frightened by train, but are not struck by it.

As to duty of railroad employees to keep a look out for live stock on track, see note to Harris v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 858.

As to duty to give crossing signals for animals, see note to Campbell v. Mobile & O. R. Co. post, 881.

As to liability for frightening animal to death, see Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Melton, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 183, and note appended thereto.

It is the purpose of the present note to treat only those cases wherein an animal was injured on the railroad right of way while attempting to escape from a train by which it was frightened, but with which it did not come in actual contact; and as indicated in the title, includes only cases involving the duty of the train men in the premises. So far as the liability depends upon the breach of the company's statutory duty to fence its tracks, it is considered in the note in 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1181.

The general rule seems to be that, in the absence of a breach of statutory duty, a railroad company is liable for killing or injuring animals upon its right of way resulting from fright caused by the operation of its rolling stock in a negligent or wanton manner, but is not liable in the absence of such a failure to use reasonable and ordinary care. Of course, the question whether there was negligence or want of ordinary care in a particular instance depends upon the surrounding circumstances, it being impossible to lay down any general rule.

A number of attempts have been made to have cases of the class herein under discussion declared within the meaning of various statutes which modify or change the common-law rule of liability of railroads for injuries to animals, but the majority of such statutes have been held inapplicable in that there was no actual contact with the train, and that the statpany to prove care in case stock is killed or injured by its locomotive does not apply to injury to stock falling through a trestle in fleeing from a locomotive.

Same — stock on track — duty of engineer.

2. A railroad company is not liable for the death of a colt which is frightened at the approach of a locomotive and runs along the track into a trestle, if those in charge of the engine, upon seeing the animal near the track, did not wantonly or maliciously frighten it, and after it entered on the track, used due care to stop the engine, which was done before the trestle was reached, although the track was elevated a little, with water on each side of it, which might render it more difficult for the animal to leave the track.

utes contemplated only cases of injuries resulting from actual collision.

In general.

There seems to be no question but that the railroad company is liable for injuries resulting from fright caused by wanton, unnecessary, or unusual conduct upon the part of the railroad employees. Southern R. Co. v. Pool, 108 Ga. 808, 34 S. E. 141 (horse frightened by wanton, unnecessary, and unusual blowing of locomotive whistle, and ran into barbed wire fence); Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Upton, 18 Ill. App. 605 (whistle was unnecessarily and continuously sounded after passing animal, which caused it to run into unlawful fence). And it has been expressly held that the acts and conduct of the train men in operating the train, if negligent, need not necessarily be wilful and malicious, in order to render the railroad company liable. Ibid. But see Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Nye, 9 Colo. App. 94, 47 Pac. 654, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 12, wherein, in holding that a railroad company would be liable for any injuries caused by being struck by a negligently operated railroad train, the court said that an instruction to the effect that, for any injury to stock caused by running against, into, or attempting to jump a right of way fence, though caused by fright at the speed or noise of the train, or the escape of steam or smoke from the locomotive, and the noise occasioned thereby, the defendant would not be liable, "no matter in what manner it might have been operating its locomotive train,"—was held "to fairly state the law of the case."

And it is equally clear that a railroad company is liable if its servants were negligent, and the negligence was the proximate cause of the injury (see, generally, to this effect, Southern R. Co. v. Hobson, 4 Ala. App. 408, 58 So. 751; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 133 Ala. 362, 32 So. 259; Paragould Southeastern R. Co. v. Crunk, 81 Ark. 35, 98 S. W. 682; Central R. Co. v. Lindley, — Ark. —, 151 S. W. 246;

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Madison County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's colts, which were alleged to have been negligently frightened by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cooper & Cooper for appellant.

Messrs. Walker & Spragins, for appellee:

Negligence in allowing the colts to run out of their inclosure, even where it amounts to a criminal offense, cannot be regarded as a proximate cause of an injury negligently inflicted upon them by a railroad train.

Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. McAlpine, 71 Ala. 545; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Jones, 71

Ala. 487; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelsey, 89 Ala. 287, 7 So. 648.

Failure to sound the alarm or attempt to get the train under control was the cause of the injury.

Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 133 Ala. 362, 32 So. 259; Chattanooga Southern R. Co. v. Daniel, 122 Ala. 366, 25 So. 197; Chattanooga Southern R. Co. v. Wilson, 124 Ala. 444, 27 So. 486.

Simpson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the appellee for damages resulting from the fact, as alleged, that the defendant caused thirteen colts belonging to the plaintiff to become frightened by an approaching train, thereby causing them to run into a trestle on de-

Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Hudson, 62 Ga. 679; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Upton, 18 Ill. App. 605; Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. McBrown, 46 Ind. 229; Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Marsh, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 761; Ohio Valley R. Co. v. Major, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 797; Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Moore, 81 Miss. 14, 32 So. 908; Brinkley v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 126 N. C. 88, 35 S. E. 238; and Brothers v. South Carolina R. Co. 5 S. C. 55), but that no liability attaches at common law if there was no negligence (see East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Watters, 77 Ga. 69; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Buice, 88 Ga. 180, 14 S. E. 205; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Stuart, 71 Ind. 500; and Brothers v. South Carolina R. Co. 5 S. C. 55), it being sufficient if the servants of the railroad company, upon discovering animals upon its right of way, used ordinary care and prudence in so operating their trains as not to cause injury to such animals (Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Taylor, 8 Ill. App. 108).

But what constitutes negligence in the class of cases under discussion is a matter often difficult to determine, and so necessarily dependent in each instance upon the particular facts that, as before stated, general rules cannot well be deduced.

In the following cases, it was held that the particular facts did not show negligence upon the part of the company's servants in charge of the train: Thus, in Barnhart v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 97 Iowa, 654, 66 N. W. 902, it was held that the railroad company's employees were not negligent where they stopped the train at least a quarter of a mile from the bridge in which the horse was injured, and a brakeman had gone ahead to help the keeper of the animal to keep it off the bridge, and had, in fact, got ahead of the animal, but it rushed past them and into the bridge. And a similar conclusion was reached in Southern R. Co. v. Phillips, 100 Tenn. 130, 42 S. W. 925, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 610, where the train not only stopped, but the fireman went ahead and attempted to drive the animal off the track. And see Georgia 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

P. R. Co. v. Money, — Miss. —, 8 So. 846, as set out in NASHVILLE, C. & ST. L. R. Co. v. GARTH.

So, it has been held that there was no negligence which would render the railroad company liable for injuries to a horse caused by running into a railroad trestle, where the evidence showed that the train almost stopped and gave it time to escape, that the whistle was blown to frighten it off the track, and that the disaster was caused by its own obstinacy in following the track when it might have left it. Gay v. Wadley, 86 Ga. 103, 12 S. E. 298; Southern R. Co. v. Frix, 137 Ga. 607, 73 S. E. 1057.

And it has been held that there was no negligence where a horse suddenly jumped on the track and, running ahead of the train, ran into an open culvert, it appearing that the horse had opportunity to leave the track, that the engineer let off steam to scare it off the track, and, using every proper means to stop the train, did stop it before the culvert was reached. Brothers v. South Carolina R. Co. 5 S. C. 55.

And it was held in Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Taylor, 8 Ill. App. 108, that ordinary care was used where the engineer, upon discovering a horse upon the railroad right of way, slackened the speed of the train to that of an ordinary pedestrian, and so ran it for over a quarter of a mile, there being no evidence that the animal could not have left the track easily, and the engineer in fact thought it had left the track.

So, it has been held that there was no lack of reasonable care where a horse frightened at a train ran along the foot of the railroad embankment, and upon an emission of steam from the engine which, so far as the proof showed, was in the usual management of the train, left its path, which it could have pursued safely, and fell into a ditch. Lowe v. Alabama & V. R. Co. 81 Miss. 9, 32 So. 907.

But the railroad company was held liable in the following cases upon the ground that it did not use sufficient due care to prevent pendant's road, from which some of them died and others were injured.

The only eyewitness to the occurrence was the engineer, James Barrett, who testifies that the track is straight and the ground pretty level at the place in question, and that there is a fill something like 2 or 2½ feet above the natural surface of the ground; that when he first discovered the colts they were near a gate that opened out from the grazing farm onto a private road, which crosses the railroad about 250 feet from the trestle (or stock gap, as it is sometimes called); that they were 400 or 500 yards from him, "bunched together more in a playful mood than anything else;" that the gate was open; that when he first saw them at the gate, he applied the emergency brake, also the service brake, which checked the train to some extent. After he traveled a while, they started towards the track, and he applied the emergency brake at once, reversed the engine, pulled open the sand lever, and blew the whistle once; that they were about 500 feet from him when they came up to the track, and ran north in front of him; that he was traveling about 25 miles an hour, and used all the means known to skilful engineers to stop the train, and did stop it within about 200 or 225 feet of the trestle.

On cross-examination he stated that the function of the service brake is to "just steady the train and get it under control, so I could stop it if I wanted to;" that he could stop the train in about 150 to 200 horses from becoming so frightened as to jump into an illegal fence to their injury: Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Hudson, 62 Ga. 679 (speed of train not checked and short and frequent blasts of whistle given); Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Upton, 18 Ill. App. 605 (whistle unnecessarily and continuously sounded after driving horse off track).

In a number of instances an attempt to hold the railroad company liable as for negligence predicated upon the giving of signals has been made. Thus, where an animal running in front of a train was frightened off the track, and ran into a fence to its injury, by a signal given for the purpose of frightening it off, the failure to give which would have been a failure to use ordinary care, the company has been held not to be liable for the injury. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Conger, 84 Ark. 421, 105 S. W. 1177, referred to in NASHVILLE, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. GARTH (engineer let off steam); Southern R. Co. v. Puryear, 2 Ga. App. 75, 58 S. E. 306 (engineer blew stock alarm). And the same rule has been held to apply where the injury was caused by fright occasioned by the noises reasonably incident to the movements and workings of the engine, the giving, in a reasonable manner, of crossing signals and signals to employees, etc. Southern R. Co. v. Puryear, supra (statutory crossing signal); Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Marsh, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 761 (noises incident to workings of engine and signal to employees); Lowe v. Alabama & V. R. Co. 81 Miss. 9, 32 So. 907 (emitting steam in the usual management of the engine). But this rule does not hold where the signals or alarms were given in an unusual and unnecessary manner. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 57 Ark. 16, 18 L.R.A. 110, 38 Am. St. Rep. 217, 20 S. W. 545, quoted in the GARTH CASE.

In perhaps a majority of the cases, the question of the existence or nonexistence of negligence depended upon whether the servants of the railroad company were under the facts in duty bound to stop the train in an attempt to avoid the injuries.

Thus, it has been held that the train men were not guilty of negligence in not stopping the train before the frightened animal was injured, where it could not have been reasonably anticipated, as a natural or probable consequence of the failure to stop, that the animal would attempt to pass over the culvert in which it was injured instead of getting off the track as others had done. Hot Springs R. Co. v. Newman, 36 Ark. 607, followed in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Bragg, 66 Ark. 248, 50 S. W. 273, wherein a mule frightened by an approaching train ran into a culvert and was injured by a fall, and it was held that the train men were under no duty to stop the train, as they could not have foreseen, as a natural or probable consequence of the failure to stop, that the animal would go upon the trestle and be injured. And see to the same effect Ramsbottom v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 138 N. C. 38, 50 S. E. 448.

And it has been held that the engineer was under no duty to stop his train and send out a man to prevent a horse running upon a trestle, where he slackened the speed of the train to that of a person walking and so ran it for over a quarter of a mile, and there was no evidence to show that the animal could not have left the track easily, and in fact the engineer did think that the horse had left it. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Taylor, 8 Ill. App. 108.

So, where the whistle was blown and the speed of train was so slackened as to give the animal ample opportunity to leave the track, which it could easily have done, it has been held that the railroad employees fulfilled their duty, and that it was not necessary to stop the train in violation of the company's duty to its passengers, to whom it was said the company owed the first duty as regards safety and despatch, and go forward and drive the animal off the track. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Stuart, 71 Ind. 500.

And where a horse ran along by the side of the track until the train at which it had become frightened had partially passed it, and then turned off, and injured itself in some "borrow pits," it was held that the railroad company was not liable yards. Putting on the emergency brake had the effect of a sudden stop, jarring and jolting, which would be noticed by a railroad man, but not by a passenger; that, as a general rule, he blew the whistle whenever he saw stock near the track, and they usually went away, and for this reason he blew the whistle when he saw the colts; that they did not seem to be coming towards the track until he blew the whistle, and he then stopped the train as quickly as he could.

The conductor did not see the accident, but testifies to feeling the effect of the emergency brake.

The fireman testified that he was putting in coal when Barrett began blowing the whistle; that he leaned out of the window and saw the stock,—part of them coming on the track, and part running by the side of the track; that Barrett, after first applying the service brake, applied the emergency brake when the stock began to come on the track, and the train came to a standstill about 175 or 200 feet from the trestle.

James Barrett, on being recalled, explained that he meant to say that he blew the whistle 400 or 500 feet (not yards) from the crossing.

W. A. Cummings, who was baggage master, testified that he was standing in the door of the baggage car when he heard the danger whistle blow, immediately looked out, saw the colts about to enter on the track, or in the act of crossing, and felt the brakes applied immediately upon the blowing of the whistle; that it was 260 feet by for such injuries, although the engineer did not stop or check the speed of the train, it being said that the extent of the risk arising from his failure to do so was of the horse getting on the track and being injured. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Thornton, 65 Miss. 256, 3 So. 654.

But, on the other hand, where an approaching hand car so frightened a horse that it ran down the track pursued by the car, and in its fright jumped into a trestle, it was held that it was the duty of the railroad employees to stop the hand car and remove the cause of the fright, and that the failure to do so constituted negligence which rendered the company liable for the resulting injury to the horse. Southern R. Co. v. Hobson, 4 Ala. App. 408, 58 So. 751.

And that it is the duty of the train men to stop the train and remove the cause of the flight of the frightened animal, where the surroundings are such that the animal will probably continue his flight along the track and into a trestle if the train is not stopped, see Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 133 Ala. 362, 32 So. 259, as set out and quoted in NASHVILLE, C. & ST. L. R. Co. v. GARTH; Paragould Southeastern R. Co. v. Crunk, 81 Ark. 35, 98 S. W. 682, wherein a horse ran into a trestle, and the evidence tended to show that the train could have been stopped in time to avoid the resulting injury; Central R. Co. v. Lindley, — Ark. —, 151 S. W. 246, wherein a carman breached his statutory duty to keep a look out, whereas, if he had kept a look out, he would have been cognizant of facts making it his duty to stop his car so as to remove the cause of the fright of an animal which ran into a trestle; and Brinkley v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 126 N. C. 88, 35 S. E. 238, wherein it was found that the train could have been stopped in time probably to have avoided the injury.

And it has been held that the fact that the noises which frightened the injured animal were not unnecessary or unusual did not relieve the company from its duty to put an end to the cause of such fright by stopping the car, where there was time to do so and the employees knew that the surroundings were such that, if such cause was not discontinued, the animal would probably continue its flight and be injured. Southern R. Co. v. Hobson, supra.

So, where the engineer knew that horses ahead of the train could not get away from the roadbed because of barbed wire fences on the sides, and that there was a trestle in front which they could not safely cross, it was held to be his duty to stop the train until the horses could be driven out of danger, a failure to perform which rendered the company liable for injuries received by the horses in running into the trestle. Ohio Valley R. Co. Major, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 797.

And it has been held that the railroad employees were guilty of negligence rendering the company liable for injuries to an animal caused by its jumping into a trestle, where the evidence showed that the animal ran upon the track and into a cut from which it could not escape on either side, and that the train pursued the horses and continued to sound the whistle, which caused them to run into a trestle at the end of the cut, the ground being that in such case the train should have been stopped, it having been averred that it could have been stopped easily after the horses were in the cut and before they fell into the trestle. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. McBrown, 46 Ind. 229.

So, in Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Moore, 81 Miss. 14, 32 So. 908, where a railroad bicycle closely pursued a frightened horse along a track from which it could not escape, until it ran into a trestle, it was held that the jury properly found that the railroad employee failed to exercise proper care, he having seen the horse and comprehended its danger.

Under statute.

As to liability of railroad company for injury to stock other than by trains, because of breach of statutory duty to fence, see note to Jimerson v. Erie R. Co. 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1181.

Aside from the fence cases above referred to, but few decisions have involved the is-actual measurement from the place where the train stopped to the trestle.

Wm. R. Ridgway, a witness for plaintiff, who was a passenger in the rear coach, did not see the colts until the train stopped. He testified that the track was straight for about a mile; that he could not tell how long it was before the train stopped that he heard the alarm whistle; that when he got off the engine was stopped, and within 25 or 30 feet of the trestle; that there was water on both sides of the trestle, and the colts that were not injured ran on down the railroad (north) towards Huntsville; that "at the time the alarm whistle was blown that train was running at the usual speed, and ran this way for a while thereafter, and then slacked up."

Henry Strong, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that the engine was 30 or 40 feet from the trestle when it stopped, but he did not measure it, and could not say positively whether the engine had crossed the private road.

Fait E. Drake, a witness for the plaintiff, testified to hearing the whistle; could not testify as to distances, but thought the engine was about 40 feet from the trestle when it stopped, though could not say whether it had crossed the private road.

sue of the applicability of a statute which changes or modifies the common-law rule of liability, and in those at hand the ruling has been universal that they do not apply to cases where the rolling stock does not come into actual contact with the animals injured.

Thus, a statute similar in effect to that construed in NASHVILLE, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. GARTH was held not to apply to injuries to frightened animals resulting from running into a trestle, in Ramsbottom v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 138 N. C. 38, 50 S. E. 448.

And a statute making a railroad company liable whenever any animals shall be killed or injured by the "cars or locomotives or other carriages," without regard to the question whether such injury or destruction was the result of wilful misconduct or negligence, or the result of unavoidable accident, was held not to apply to an injury to stock resulting from fright, where the animal was not actually struck by the train, in Peru & I. R. Co. v. Hasket, 10 Ind. 409, 71 Am. Dec. 335, wherein a horse was injured by trying to jump a culvert; in Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Cole, 41 Ind. 331, wherein a colt ran upon tracks and broke its leg in a cow pit; in Indianapolis, B. & W. R. W. Co. v. McBrown, 46 Ind. 229; in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Smith, 58 Ind. 575; and in Baltimore, P. & C. R. Co. v. Thomas, 60 Ind. 107.

And under the Texas statute which made every railroad company liable for the value of all stock killed by the "locomotive and cars" of such companies in running their 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The first question which presents itself is whether § 5476 of the Code of 1907, which provides when any "stock is killed or injured, or other property destroyed or damaged, by the locomotive or cars of any railroad, the burden of proof, in any suit therefor, is on the railroad company to show a compliance with the requirements of such sections, and that there was no negligence on the part of the company or its agents," is applicable to this case.

The wording of the section itself shows that it refers to those cases in which stock is killed or injured by coming into collision with the engine or cars; for in a case like the present, if the contention of the plaintiff be sustained, the stock is not killed, or injured by the locomotive or cars, but as a consequential result of the negligence of the agents of the defendant in frightening them.

In the state of Indiana, they have a statute fixing an absolute liability upon railroads where animals are "killed or injured by the locomotives, cars, or other carriages of the company;" and the supreme court of that state holds that the statute has no application to a case where animals are frightened by the locomotives, etc., and caused to kill themselves. Baltimore, P. & trains, it has been held that there is no liability in the absence of actual collision between the train and the animals injured. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Harris, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 270, where a horse frightened at a train ran upon a bridge and fell off; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 454, 17 S. W. 1078, where a horse frightened at a train ran into a fence; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes, 68 Tex. 290, 4 S. W. 494, where the frightened animal ran upon a trestle.

So, it has been held that a statute making proof of injury "inflicted by the running of locomotives or cars" prima facie evidence of want of reasonable skill and care on the part of the railroad company's employees does not apply to cases where the injury was not caused by actual contact with the locomotive or cars. Lowe v. Alabama, & V. R. Co. 81 Miss. 9, 32 So. 907.

And for a statute providing that the railroad company shall be liable for all damages resulting from any "accident or collision," upon a failure of the company to sound the alarm whistle, put down the brakes, and employ every possible means to stop the train and prevent an accident where an animal appears on the railroad roadway, which has been held to apply only to injuries directly inflicted by the train or the result of the omission of any statutory requirement, see Holder v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. 11 Lea, 176, as set out and quoted in NASHVILLE, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. GARTH.

G. J. C.

C. R. Co. v. Thomas, 60 Ind. 107; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Cole, 41 Ind. 331; Peru & I. R. Co. v. Hasket, 10 Ind. 409, 71 Am. Dec. 335. and note.

The state of Texas also provided that "each and every railroad company shall be liable to the owner for the value of all stock killed or injured by the locomotive and cars of such railroad company in running over their respective railways;" and the supreme court of that state holds that the statute applies only to cases of actual collision, and not to cases where animals are injured through fright caused by the train. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes, 68 Tex. 290, 4 S. W. 492; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 454, 17 S. W. 1079.

The statutes of Tennessee provided that when any animal or other obstruction appears on the track "the alarm whistle shall be sounded, the brakes put down, and every possible means employed to stop the train, and prevent an accident;" also, by another statute, that every railroad company that fails to observe these precautions "shall be responsible for all damages to persons or property occasioned by, or resulting from, any accident or collision that may occur;" and by another that, "where a railroad company is sued for killing or injuring stock, the burden of proof that the accident was unavoidable shall be upon the company." The supreme court of that state holds that "the injuries to persons and property provided against were injuries directly produced by the trains, and not injuries which stock might inflict upon themselves in the fright occasioned by the running of the trains in the legitimate exercise of the company's franchise." Holder v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. 11 Lea, 176, 181.

The reasoning of the foregoing decisions is satisfactory to us, and we hold that § 5476 of the Code of 1907 has no application to this case.

It may be stated as a general proposition that a railroad company has a right to operate its trains in the usual manner, making such noise as is incident to the proper conduct of the business, and is not liable for the consequences of fright to animals, unless its servants are negligent, by using its whistles, bells, etc., in an unusual or improper manner; and, "where animals are frightened merely by the approach of trains, the company will not be liable in the absence of any negligence in the operation of the train, or failure to exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury; but it will be liable if the fright of the animal was due to the train being operated in a negligent manner, or if, after discovering the fright and danger of the animal, the injury could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have been avoided." 33 Cyc. 1166, 1167; New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Thornton, 65 Miss. 256, 3 So. 654.

Where a horse broke his tether, came on the track, and ran ahead of the train, jumped into a trestle, and was killed, and the train did not stop immediately, but stopped before reaching the trestle, it was held that the company was not liable. Georgia P. R. Co. v. Money, — Miss. —, 8 So. 646.

Where animals were seen running along a road parallel to the track, and the engineer, after blowing the regular crossing signal, also sounded the cattle alarm to frighten them away, which proved ineffective as to one, which ran across the track and into a fence, the supreme court of Georgia held that, there being no unusual and improper noise made, the company was not liable. Southern R. Co. v. Puryear, 2 Ga. App. 75, 58 S. E. 306.

Where a horse strayed upon the track, and the engineer let off steam to frighten it away, which caused the animal to run into a winged fence extending across the track, the supreme court of Arkansas held the company not liable. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Conger, 84 Ark. 421, 105 S. W. 1177.

In another case, where a horse straying on the track became frightened and ran into a wire fence badly out of repair, on the right of way, the same court held the company not liable, saying: "But appellant did owe to appellee the duty, when it discovered his colt upon its track, to use ordinary or reasonable care to avoid injury to it by running its train against it, or by frightening and driving it by unnecessary alarms against the wire fence." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 57 Ark. 16, 18 L.R.A. 110, 38 Am. St. Rep. 217, 221, 20 S. W. 545.

In our own court, in a case where a horse attached to a buggy, at a public crossing, became frightened at the noises or movements of the train and ran away, it was held that the company was not liable, unless the acts of the servants of defendant were wanton and malicious, and done in the discharge of duty by wanton whistling of the engine and reckless discharge of steam. Stanton v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 91 Ala. 383, 386, 8 So. 798, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 66; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lee, 136 Ala. 182, 96 Am. St. Rep. 24, 33 So. 897; Southern R. Co. v. Crawford, 164 Ala. 179, 185, 51 So. 340.

In another case this court states: "On the evidence before them, it was open to the jury to find that defendant's train was being moved forward toward a trestle; that plaintiff's horse was on the track between the engine and the trestle, running, in apparent fright of the train, toward the trestle; that the track along which the horse ran was on an embankment 5 or 6 feet high, the sides of which, while not 'precipitous,' were yet at such an incline as that a horse, in attempting to go down them, would partially slide; that the train was from 30 to 50 yards behind the horse, and going faster than he was,—'gaining on him;' that the engineer was aware of the situation, but did not seasonably stop or check the speed of his train; that, had he done so, the horse would not have continued his flight onto and into the trestle, and the injury to the animal would have been averted." On those facts the court held the general charge in favor of the defendant properly refused; that the engineer owed the plaintiff the duty of stopping the train; and that "if he negligently failed to discharge this duty, and in consequence the horse was injured, the defendant is liable." Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 133 Ala. 362, 366, 32 So. 259, 260.

From these decisions of our own court, in connection with the decisions of other courts, we extract the principle that, as to the initial fright, the company is not liable, unless the acts of the servants of defendant were wanton and malicious; but after the animal is on the track, frightened, and running under conditions that indicate that, unless the train is stopped, it will run into the trestle, and that the danger may be averted by stopping the train, a duty arises to stop it; and if the engineer negligently fails to do so, the company will be liable.

The testimony of the only eyewitness shows, not only that he did not wantonly and maliciously make any unusual noise before the animals came on the track, and did not negligently fail to use the means of stopping the train after they got on the track, but shows affirmatively that as soon as he saw them approaching the track he used proper means to frighten them back, and commenced at once to use means to stop the train, and, according to the testimony of all the witnesses, he did stop the train at a distance variously estimated at 25, 30, 40, or 225 feet from the animals and the trestle.

There is nothing to show that the animals could not have run off from the track; it being merely stated that the track was on a fill of $1\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 feet, through a marshy place, with water on both sides. Some of the witnesses place the fill at 6 feet at the place where the accident occurred, but not at the place where the colts entered on the track; and one witness states that the water on one side of the track or right of way was about 6 feet deep, but how far this water was from the track is not shown, except by the facts that the right of way is 100 feet wide, and colt tracks are described on both sides of the track, between it and the water, showing that there was a space between; and another witness states that the animals which were unhurt did avoid the trestle, and ran on down the road towards Huntsville.

There is no testimony tending to show that the engineer negligently failed to use the means to stop the train after the animals were on the track, and running down it frightened.

It is contended in the brief of appellee that the witness Ridgway stated that the train continued to run at its usual speed after the alarm whistle was sounded, and that the jury might well find that the perilous position of the animals was in plain view for more than half a mile, and he negligently failed to get his train under control, to slacken the speed, or try to stop until it was too late.

In reaching a conclusion in this case, it must be remembered that the claim is not for running against or over the stock, but simply for frightening them.

As to the engineer's seeing the stock when a half mile distant, there is not any evidence tending to show that. The witness Barrett stated at first that when he first saw them he was 500 yards distant (which would be less than a third of a mile); but he came back on the stand to explain that he intended to say feet in place of yards. At that time they were at the gate, in a playful mood, and the engineer was not called on to do anything, although he testifies that he did, according to his custom, blow the whistle once, which usually drove animals away, and as soon as he saw them start towards the track, he commenced using the means to stop the train. Even then, starting towards the track would not indicate running down the track in front of the train.

The witness Ridgway says that he cannot say how long before they got to the trestle it was when he heard the alarm whistle blown; that he heard the whistle, "and the train ran some little distance before it came to a stop." "It ran this way for a while thereafter, and then slackened up," which does not contradict Barrett and other witnesses, who testify that 200 or 225 feet is as short a space within which the train could be stopped. While he and others state that they estimated the distance from the engine to the trestle, when the train stopped, at from 25 to 40 feet, yet they testify further that they are uncertain whether the engine or the baggage car had passed the private road crossing, which is shown by actual measurement to be 250 feet from the trestle.

We fail to find any evidence tending to show that the engineer was guilty of negligence in not using means to stop the train after it was apparent that the animals were frightened by the train. It results that the general charge should have been given in favor of the defendant.

The judgment of the court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MINNESOTA EX REL. W. J. ARMSTRONG COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

CITY OF WASECA et al., Respts.

(122 Minn. 348, 142 N. W. 319.)

Municipal corporation — furnishing electricity — obligation.

1. A city which undertakes to furnish electric light and power to the public is subject to the same duties and obligations, and possesses the same rights and privileges, as private persons or corporations doing the same class of service.

Same — equal service — duty to render.

2. Such a city is obliged to furnish power to all applicants who pay its proper and reasonable charges therefor. It cannot dictate to consumers what selection of appliances they shall make, as between those in common practical use. In this case relator found it necessary or advantageous in his business to use three-phase motors. Such motors are in common practical use. The city could not furnish current for three-

Headnotes by HALLAM, J.

Note. — Duty to adapt electrical appliances and connections to the system which supplies the current.

But one reported case has been found similar to STATE EX REL. W. J. ARMSTRONG CO. v. WASECA, as to facts and questions considered. In Kimball Bros. Co. v. Citizens' Gas & Electric Co. 141 Iowa, 632, 118 N. W. 891, it appeared that the consumer, who had a motor adapted to the three-phase electric system, applied for current to a power company which used the monocyclic system. It was contended by the consumer that the power company, knowing the system to which its motor was adapted, contracted to furnish current sufficient to run that motor. This contention was denied by the power company. It developed that the power company's current could not be used by the consumer successfully without the use of a clutch or some phase motors without the use of transformers costing about $80. With such transformers it could do so. It refused to furnish power at all, unless relator would discard his three-phase motors and install one-phase motors, to which the city system was adapted. Held, the court should require it to do so.

Same — necessary appliances — duty to furnish.

3. It does not follow that the city must bear the burden of the expense of such transformers. If a particular consumer desires service which the city can supply only by the installation of transformers at an expense which is substantial, and which is not entailed in furnishing power to others, then the consumer who occasions such special expense should bear the burden thereof. The one essential is that, whatever the charge, it must apply to all persons similarly situated, to the end that there shall be no discrimination.

Same — adjustment of expense — discretion.

4. As to the method of adjustment of such expense, whether by an installation charge, a rental, or an increased rate, the city has a large discretion. Its regulation, if fair and reasonable and free from discrimination, is binding on the applicant for service.

A PPEAL by relator from an order of the District Court for Waseca County denying a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to furnish electric current for the operation of relator's machinery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

other mechanism that would allow the motor to get up full speed before the elevator which it operated was to be lifted, and so the consumer had to abandon altogether the use of the power company's current. In an action for damages for breach of contract, it was held that it was the consumer's duty to use the clutch in order to lessen damages, but that, if the power company was at fault in having contracted to furnish electricity with the knowledge of the motor used by the consumer, it would have to bear the expenses entailed. The court in the course of its opinion said that when the attempt to run the motor was abandoned, it was the duty of the consumer to accept what was being furnished as sufficient and adequate, or to change its motor power by installing some other system which would operate the elevator to its satisfaction.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Waseca owns and operates an electric light and power plant which was installed at public expense for the purpose of furnishing electric light and power to its inhabitants.

Relator, W. J. Armstrong Company, operates a mercantile business in Waseca, and, as part of its business, has established and equipped a bottling works, which requires, for its operation, electric power. In order to operate said plant, relator installed two three-phase electric motors, with the intention of operating them by electric current to be furnished by the city. Having installed its motors, relator made application to the water and light board, requesting said board to connect its plant with the city system, and to furnish electric current and power. Said board refused to do so, on the ground that it could not furnish power to operate relator's three-phase motors without the installation of two transformers. It appears that such transformers would cost, if purchased new, about $80. It further appears that transform-the right of a power company to impose conditions precedent to the furnishing of current are included in this note, though they are not strictly in point with the distinctive question considered in the principal case. In State ex rel. Mason v. Consumers' Power Co. 119 Minn. 225, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1181, 137 N. W. 1104, it was held to be an unreasonable discrimination for an electric light company to require an applicant for service to procure for it a right of way to his premises, where it did not impose the same conditions upon other applicants and patrons.

And in Snell v. Clinton Electric Light, Heat & P. Co. 196 Ill. 626, 58 L.R.A. 284, 89 Am. St. Rep. 341, 63 N. E. 1082, where the light company endeavored to collect the cost of a transformer from the consumer, under its rule that where it did not do the wiring the consumer should be required to pay for such transformer, it 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

was held that, inasmuch as it furnished transformers free of charge for buildings wired by itself, it could not impose, as a condition to furnishing electricity to one whose building is wired by a third person, that he should pay for such transformer, although it may consider that the profits from the wiring justified furnishing the transformers without extra charge.

As to right to compel consumer to pay for connection with water mains, see note to Bothwell v. Consumers' Co. 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 485. As to right of water company to require customer to keep service pipe in repair, see note to State ex rel. McClaugherty v. Bluefield Waterworks & Improv. Co. 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 229. As to right of a municipality to require use of water meters and impose expense of same on consumer, see note to Cooper v. Goodland, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 410.

J. H. B.

ers were not in general use in the city. The board advised relator that, if it would install one-phase motors, the city could furnish power without the use of such transformers, and would immediately do so.

Relator instituted this mandamus proceeding to compel the city and its water and light board to install the service applied for. The trial court denied the writ. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, relator appeals.

1. In our opinion the water and light board should have given relator electrical power service, and the court should have issued a writ of mandamus requiring it to do so. The city has undertaken to furnish a public utility. It is to be governed in its duties and obligations, and in its rights and privileges, by the same rules as those which apply to private persons or corporations doing the same class of service. Wiltse v. Red Wing, 99 Minn. 255, 109 N. W. 114; Gordon & Ferguson v. Doran, 100 Minn. 343, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1049, 111 N. W. 272; Keever v. Mankato, 113 Minn. 55, 62, 63, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 339, 343, 129 N. W. 158, 775, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 216, 1 N. C. C. A. 187.

2. The city is obliged to furnish power to all applicants who shall pay its proper and reasonable charges therefor. It cannot arbitrarily dictate to consumers what appliances they shall use, nor direct what selection they shall make as between appliances in common practical use. The difference in detail between one-phase and three-phase motors is not important. The testimony shows that both one-phase and three-phase motors are in common commercial use by consumers of electric power. Each has its advantages. The three-phase motor is best adapted to certain conditions. One of the defendant's witnesses testified that, if the total power used in any plant came to over 3 horse power, he would put in a three-phase motor. If below 3 horse power, he would put in one-phase. Mr. Armstrong testified that, while his company proposed to use less than 3 horse power to begin with, it expected to use 10 or 15 horse power "before the year rolls around." Relator was engaged in a legitimate business. It found it necessary or advantageous to install three-phase motors, as best adapted to the needs of that business. It demanded that power be furnished. It was the duty of the city to furnish such power and to install such appliances as were necessary for that purpose.

3. It does not follow that the city must bear the expense of conforming its appliances to those of relator. A single customer cannot dictate the sort of system the city shall install. The city officers must determine in the exercise of their own best judgment the sort of system best adapted to the needs of the greatest number of consumers. If, then, a particular consumer desires service which the city can supply only by the installation of transformers at an expense which is substantial, and which is not entailed in furnishing power to others, the consumer who occasions such special expense should bear the burden thereof. Any other rule would operate as a discrimination in his favor.

This rule is well sustained by authority. Either the city or a private utility company may require special rates proportioned to the expense of the particular service (Souther v. Gloucester, 187 Mass. 552, 69 L.R.A. 309, 73 N. E. 558); may exact a minimum charge (Gould v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 29 Misc. 241, 60 N. Y. Supp. 559); may require the installation of meters and other necessary appliances at the consumer's expense (Shaw Stocking Co. v. Lowell, 199 Mass. 118, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 746, 85 N. E. 90, 15 Ann. Cas. 377; State ex rel. Hallauer v. Gosnell, 116 Wis. 608, 61 L.R.A. 33, 93 N. W. 542; Sheffield Waterworks Co. v. Bingham, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 443, 52 L. J. Ch. N. S. 624, 48 L. T. N. S. 604); may exact a meter rental (Smith v. Capital Gas Co. 132 Cal. 209, 54 L.R.A. 769, 64 Pac. 258); or may require a deposit to secure its fair return (Williams v. Mutual Gas Co. 52 Mich. 499, 50 Am. Rep. 266, 18 N. W. 236; Shepard v. Milwaukee Gas-light Co. 6 Wis. 539, 548, 70 Am. Dec. 479). The one essential rule in all such cases is that, whatever the charge, it must apply uniformly to all persons similarly situated (Shaw Stocking Co. v. Lowell, 199 Mass. 118, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 746, 85 N. E. 90, 15 Ann. Cas. 377), to the end that there shall be no discrimination.

4. As to the method of adjustment of such expense, the city has a large discretion. Ladd v. Boston, 170 Mass. 332, 40 L.R.A. 171, 49 N. E. 627. It may no doubt do so, in its discretion, by a first charge as an installation charge, or by a rental, or by an increased rate. We cannot upon this record determine what method should be adopted in this case. This is a matter for the water and light board of the city to regulate, and its regulation is binding, if fair and reasonable and free from discrimination, either in favor of or against the applicant. If the board has not yet fixed rates or charges adapted to this class of service, it is its duty to do so. The trial court, should have issued a writ of mandamus requiring that respondent city and its water and light board furnish the relator the power asked for, on condition of payment by relator of any proper rate or charge to cover expenses which may be incident to such service in excess of that entailed in installing electric power service for consumers generally, such rate or charge to be made in such reasonable manner as the board shall determine.

Order reversed, and new trial granted.

I. General rule.

Unless jurisdiction is expressly taken away by statute, it is the general rule that where a corporation becomes insolvent, and its stockholders have not paid their stock subscriptions, and no attempt to enforce the same is made by the corporation, a court of equity or a court administering 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

certain subscribers to the capital stock of the bank as defendants, for the purpose of recovering unpaid subscriptions, that further alleges, in substance, that the judge of the court wherein said receiver was appointed, upon application of creditors, supported by a showing that the bank was entirely insolvent, and without assets sufficient to distribute any part thereof to the bank or its shareholders, entered an order directing said receiver to retain counsel, and institute proper proceedings against the defendants as subscribers for the capital stock of said insolvent bank, to recover the respective amounts remaining unpaid on said subscription or for the stock issued to them, for the benefit of all the creditors of said bank, and that this suit is filed in compliance with said order, states facts sufficient to warrant the trial court to treat such suit as one brought by the creditors of said insolvent bank, over which a court of equity has jurisdiction, and in which all the subscribers to the capital stock may be joined as defendants.

equitable remedies will assume jurisdiction of a proceeding to compel delinquent stockholders to make good their subscriptions, either in whole or in part, as the necessities of the case may require.

corporation secured by a trust deed which has been foreclosed, for the purpose of subjecting to the decree of foreclosure the amount due upon subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation. Morgan County v. Allen, 103 U. S. 498, 26 L. ed. 498.

The decisions of the Alabama courts on this question have not at all times been entirely consistent.

In Allen v. Montgomery R. Co. 11 Ala. 437, it is held that equity has jurisdiction where a corporation is joined with the stockholders in a bill by several joint creditors of the corporation, to enforce unpaid stock subscriptions as an asset of the corporation, and also to reach other property of the corporation fraudulently disposed of.

And in Nicrosi v. Irvine, 102 Ala. 648, 48 Am. St. Rep. 92, 15 So. 429, it is held that since subscribed capital is a trust fund, creditors of an insolvent corporation may proceed in equity against stockholders who have attempted payment of their subscriptions in property at a fictitious valuation. And see to the same effect Elyton Land Co. v. Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Co. 92 Ala. 407, 12 L.R.A. 307, 25 Am. St. Rep. 65, 9 So. 129, and Pickering v. Townsend, 118 Ala. 351, 23 So. 703.

In Nicrosi v. Irvine, it is said that the right of creditors of an insolvent corporation to have conserved the integrity of a trust fund of a corporation, being unpaid stock subscriptions, is purely equitable, and not enforceable at law. It is enforceable in equity on the independent standing of creditors in relation to the capital stock, and not with regard to any supposed legal or equitable right in the corporation itself to demand payment.

And in Harris v. Gateway Land Co. 128 Ala. 652, 29 So. 611, it is said that no principle is better settled than that courts of equity may enforce payment of stock subscriptions when the directors have neglected or refused to make the assessment and calls for them, in the exercise of their plain duty to do so.

by the defendant in error, W. H. Ebey, as receiver of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company of Stonewall, as plaintiff, against the plaintiffs in error, M. W. Krause, W. H. Dill, H. G. Malot, J. E. Guier, and Sam Ward, as defendants. The complaint, omitting the caption, is in words and figures as follows: "Comes now the said plaintiff, and represents that he is the duly appointed qualified receiver of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company of Stonewall, Indian territory, a corporation organized under the laws of the Indian territory, and engaged in business at Stonewall prior to the time of the appointment of the plaintiff as its receiver, and that the defendants W. H. Dill and H. G. Malot are citizens of the western district of the Indian territory, and reside that it is not well or at all settled, and is not true in point of legal fact, that the chancery court ever had or has original jurisdiction at the suit of a corporation creditor to coerce the payment by stockholders of their subscriptions to its capital. Said the court: "Such debts to a corporation stand upon the same footing as indebtedness generally. In the absence of statutes on the subject, no court, whether of law or equity, has any power to reach and subject this class of a debtor's property to the satisfaction of demands against it."

The Hall Case was again before the court on a subsequent appeal, 152 Ala. 262, 44 So. 592, and also in 173 Ala. 398, 56 So. 235. In the latter case it is said: "The bill in this case is by the judgment creditors, to subject equitable assets of an insolvent corporation to the payment of their judgments, after the return of execution, 'No property found.' The particular assets sought to be subjected are debts or choses in action alleged to be due the insolvent corporation from its original stockholders, for their unpaid subscriptions to its capital stock. The equity of the bill for this purpose has once been doubted (if not denied) by this court; but we take it that it has now been settled affirmatively."

II. Effect of statutes giving other remedy.

Neither the corporation nor the stockholders have any vested right to have the question of the liability of a stockholder for unpaid subscriptions determined and enforced in equity. Hill v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 134 U. S. 515, 33 L. ed. 994, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 589.

nearer to Okmulgee than any other place of holding court in said district; and for cause of action the plaintiff avers: (1) That heretofore, to wit, on or about the 14th day of March, 1905, the said defendants M. W. Krause, J. E. Guier, W. H. Dill, and Sam Ward, as incorporators, organized the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, for the purpose of transacting a general banking and trust business at Stonewall, in the Indian territory. That M. W. Krause was elected president, and W. H. Dill was elected vice president, and J. E. Guier was elected cashier, of said corporation. That said officers, together with Sam Ward, constituted the first board of directors of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, and the articles of incorporation and certificate required by law were filed with the clerk of the United States court of appeals for the Indian territory, at South McAlester, on the 13th day of February, 1905. That the objects and purposes of said corporation were set out in detail in the certificate filed as aforesaid, and said certificate also recites that the capital stock of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company is and was $25,000, divided into shares of $25 each, and that $10,000 of said capital stock had been actually paid in by the subscribers, and that the names of the stockholders and the number of shares subscribed for by them are as follows: M. W. Krause, president, 120 shares; W. H. Dill, 80 shares; J. E. Guier, 160 shares; and Sam Ward, 40 shares. That on the said 14th day of March, 1905,

But a creditor of an insolvent corporation is not denied the right to have recourse to equity to enforce the liability of a stockholder for unpaid subscriptions, by a statute which imposes individual liability on the shareholders of the corporation for unpaid stock, but which prescribes no remedy and gives no form of redress. Kelly v. Clark (Kelly v. Fourth of July Min. Co.) 21 Mont. 291, 42 L.R.A. 621, 69 Am. St. Rep. 668, 53 Pac. 959, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 431.

And equity jurisdiction is not affected by a statute giving a remedy at law to creditors of an insolvent corporation, to enforce unpaid stock subscriptions. Payne v. Bullard, 23 Miss. 88, 55 Am. Dec. 74.

A creditor of a corporation who seeks to reach unpaid stock subscriptions to satisfy his debt may bring an action in equity, or proceed under the statute by a motion for execution against the owner of the stock, since the remedies are concurrent. Shields v. Hobart, 172 Mo. 491, 95 Am. St. Rep. 669, 72 S. W. 669; Rood v. Crocus Hill Min. Co. 157 Mo. App. 405, 139 S. W. 222; Bonet Constr. Co. v. Central Amusement Co. 153 Mo. App. 185, 132 S. W. 270; State ex rel. Housewrecking, Salvage & Lumber Co. v. Goodrich, 138 Mo. App. 283, 120 S. W. 646. This is upon the theory, as stated in the latter case, that unpaid subscriptions to capital stock constitute a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, and the right of equity to administer such a fund is fundamental. Hence, where the statute contains no language indicative of a legislative intention to make exclusive the remedy therein provided, it must be merely cumulative.

This Missouri statute received a contrary construction in Haskins v. Harding, Fed. Cas. No. 6,196a, the court holding that the remedy therein provided was exclusive, and precluded a proceeding in equity by a creditor to reach unpaid stock subscriptions.

The jurisdiction of equity to entertain a creditor's bill against a corporation and its stockholders, to subject the assets of the corporation to the lien of the creditors, is not divested by the personal liability imposed upon the stockholders by statute. Turner v. Fidelity Loan Concern, 2 Cal. App. 122, 83 Pac. 62, 70.

A creditor may have recourse to a bill to reach and apply the property of the stockholder which could not be seized upon execution, and a bill can be maintained for the establishment of the debt and for equitable relief, including the payment by the stockholder of his unpaid subscription. American Spirits Mfg. Co. v. Eldridge, 209 Mass. 590, 95 N. E. 942 (applying the Illinois statute which provides that each stockholder shall be individually liable to the creditors of the corporation to an amount not exceeding the amount unpaid on the stock held by him).

An act relative to the enforcement of unpaid stock subscriptions by the corporation, its receivers, or assignees, limiting the remedy to an action at law, does not apply to creditors of insolvent corporations, and they may resort to equity to enforce in their behalf stockholders' unpaid subscriptions. Martin v. South Salem Land Co. 94 Va. 28, 26 S. E. 591.

III. Grounds of equity jurisdiction.

The remedy of a creditor to enforce the statutory individual liability of stockholders of insolvent corporations for unpaid stock is in equity, and not in law, since in equity the rights of the corporation stockholders and all the creditors may be adjusted in one suit. Patterson v. Lynde, 106 U. S. 519, 27 L. ed. 265, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 432.

Actions by creditors are sustained on the ground that the capital stock is a trust fund, and may be followed by creditors and others having an interest in its proper application in the hands of third persons having notice of the trust attaching thereto. And stockholders, both in law and in fact, are charged with such notice. The rights of creditors being superior, and partaking somewhat of the character of a lien, equity will regard and work them as the plaintiff is advised and believes, and on such information and belief alleges the fact to be, H. G. Malot subscribed for 80 shares of the capital stock of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, taking 40 shares of the 160 shares subscribed for by J. E. Guier, and 40 shares of the 120 subscribed for by M. W. Krause; that on the said 14th day of March, 1905, there was issued certificate No. 1 to M. W. Krause for 80 shares of the capital stock of the said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company. That on the same day certificate No. 3 for 80 shares of the capital stock of the said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company was issued to W. H. Dill; that on the same day certificate No. 5 for 80 shares of the capital stock of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company was issued to H.

G. Malot. That on the same day certificate No. 4 for 120 shares of the capital stock of the said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company was issued to J. E. Guier. That on the same day certificate No. 6 for 40 shares of the capital stock of the said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company was issued to Sam Ward. That each of the said defendants undertook and agreed to pay the said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company the par value of the respective shares of stock issued to them, namely; that M. W. Krause undertook and agreed to pay to the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company for the 120 shares of stock issued to him the sum of $3,000. That H. G. Malot undertook and agreed to pay the par value of the 80 shares of stock issued to him, to wit, $2,000. That W. H. Dill undertook and out by the same means by which the corporation itself should have done. Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57.

Where instalments of capital stock have not been paid into the corporation treasury in consequence of the neglect or refusal of the directors of the company to make the necessary demand on the stockholders, and to enforce the same, a court of equity will entertain a bill by a creditor on behalf of himself and others, to coerce a proportionate payment of instalments to be applied to the satisfaction of the indebtedness; and this is true although the creditors are not absolutely without a remedy at law, since, to induce equity to refuse its aid, it is not sufficient that there be no remedy at law, but there must be an adequate and complete one. And where, from the nature of the case and complications presented, justice may best be reached by means of the flexible machinery of a court of equity, that court will extend its jurisdiction in the furtherance of justice. Bank of Virginia v. Adams, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 534.

With its power to appoint an auditor or master in chancery to audit the amount of the debts of the corporation in gross, and the debt due to each creditor, to ascertain the number of stockholders solvent and insolvent, the per cent necessary to be paid by each stockholder in proportion to his stock, complete justice can be better administered to the creditors and the solvent stockholders by a court of equity, than by any other form of procedure, since it will prevent a multiplicity of suits, save cost, and give speedy and effectual relief. Dalton & M. R. Co. v. McDaniel, 56 Ga. 191.

In the enforcement by a receiver of an insolvent corporation, of subscriptions to its stock, for the purpose of paying creditors, the community of interest of the stockholders in every question of law and of fact involved, together with the greater convenience in saving expense by a single suit in equity against all the delinquent stockholders, is sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction of that court. Wyman v. Bowman, 82 C. C. A. 189, 127 Fed. 257 (enforcement of a constitutional provision that original subscribers to the stock of a corporation shall be individually liable for its debts to the extent of their unpaid subscriptions. Other equitable relief, however, was asked, being the avoidance of a release by the corporation of an assessment upon its capital stock).

The remedy in equity is the more appropriate since the rights of the corporation, the stockholders, and creditors may all be adjusted in one suit on principles of equity and justice. Hodges v. Silver Hill Min. Co. 9 Or. 200.

The superiority of the remedy in equity is manifest in actions by creditors to enforce the payment by stockholders of an insolvent corporation of unpaid subscriptions to the stock, and to apply the proceeds to the satisfaction of creditors, according to the particular equities of each. Bank of Virginia v. Adams, supra.

While the necessity for an account is a large and influential element in equitable relief, yet its presence or absence is not the conclusive jurisdictional fact. Cook v. Carpenter, 212 Pa. 165, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 900, 108 Am. St. Rep. 854, 61 Atl. 799, 4 Ann. Cas. 723.

The action must be in equity if a creditor of an insolvent corporation desires to be the actor in the proceeding to collect and apply unpaid subscriptions upon the indebtedness of the corporation. Burch v. Taylor, 1 Wash. 245, 24 Pac. 438.

In the absence of statute regulating the procedure, a judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation cannot maintain an action at law to enforce payment by a stockholder of an unpaid subscription to the stock of an insolvent corporation, since matters of this nature are cognizable only in equity. Brown v. Fisk, 23 Fed. 228.

And see Reed v. Burg, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 117, 96 N. W. 414, holding that a single creditor can not maintain an action at law against a stockholder in an insolvent corporation, to enforce, for the former's benefit, the latter's unpaid subscription, but such action agreed to pay said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company the par value of the 80 shares of stock issued to him, to wit, $2,000. That Sam Ward undertook and agreed to pay said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company the par value of the 40 shares of stock issued to him, to wit, $1,000. That J. E. Guier undertook and agreed to pay said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company the par value of the 120 shares of stock issued to him, to wit, $3,000. That plaintiff is advised and believes, and on such information and belief alleges the facts to be, that the only one of said defendants who paid any part of the par value of said stock or anything of value for the stock subscribed for and issued to them was the defendant M. W. Krause, who paid to said Citizens' Bank &

Trust Company the sum of $2,000, and that after said sum had been paid, the same was later returned to said defendant, and as plaintiff is informed and believes, and on such information and belief alleges the fact to be, the said defendants organized said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company without any purpose or intent to pay for its capital stock or any part thereof, except the $2,000 paid in by the defendant Krause, and that this sum was paid in with distinct understanding that it should be returned after the corporation came to be a going concern, the sworn statement in the certificate of incorporation, that $10,000 has been actually paid in to the contrary notwithstanding.

(2) That the said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company was and is insolvent, and on the can be maintained only in equity, for the benefit of all the creditors and against all the stockholders whose subscriptions are unpaid.

Where, however, a suit can be maintained only after an assessment has been duly made by a court in the original insolvency proceeding, or facts appear upon the face of the proceeding which will do away with the necessity for an assessment, an action to enforce an unpaid subscription for the benefit of a creditor should ordinarily be at law. Covell v. Fowler, 144 Fed. 535.

In a suit to wind up the affairs of an insolvent corporation, where it becomes necessary to order an assessment to be made upon unpaid subscriptions, to satisfy the claims of corporate creditors, a court of equity is the proper tribunal; where, however, an assessment has been ordered, an action at law may be brought against a stockholder to collect his quota. Clevenger v. Moore, 71 N. J. L. 148, 58 Atl. 88.

If a corporation is utterly insolvent, and is being administered in insolvency proceedings, separate actions at law by the assignee in insolvency against the several stockholders, to enforce unpaid stock subscriptions, are preferable, since they are cheaper and more speedy and effectual. Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. ed. 220.

IV. Necessity of assessment.

As to effect of assessment upon jurisdiction of court in equity, see Covell v. Fowler, and Clevenger v. Moore, supra.

The necessity for an assessment arises from the consideration that only sufficient of the unpaid capital can be called in to pay the unsatisfied debts. In order to ascertain the amount, there must be an account taken of debts, assets, and unpaid capital. Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49, 51 Am. Rep. 166.

And there can be no recovery against a delinquent stockholder until a call or assessment has been made upon him, fixing the amount he is required to pay prior to 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

insolvency. This may be done by the corporation, if it is not disabled by the special terms of the subscription contract; but where insolvency and exhaustion of assets exist, the unpaid capital is not available to any one creditor in satisfaction of his debt, because then the whole amount of the unpaid capital is a trust fund, which does not belong to the corporation, but to the whole body of its creditors; and whether the proceeding originates in the name of one or of several or of all the creditors, the result is the same. The capital, when recovered, will inure to the benefit of all, and must be distributed among all ratably. Ibid.

On the failure of a board of directors so to do, equity may make the call necessary to charge subscribers to stock with liability for unpaid subscriptions, and no action at law to enforce the unpaid subscriptions following such a call or assessment is necessary. Glenn v. Soule, 22 Fed. 417.

In Salmon v. Hamborough Co. 1 Ch. Cas. 204, an assessment was ordered by a court of equity in behalf of the creditors of an insolvent corporation, upon its stockholders who had not paid for their stock, and who had agreed to pay only when ordered so to do by the corporation, the proper officers or trustees of the corporation having refused to make the necessary order.

There is no obligation upon a stockholder to pay an unpaid subscription payable upon call of the corporation, until an assessment or a call by the company has been made, or until such assessment has been ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction. Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 968.

A receiver of an insolvent corporation cannot maintain an action at law to recover the amount due on a subscription to stock of the corporation, without showing that a call or assessment has been made either by the corporation before insolvency, or by the court since. Chandler v. Siddle, 3 Dill. 477, Fed. Cas. No. 2,594.

But stockholders are liable on stock subscriptions, although no call or assessment is made by the creditors of the corporation,

20th day of February, 1906, on the petition of one of its creditors, the plaintiff was appointed by the United States court for the southern district of the Indian territory receiver to take charge of all of its property and effects, and to administer the same under the order of said court for the benefit of all its creditors. That the liabilities of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company at the time the plaintiff took charge of its assets as receiver, as shown by its books, were $15,179.02. That a great deal of the paper of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company is worthless, and a very small sum can be realized from the same and the rest of its assets. That after six months' efforts the plaintiff has only been able to collect on notes $60.50, and to realize on other property the sum of $100. That all of the capital stock of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company represented as paid in, namely, $10,000, and the assets in the hands of the plaintiff as receiver, will not be sufficient to pay to the creditors of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company. (3) That, on a partial presentation of the foregoing facts to Judge J. T. Dickerson, an order was made on the 15th day of August, 1906, directing the plaintiff as receiver to retain counsel, and to institute proper proceedings against the defendants as subscribers for the capital stock of the said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, to recover the respective amounts remaining unpaid on said subscriptions or for the stock issued to them, for the benefit of all the creditors of the where an assignment is made by the corporation for the benefit of its creditors. McKay v. Elwood, 12 Wash. 579, 41 Pac. 919.

And an assessment against a delinquent stockholder is not necessary where the liabilities of the corporation exceed its assets, so that it will require the entire amount of unpaid stock to liquidate the indebtedness. Potts v. Wallace, 146 U. S. 689, 36 L. ed. 1135, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 196.

A stockholder of an insolvent corporation cannot be heard to urge the objection that the directors of the corporation failed to make a call for the balance remaining unpaid upon his subscription, where the indebtedness of the corporation largely exceeds its corporate assets, exclusive of unpaid subscriptions. McKay v. Elwood, 12 Wash. 579, 41 Pac. 919.

Neither may a stockholder urge that no call or assessment has been made, as a defense to a bill in equity by a creditor of the corporation to enforce a stockholder's subscription, where the creditor has exhausted his legal remedies against the corporation, and it fails to make an assessment upon its stockholders for unpaid stock to be used in discharge of the judgment. Glenn v. Liggett, 135 U. S. 533, 34 L. ed. 262, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 867.

And it has been held that a creditor of an insolvent corporation can proceed in equity to enforce the liability of a stockholder for unpaid stock, without a call and without taking an account of other indebtedness or making all stockholders defendants, when the liability of a stockholder for unpaid subscriptions is several, and not joint, since such a creditor is not bound to settle up the affairs of a corporation in order to obtain his due. Edwards v. Schillinger, 245 Ill. 231, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 895, 137 Am. St. Rep. 308, 91 N. E. 1048.

Citizens' Bank & Trust Company. That this suit is filed in compliance with said order. That the plaintiff has made demand on each of said defendants for the amount due on his subscription or for the stock of said Citizens' Bank & Trust Company issued to him. That they have each failed, neglected, and refused to pay the same or any part thereof. That there is now due the plaintiff as receiver of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company as unpaid subscription for capital stock issued to them, namely, M. W. Krause, $3,000; W. H. Dill, $2,000; H. G. Malot, $2,000; Sam Ward, $1,000; J. E. Guier, $3,000, together with interest thereon from the 14th day of March, 1905. (4) That the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law, and, unless this court takes jurisdiction of this suit in equity, he will be driven to a multiplicity of actions in trying to enforce the liability of said defendants at law, and the funds of said estate will be greatly depleted in paying the additional costs and expenses necessary in filing and prosecuting such actions. Wherefore, the plaintiff prays the decree of this court in his favor as receiver against M. W. Krause for $3,000 and interest; against H. G. Malot for $2,000 and interest; against W. H. Dill for $2,000 and interest; against J. E. Guier for $3,000 and interest, and for such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and proper." To this complaint defendant W. H. Dill filed a demurrer, upon the grounds (1) that said complaint does not state any

Wis.—Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57.

In Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57, the mode of procedure in equity is thus pointed out: "The creditor is first to establish his claim by judgment at law, and then, after execution issued and returned in whole or in part unsatisfied, he may file his bill in his own behalf and in behalf of such other creditors of the corporation as may elect to become parties thereto, against the corporation and its delinquent or withdrawing stockholders, alleging the recovery and nonpayment of his judgment, and praying the decree or order of the court that an account of the assets and debts be taken and a receiver be appointed, and that the stockholders and officers pay in and account to the receiver for so much of the capital stock as will be sufficient to pay the debt of the plaintiff, and those of such other creditors as may choose to join him and come in under the decree; and that the receiver be directed to apply the same in discharge thereof."

It has been held that the issuance and return nulla bona of an execution are necessary to entitle a judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation to maintain a proceeding in equity to subject to his judgment unpaid stock subscriptions. Burch v. Taylor, 1 Wash. 245, 24 Pac. 438.

against stockholders of a corporation to enforce their liability for stock, a judgment must generally be obtained against the corporation, and an execution issued and returned nulla bona. This is, however, not necessary where the condition of the corporation, either through dissolution or insolvency, renders such a proceeding futile. Hodges v. Silver Hill Min. Co. 9 Or. 200.

While it is a general rule that a mere contract creditor has no standing in equity to enforce a creditors' bill, unless he has obtained a judgment or a specific lien on the property sought to be reached, this is, however, not an invariable rule, and it does not apply where legal process against the debtor in the state of the forum is impossible. In such case a creditors' bill to reach unpaid stock subscriptions to the stock of an insolvent corporation, to apply upon the complainant's debt against the corporation, may be maintained, although the debt is not reduced to judgment. Rule v. Omega Stove & Grate Co. 64 Minn. 326, 67 N. W. 60.

A creditor may proceed in equity upon an established or admitted claim against a stockholder or stockholders, to enforce his or their liability to an insolvent corporation for the amount remaining due upon his or their subscription to the stock, although no account is asked to be taken of the other indebtedness of the company. Crawford v. Rohrer, 59 Md. 599.

b. Foreign corporation.

Where creditors have pursued their remedy in a foreign state by recovering judgments against the corporation and issuing executions thereon, which were returned nulla bona, and the assets of the corporation have been placed in the hands of a receiver, they cannot proceed against resident stockholders in any other forum than in a court of equity, to enforce the unpaid stock subscriptions of the latter, since such sums are equitable assets recoverable only in a court possessed of chancery jurisdiction. Shickle v. Watts, 94 Mo. 410, 7 S. W. 274.

sufficient facts to authorize a court of equity to assume jurisdiction; (2) that said complaint shows upon its face that complainant has a complete, adequate remedy at law; (3) that this defendant is entitled to a trial by jury under the law and Constitution of the United States, of which he would be deprived should this cause be tried in equity; (4) for the reason that said court has no jurisdiction in equity to hear and determine the said cause.

This demurrer was overruled by the court, to which ruling the defendant Dill duly excepted. After statehood the cause was transferred from the district court for Okmulgee county to the district court for Okfuskee county, and the defendant Dill was given thirty days within which to file his answer. The answer of Dill amounted to an admission that he subscribed to the stock, and an averment that he had paid for the same. Mr. Dill seems to be the only defendant to file any pleadings, although the record shows that defendant Malot appeared at the trial in person and by counsel. Upon trial the court found in favor of the defendant Malot, and against the defendant Dill, and entered a decree dismissing the cause against Malot; and that the plaintiff, W. H. Ebey, as receiver of the Citizens'

A court of equity having jurisdiction of the real owner of stock in a foreign corporation can enforce, against the holder of such stock, a liability in favor of a creditor residing in the state. Mount Lake Land Co. v. Blair, 109 Va. 147, 63 S. E. 751.

It has been held that the only remedy in equity which a creditor of an insolvent corporation has to reach unpaid stock subscriptions is by way of a creditors' bill. And to maintain such a bill, he must first have exhausted his remedy at law by procuring judgment and causing an execution to be issued and returned nulla bona. Hence, to enforce the liability of resident stockholders in a foreign corporation for unpaid stock, it is not sufficient that a creditor has secured a judgment against the corporation in the state of its origin. Turner Bros. v. Alabama Min. & Mfg. Co. 25 Ill. App. 144.

A creditor cannot enforce payment of an unpaid subscription to the stock of a foreign corporation, where he does not proceed through the corporation, nor in such manner as to bring the money directly into its treasury, but merely seeks to have the amount of the judgment applied upon his own claim, disregarding the rights of other creditors and the equities of the defendant stockholders in respect to other stockholders who have not paid the amount of their subscription. Patterson v. Lynde, 112 Ill. 196; Young v. Farwell, 139 Ill. 326, 28 N. E. 845.

A bill in equity will not be entertained where filed by creditors of a foreign corporation against a stockholder thereof found within the jurisdiction of the court, who has not paid his subscription to the capital stock of the corporation, because of the inconvenience and difficulties which would arise from the exercise of such jurisdiction. Bank of Virginia v. Adams, 1 Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 534.

VI. Nature of action and character of relief granted.

a. Action by creditor or creditors in behalf of all the creditors.

It has been pointed out that, in the enforcement of unpaid stock subscriptions to 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

insolvent corporations, the nature of the right to be enforced, and the circumstances under which it is to be enforced, render the proceedings by a creditors' bill eminently proper for a court of equity, for the practice should be such as not to be unnecessarily oppressive on those against whom the proceedings are directed; and, since the liability is incurred only when the capital paid in is not sufficient to satisfy the debts of the corporation, and then only to an amount sufficient for that purpose, it is necessary that an account should be taken of the assets and debts, of the amount of the capital remaining unpaid upon the shares, and the amount unpaid by each stockholder, in order that each may be made equally liable. Mann v. Pentz, 3 N. Y. 415.

A judgment creditor of the corporation, after execution returned unsatisfied, may maintain an action in equity in his own behalf and in behalf of the other creditors of the corporation becoming parties to the proceeding, against delinquent stockholders in the corporation, and secure a decree for an account of the debts of the corporation and the amount unpaid by stockholders, and for the payment of sufficient to pay the debts of the complainant and other creditors joining in the action. Holmes v. Sherwood, 3 McCrary, 405, 16 Fed. 725.

Generally, the action is by the creditor in his own behalf and in behalf of all other creditors who may join in the proceeding. Holmes v. Sherwood, 3 McCrary, 405, 16 Fed. 725; Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776; Dalton & M. R. Co. v. McDaniel, 56 Ga. 191; Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49, 51 Am. Rep. 166; Bank of Virginia v. Adams, Pars. Sel. Eq. Cas. 534; Ford v. Chase, 118 App. Div. 605, 103 N. Y. Supp. 30, affirmed in 189 N. Y. 504, 81 N. E. 1164; Bronson v. Wilmington North Carolina L. Ins. Co. 85 N. C. 411. And it has been held that the action by a single creditor to enforce unpaid stock subscriptions must be in equity for the benefit of all the creditors of the corporation, and it must be against all the stockholders whose subscriptions are unpaid. Reed v. Burg, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 117, 96 N. W. 414.

Since it is generally necessary that an account of the assets and of the debts of Bank & Trust Company of Stonewall, do have and recover of and from the defendant W. H. Dill the sum of $2,000, together with interest thereon from the 14th day of March, 1905, and the costs incurred by him in this action. To reverse this judgment this proceeding in error was commenced.

The main contention of counsel for plaintiff in error is that the obligations arising, under the facts stated in the complaint, are legal, and not equitable; that they are based upon the contract of subscription, and each subscription constitutes a separate obligation that may be dependent upon separate, independent, and distinct facts; that the

the corporation should be taken together, with the amount of the capital remaining unpaid upon the shares and the amount unpaid by each stockholder, to the end that each may be made equally liable, this can be effected only by a bill filed in behalf of all the creditors against the corporation and the delinquent stockholders as defendants. Mann v. Pentz, 3 N. Y. 415.

Therefore, when a creditor is obliged to seek the aid of equity for the enforcement of his demand, he must do so for the benefit of all creditors of the corporation who may desire to unite with him, to the end that all may share alike in proportion to the amount of their respective claims in the funds which may be realized by the proceeding, since the maxim of the law in such cases is that equality is equity. Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57, and see infra, b.

The suit may be maintained by the creditor of a corporation in behalf of himself and other creditors, against the corporation, to subject its assets, including unpaid subscriptions of stockholders, to the creditors' lien. And the court will either compel the corporation to assess the stock the amount necessary for the payment of its liabilities, or it will itself make the assessment. Turner v. Fidelity Loan Concern, 2 Cal. App. 122, 83 Pac. 62, 70.

Generally, the relief given is by a decree compelling stockholders to pay up their subscriptions for stock, to be used in satisfaction of the corporate debts generally. Ogilvie v. Knox Ins. Co. 22 How. 380, 16 L. ed. 349; Pickering v. Townsend, 118 Ala. 351, 23 So. 703; Glenn v. Semple, 80 Ala. 159, 60 Am. Rep. 92 (holding that courts of equity may enforce payment of stock subscriptions to an insolvent corporation, where the directors of the corporation refuse to make an assessment); Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448 (holding that the creditors of an insolvent corporation, by a bill in equity, may compel the officers of the corporation to enforce contribution from the stockholders according to their unpaid subscriptions); C. H. Little Co. v. Woodward Ave. Cemetery Asso. 135 Mich. 248, 97 N. W. 682 (holding that directors may make an assessment and sue the stockholders for the purpose of paying the debts 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) action stated is equitable in form only, being but a bundle of separate actions, each of which grows out of and rests upon an independent and distinct transaction; that the relief prayed for is not of an equitable nature; that the object and purpose of the action is the recovery of money, and in all such cases, where a money judgment only is prayed for, a court of equity is without jurisdiction. Counsel base their contentions upon the rule laid down in the case of Tompkins v. Craig (C. C.) 93 Fed. 885, from which they quote as follows: "The bill is demurred to upon the ground of multifariousness, and we think the objection must of the corporation, and it is their duty, both moral and legal, to do so, and what they have power to do, and what in good conscience and law they ought to do, courts of equity have jurisdiction to compel them to do); Pettibone v. McGraw, 6 Mich. 441 (holding that where the capital stock of an insolvent corporation has not been paid in, a court of equity will compel its collection for the creditors of the company as a fund for the benefit of the creditors); Briggs v. Penniman, 8 Cow. 387, 18 Am. Dec. 454 (holding that a court of equity may compel trustees of the insolvent corporation to collect unpaid stock subscriptions and apply the proceeds to the payment of a corporate debts); Eldred v. Piedmont Land Improv. & Invest. Co. 55 S. C. 78, 32 S. E. 758 (holding that a creditors' bill may be maintained by a judgment creditor of an insolvent corporation, after the issuance and return nulla bona of the execution upon his judgment, to have stockholders pay into the hands of a receiver a dividend due from them on their subscriptions to the capital stock of the corporation).

Relief of this character is given upon the theory that where stock is subscribed to be paid upon the call of the corporation, and it refuses or neglects to make the call, if the interests of the creditors require it, the court of equity will do what it is the duty of the corporation to do. Seoville v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed. 968.

Also, upon the ground that where a corporation becomes insolvent, the property is to be administered as a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, and a court of equity in administering the trust will require stockholders to pay any unpaid subscriptions. Richardson v. Green (Washburn v. Green) 133 U. S. 30, 3 L. ed. 516, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 280.

Judgment creditors of an insolvent corporation whose proper officers refuse to compel payment of its unpaid capital stock may maintain a bill in equity against the corporation and numerous stockholders indebted for their stock, to compel the latter to liquidate such indebtedness. This proceeding is in the nature of a judgment in which the defendants are called upon to answer as garnishees of the principal debt.

prevail. The statute does not impose a joint but a several liability upon the defendants, and they have no common interest in the decree asked for by the bill. The plaintiff seeks to support the action upon the ground that such a proceeding will prevent a multiplicity of suits, but this is a reason in form rather than in substance; for, while the bill has only one number upon the docket and calls itself a single proceeding, it is in reality a bundle of separate suits, each of which is no doubt similar in character to the others, but rests nevertheless upon the separate and distinct liability of one defendant. The liability is legal, and not equitable. It is based upon the stockholder's contract of subscription; an implied term of that contract being the declaration of the statute that a certain contingent liability should follow the subscription. Each contract is a separate obligation, and should be separately enforced. As was pointed out upon the argument by the learned counsel for the defendants, this is not a proceeding to determine how large the assessment should be. For obvious reasons, such an inquiry should be made in equity, and all the stockholders should be parties. But after the rate of assessment has been fixed, and the individual liability of each stockholder has thus been ascertained, the enforcement of such liability is the proper subject of a suit at law, in which the separate rights of the defendant stockholder are distinctively to be considered. Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 380, 27 L. ed. 970, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep.

After judgment and execution against a corporation, resort may be had by a creditor to a suit in equity to ascertain the general indebtedness of the corporation, and compel a ratable contribution of the stockholders upon their indebtedness for stock; and where not otherwise provided by statute this is the only remedy. Faull v. Alaska Gold & S. Min. Co. 8 Sawy. 420, 14 Fed. 657.

An action by a creditor in his own behalf and in behalf of other creditors has also been sustained upon the principle that unpaid subscriptions are part of the capital stock of the corporation, and, like other debts due to it, constitute a fund to which the creditors may look for the payment of their claims, and when the corporation neglects to call them in, equity will enforce their payment. Baines v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 29 Am. St. Rep. 158, 27 Pac. 674, 30 Pac. 776.

And on this theory a suit in equity is held maintainable by a creditor to recover from the stockholder of an insolvent corporation an unpaid balance on his stock subscription, although the liability is not to the creditor, but is for an indebtedness due the corporation, which is treated as an asset, and to which the creditors are entitled in the adjustment of legal demands against the corporation. Macbeth v. Banfield, 45 Or. 553, 106 Am. St. Rep. 670, 78 Pac. 693.

Where it is sought to impound stock subscriptions of the stockholders of a foreign corporation, and in a single action have the amount thereof applied equably to the payment of all the debts of the corporation, an action in the nature of a creditors' bill is the proper remedy, if not the only one. Rule v. Omega Stove & Grate Co. 64 Minn. 326, 67 N. W. 60.

Actions in equity by a creditor in many respects resemble an ordinary creditors' suit, but on account of the peculiar nature of the trusts to be enforced as against stockholders, the action may still be maintained although the remedy by creditors' 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bill is abolished by statute. Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57.

b. Action by creditor or creditors for individual benefit.

In some jurisdictions the right of a judgment creditor who has exhausted his remedy at law, to proceed in equity to have applied upon his own indebtedness, unpaid stock subscriptions, is sustained. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 25 L. ed. 885; Crawford v. Rohrer, 59 Md. 599; Henry v. Vermilion & A. R. Co. 17 Ohio, 187; Ford Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Clement, 97 Ark. 522, 135 S. W. 343.

Moore v. United States One Stave Barrel Co. 238 Ill. 544, 128 Am. St. Rep. 153, 87 N. E. 536, sustains the right of a creditor of a corporation to enforce in equity the liability of stockholders for unpaid stock to the extent of his judgment, where, by statute, stockholders and assignees of stock are made liable for the debts of the corporation, to the extent of the amount unpaid on their stock.

And Ford Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Clement, 97 Ark. 522, 135 S. W. 343, holds that a stockholder of an insolvent corporation, indebted to it for stock, is liable in equity for the claim of a creditor against the corporation, to the extent of his unpaid subscription. To the same effect is Re Putnam, 193 Fed. 464.

These cases rest upon the ground that the liability of a subscriber for the capital stock of a corporation is several, and not joint. By his subscription he becomes a several debtor to the company, and in equity his liability does not cease to be several. A creditors' bill merely subrogates the creditor to the place of the debtor, and garnishes a debt due to the indebted corporation. It does not change the character of the debt attached or garnished. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 25 L. ed. 885.

Other stockholders or other creditors are not necessary parties to a suit to enforce the liability of a stockholder for unpaid stock in favor of a creditor of the corpo-

263." We think the case at bar is somewhat distinguishable from the case above quoted from and from the other cases to the same effect cited by counsel. In those cases the receiver appointed by the court to wind up the affairs of their respective corporations represented the corporations in the suits in which they appeared as parties. In the complaint herein there is an allegation to the effect that, on a showing made to the judge who appointed the receiver that the corporation was entirely insolvent, and that there would be no funds arising from the sale of its assets for distribution amongst the stockholders, he directed the receiver to retain counsel, and institute proper proceedings against the defendants as subscribers of the capital stock of said

Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, to recover the respective amounts remaining unpaid on said subscription or for the stock issued to them, for the benefit of all the creditors of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, and that this suit was filed in compliance with said order. It seems to us the foregoing allegation brings the instant case within the rule laid down in Fletcher v. Bank of Lonoke, 71 Ark. 1, 69 S. W. 580. That was an action commenced by the receiver and other creditors for the use of the German National Bank and certain other creditors of the Bank of Lonoke against the latter bank, G. W. England, and other stockholders thereof, to recover so much of the stock of such shareholders as remained unpaid. Battle, J., in discussing the jurisdiction, nor is it necessary to wind up the corporation in order to enforce such a liability, where the liability of stockholders is several, and not joint. Mountain Lake Land Co. v. Blair, 109 Va. 147, 63 S. E. 751.

Unpaid stock subscriptions constitute a fund for the benefit of the corporate debts, and when a creditor has exhausted his legal remedies against the corporation, and it fails to make an assessment upon its stockholders for unpaid stock, by a bill in equity he may subject such subscriptions to the satisfaction of the judgment, and a stockholder cannot then urge that no call or assessment has been made. Glenn v. Liggett, 135 U. S. 533, 34 L. ed. 262, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 867.

By proper proceedings in equity, as well before as after dissolution, in cases of insolvency or of failure or refusal to levy the requisite assessments, judgment creditors of an insolvent corporation may reach the unpaid balance of a stockholder's subscription, and apply the same to the discharge of their judgments. Universal F. Ins. Co. v. Tabor, 16 Colo. 531, 27 Pac. 890.

A judgment creditor who has exhausted his legal remedy by execution returned nulla bona may alone or with other creditors proceed in equity to enforce the liability of the stockholders for unpaid stock, and to have the amount realized applied upon his indebtedness. Marsh v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 463, Fed. Cas. No. 9,112.

In Turner v. Fidelity Loan Concern, 2 Cal. App. 122, 83 Pac. 62, 70, the cases sustaining the right of a single creditor to proceed in equity against one or several stockholders, to enforce the unpaid stock subscriptions of the latter, are criticized as being in disregard of the rights of stockholders and of the familiar principles upon which equity is commonly administered, since such proceeding leaves out of view the necessity of assessment to fix the liability of stockholders. The determination of the amount of the assessment, of course, would be made only with due regard to the amount of the debts of the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) corporation and the amount of its assets, including unpaid stock subscriptions.

And it has been held that where there are a number of creditors, a single creditor cannot maintain a bill in equity against the stockholders of an insolvent corporation having no corporate assets, to collect unpaid subscriptions for capital stock, but the proceedings must be either by all the creditors or in behalf of all the creditors who desire to make themselves parties to the action. George W. Signor Tie Co. v. Monett & S. W. Constr. Co. 198 Fed. 412.

And in Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49, 51 Am. Rep. 1666, it is said that where insolvency and exhaustion of assets exist, the unpaid capital is not available to any one creditor in satisfaction of his debt, since the unpaid capital is a trust fund belonging not to the corporation, but to its creditors as a whole, and whether the proceeding originates in the name of one, or of several, or of all the creditors, if the object is to enforce unpaid subscriptions, the proceeds of the judgment will be distributed among all the creditors of the corporation ratably.

A creditor may maintain a general creditors' bill to wind up an insolvent bank, and share ratably with all other creditors in the assets; but after he has abandoned whatever remedy, if any, he has at law, he cannot appeal to a court of equity to enforce his lien upon the remaining assets of the corporation, including unpaid stock subscriptions, to the exclusion of other creditors, since the fund in which the creditors claim an interest is a trust fund pledged for the payment of the corporation debts; and it is a doctrine of universal application in chancery, that whenever there is a trust fund over which a court of equity has jurisdiction, all parties interested therein as creditors are to be paid pari passu, unless the law clearly provides a different rule. Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Coldw. 471. And see Reed v. Burg, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 117, 96 N. W. 414; Mann v. Pentz, 3 N. Y. 415, and Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57.

Two or more creditors may join in a bill

tional question raised, says: "The authority of the receiver to bring the action is not shown. We shall treat it as brought by creditors." And on that ground sustained the jurisdiction of the court. Counsel for plaintiff in error, in distinguishing the Arkansas case from the case at bar, quoted the foregoing statement by the judge who delivered the opinion for the court, and says: "Upon the theory that the suit was by the creditors of the bank, of course, equity had jurisdiction." These cases seem to be similar in principle at least. The Arkansas suit was instituted for the use of the German National Bank and certain other creditors of the Bank of Lonoke; and this, by positive direction of the court, was commenced by the receiver for the benefit of all the creditors of the Citizens' Bank & Trust Company, the insolvent corporation, after it was made to appear that the assets of the bank were entirely inadequate to pay the creditors. In Lanigan v. North, 69 Ark. 62, 63 S. W. 62, it was held that a liability created against the stockholders of a banking corporation may be enforced by a creditor in the courts of that state at law, as well as in equity, and this notwithstanding it was held that "the statute definitely fixes the proportion of each debt or claim for which the stockholder is liable." As the laws of Arkansas were in force in the Indian territory at the time the obligation herein was incurred and this suit commenced, the decisions of the supreme court of that state, although rendered after said laws were put in force in said territory, are entitled to great weight. The case of Cook v. Carpenter, 212 Pa. 165, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 900, 103 Am. St. Rep. 854, 61 Atl. 799, 4 Ann. Cas. 723, was a suit in equity by Cook as assignee of an insolvent corporation against various stockholders, to recover unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock. As in this case, the jurisdiction of a court of equity to determine such a cause was raised. Mr. Chief Justice Mitchell, who delivered the opinion of the court, in discussing this proposition, says: "The preliminary question is the jurisdiction in equity. Appellants insist that there is a plain, full, and adequate remedy at law by suits against the

to subject to the payment of their claims the indebtedness of stockholders for unpaid stock in an insolvent corporation, since in such cases there is an identity of interest in the question involved and in the relief sought, and the separate injury sustained by each complainant is produced by the same cause or wrongful action. Moreover, the direct effect of joining several creditors in one bill is to prevent a multiplicity of suits. Hickling v. Wilson, 104 Ill. 54.

c. Action by receiver.

An action in equity to compel stockholders of an insolvent corporation to pay unpaid subscriptions has been sustained where prosecuted by the receiver of the corporation. Hightower v. Thornton, 8 Ga. 486, 52 Am. Dec. 412.

And see Williams v. Traphagen, 38 N. J. Eq. 57, sustaining a bill in equity by the receiver of an insolvent corporation, to enforce the liability of the stockholders for unpaid stock subscriptions.

A receiver in a foreign corporation is entitled by a suit in equity to recover unpaid balances due from stockholders upon their stock subscriptions, to the extent necessary to enable him to pay a creditor in whose behalf he was appointed. Winans v. McKean R. & Nav. Co. 6 Blatchf. 215, Fed. Cas. No. 17,862.

In an equitable suit by the stockholders against a corporation and its creditors, for the appointment of a receiver to have the assets of the corporation marshaled, its liability determined, the assets applied to the payment of the liabilities, and the corporation dissolved, the court may order the receiver to prepare and file an intervening petition against the plaintiffs as stockholders, for the purpose of determining the amount so owing by each upon stock subscriptions. Calef v. Wyandotte Realty Co. 70 Kan. 318, 78 Pac. 816.

In Mann v. Pentz, 3 N. Y. 415, in the enforcement of the unpaid subscriptions of a domestic corporation, the remedy is said to be a creditors' bill, the proceeding to be prosecuted by a creditor or creditors in behalf of all the creditors of the corporation, and it is said that a receiver of the corporation has no power to file such a bill. There is a distinction in this respect between actions to enforce unpaid subscriptions to the stock of a domestic corporation, and actions for a similar purpose as to the stock of a foreign corporation, at least, where the liability by statute is dissimilar. Thus, it has been held that a receiver of a foreign corporation may maintain an action to enforce the liability of resident stockholders for unpaid subscriptions. Dayton v. Borst, 31 N. Y. 435. And applying the New Jersey statute, it is held that the liability of the stockholder of a New Jersey corporation for unpaid subscriptions cannot be enforced by creditors, even by a bill in equity, but it must be by a proceeding by a receiver of the corporation or a trustee in bankruptcy. Manufacturers' Commercial Co. v. Heckscher, 144 App. Div. 601, 129 N. Y. Supp. 556, affirmed and special question answered in 203 N. Y. 560, 96 N. E. 1121.

d. Action by assignee or trustee.

An assignee in insolvency of a corporation may maintain a proceeding in equity against all the delinquent stockholders jointly, to enforce payment of their un-several stockholders defendant, where each can defend upon his own case, untrammelled by differences of fact in the others. That there is a remedy at law by separate actions against the respondents is undeniable; but is it a full and adequate remedy in the sense that it bars the jurisdiction of equity? The subject of the controversy is the collection and administration of corporate assets as a trust fund for the benefit of corporate creditors. Both the control of corporate matters and trust funds are in general the subject of equitable jurisdiction. As was said in Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49, 65, 51 Am. Rep. 166: 'When insolvency and exhaustion of assets [of corporations] exist, the unpaid capital is not available to any one creditor in satisfaction of his debt, because then the whole amount of the unpaid capital is a trust fund, which does not belong to the corporation, but to the whole body of its creditors. Hence, whether the proceeding originates in the name of one or of several or of all the creditors, the result is the same in each. The capital, when recovered, inures to the benefit of all, and must be distributed among all ratably.' This result as to collection, and still more forcibly as to distribution, is not reasonably practicable except in equity. A bill may be filed, as in this case, by assignees representing the corporation, for the benefit of creditors, or, as in Lane's Appeal, supra, by creditors, in their own names in behalf of themselves and others. In the latter case an action at law would present insuperable difficulties, and yet the substantial controversy is the same, and the mere difference in the nominal complainant should not oust in one case the jurisdiction that must be sustained in the other. It is earnestly argued by appellants that in all the cases where a bill has been sustained an accounting was part of the relief sought, and that equitable jurisdiction attached on this ground alone, while in the present case no accounting is asked, as the bill avers that the whole unpaid subscription will be insufficient to pay the debts. It is true that the necessity for an account is a large and influential element in equitable relief; but we do not find it said in any of the cases paid subscriptions. Sanger v. Upton, 91 U. S. 56, 23 L. ed. 220.

Such a proceeding may also be maintained by a trustee in insolvency of a corporation. Glenn v. Semple, 80 Ala. 159, 60 Am. Rep. 92.

e. Joinder of stockholder and creditor as complainants.

Creditors and stockholders may join in a bill in equity to enforce the liability of other stockholders for unpaid shares of the stock, where the corporation is insolvent; and the corporation need not be made a party to the suit. Walser v. Seligman, 21 Blatchf. 130, 13 Fed. 415.

f. Joinder of stockholders as defendants.

The general rule is that, in an action in equity to enforce unpaid stock subscriptions of resident stockholders to a foreign corporation, all the stockholders of the corporation within the jurisdiction should be joined. Leucke v. Tredway, 45 Mo. App. 507.

It has been held that in actions in equity by a creditor to enforce the liability of a stockholder in an insolvent domestic corporation for unpaid stock, unless it is impossible or impracticable, all the stockholders must be made parties in order to enable the court to do complete justice between the stockholders themselves, and so that no one of them may be compelled to pay more than his due proportion, and that all alike may be obliged according to the number of their respective shares and their pecuniary ability, to contribute towards the losses which the company has sustained. Adler v. Milwaukee Patent Brick Mfg. Co. 13 Wis. 57.

And under the ordinary rule of equitable procedure, stockholders may be made parties to a proceeding in equity by creditors to reach their unpaid stock subscriptions, and several judgments may be entered against them for the amounts for which they are assessed. Turner v. Fidelity Loan Concern, 2 Cal. App. 122, 83 Pac. 62, 70.

Where a personal judgment against the stockholders is not sought, and the relief asked is a decree for an assessment, it is unnecessary to make all of them parties. Ibid.

So, when the only object of a bill is to obtain payment of a judgment against a corporation out of its unpaid stock, there is not the same reason for requiring all the stockholders to be made defendants. And a creditor is under no obligation to make all the stockholders of an insolvent corporation defendants in his bill, since it is not his duty to marshal the assets of the corporation, or to adjust the equities between the corporators. He may proceed in a court of equity against one or more delinquent subscribers, to recover the amount of his debt without an account being taken of other indebtedness, and without bringing in all the stockholders for a contribution. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, 25 L. ed. 885.

When the purpose of the suit is to compel payment of a debt out of the unpaid subscription of a single stockholder, the corporation is not a necessary party. If not made a party, it cannot be prejudiced by a judgment against the stockholder, and if the latter goes to trial and judgment without objecting to the nonjoinder of the corporation, he cannot thereafter complain. Potter v. Dear, 95 Cal. 578, 30 Pac. 777. A. G. S.

that its presence or absence is the conclusive jurisdictional fact. In the present case the bill sets up facts that avoid the necessity for an accounting and an assessment. But suppose the answer had denied the averments, and thus made the necessity of an accounting and assessment an issue. That would at once have made the case one cognizable in equity. Citizens' & M. Sav. Bank & T. Co. v. Gillespie, 115 Pa. 564, 9 Atl. 73, was an action at law in which such necessity was part of the issue, and the case had to be sent to a new trial for the reception of incompetent evidence on that point. Whether all the unpaid capital is required for payment of debts, or only part, and, if so, how much, are matters of judgment on the evidence, and different juries are likely to differ in their conclusions. The result would be that in numerous suits by the assignees some stockholders defendant might have to pay their subscriptions in full, while some paid only part, and others perhaps nothing at all. This would be incurring certain inconvenience and quite probable injustice, where the relief should not only be certain, but uniform. As was well said by the learned judge below: "There are more than forty defendants. Most of them live within the jurisdiction, some do not; and it is quite conceivable that there might be hundreds living without the jurisdiction not reachable by our process at law. The question involved in all the cases is substantially the same, namely: Ought the corporation collect in its unpaid capital? It is a pure question of law, and may be decided once for all in one suit as well as in a thousand. If the balance should not be collected from all, then it ought not to be collected from any: If, on the other hand, it should be collected, then none should escape." In the absence of chancery powers in our courts, equitable relief was afforded wherever practicable in common-law forms. When later the legislature granted equitable powers, it was held that, if the subject of a bill was one within the proper and established jurisdiction of chancery, the invention of a new remedy in common-law form, or the extension of an old one, would not necessarily oust the equitable jurisdiction. Wesley Church v. Moore, 10 Pa. 273. The question of such cases turns on the completeness, adequacy, and convenience of the remedy at law, and our decisions have been liberal in the consideration of all these elements. Kirkpatrick v. McDonald, 11 Pa. 387; Bierbower's Appeal, 107 Pa. 14; Brush Electric Co's Appeal, 114 Pa. 574, 7 Atl. 794; Johnston v. Price, 172 Pa. 427, 33 Atl. 688; Gray v. Citizens' Gas Co. 206 Pa. 303, 55 Atl. 988. In the last case it was said by 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

our Brother Dean: "The question raised in this case is not alone whether plaintiff has a remedy at law, for that remedy it clearly has; but whether, in view of the facts, it is an adequate one. It may be conceded that the time is not very remote in our judicial history, when a wronged party sought the intervention of equity, and he could be truthfully met by the reply, you have a remedy at law in an action for damages, such reply would have been the end of his bill. He would have been turned out of court for want of jurisdiction. But this answer is no longer conclusive as to the jurisdiction. Courts now go further and inquire whether, under the facts, the remedy at law is not vexatiously inconvenient, and whether it is so proximately certain as to be adequate to right the wrong complained of." Testing by this standard the numerous actions that would be required at law, and comparing that remedy with the superior certainty, uniformity, and convenience of the present bill, we have no hesitation in holding that it is a proper case for equitable jurisdiction." In Hayden v. Thompson, 17 C. C. A. 592, 38 U. S. App. 361, 71 Fed. 60, the right of a receiver of an insolvent national bank to maintain a bill in equity against the shareholders of the bank collectively, to recover dividends which had been paid in violation of the national banking laws, was upheld. The right to sue in equity was maintained on the ground of avoiding a multiplicity of actions; also on the grounds that the suit was one to redress a fraud and breaches of trust; and generally because the remedy at law was inadequate. The doctrine is well settled in the Federal courts that in those cases where the right of a court of equity to afford redress for wrongful acts depends upon the inadequacy of the legal remedy, courts of equity may exercise jurisdiction, unless the legal remedy is as plain, practical, and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration, as the remedy in equity. In determining whether a suitor should be permitted to sue in equity, the Federal courts have always attached much importance to the fact that the remedy in the latter forum, as compared with the remedy at law, will save time and expense and a multiplicity of suits, and settle finally the rights of all concerned in one litigation. Cockrill v. Cooper, 29 C. C. A. 529, 57 U. S. App. 576, 86 Fed. 7; Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 7 L. ed. 655; Oelrichs v. Spain (Oelrichs v. Williams) 15 Wall. 211, 21 L. ed. 43; Preteca v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 1 C. C. A. 607, 4 U. S. App. 326, 50 Fed. 674. If the foregoing principles are applied to the case at bar, we think it may be safely asserted that the receiver is entitled to invoke the remedial powers and processes of a court of equity, to redress the wrongs of which he complains.

All the other errors assigned by counsel for plaintiff in error hinge upon the ruling of the court upon the foregoing, except the assignment that the judgment is not supported by the evidence. We have examined the record very carefully, and are of the opinion that there was sufficient competent evidence introduced at the trial to support the finding of the court below. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

GEORGE B. NOBLE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

FT. SMITH WHOLESALE GROCERY

(— Okla. —, 127 Pac. 14.)

Sale — bulk sales law — constitutionality.

1. The act of May 26, 1908 (Session Laws 1907-08 of Oklahoma, p. 558), commonly known as the "bulk sales law," which declares that a sale in bulk shall be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against creditors of the seller unless certain specific conditions have been complied with, is not in contravention of, nor repugnant to, the due process clause, nor the equal protection clause, of the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution.

Same — state Constitution.

2. Neither is said act violative of any of the provisions of the state Constitution.

Same — police power.

3. The subject to which the said act relates is clearly within the police powers of the state.

ERROR to the County for Le Flore County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an amount due under a mortgage. Affirmed.

Statement by Robertson, C.:

The Ft. Smith Wholesale Grocery Company filed its petition on June 17, 1909, in the county court of Le Flore county, against George B. Noble, and alleged, in substance, that on December 30, 1908, one W. B. Thomas, a merchant, was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $430 for goods, wares, and merchandise, to secure the payment of which a chattel mortgage was executed, and which covered his stock of merchandise, located in said county; that on February 5, 1909, the defendant, who was sheriff of Le Flore county, acting under and by virtue of the authority of a writ of attachment issued out of the county court of Le Flore county, in a suit by the McAlister Grocery Company against said W. B. Thomas, levied upon and took possession of and sold the said stock so covered by the chattel mortgage, without paying the debt which said chattel mortgage secured. At the time of the levy of the attachment process, default had been made in the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage, but the mortgagor remained in possession, and there was due to the mortgagee the sum of $350, with interest, for which judgment was prayed. A copy of the mortgage was set up as an exhibit to the petition, and is in the usual form, and provides that the mortgagor shall retain possession of the stock, and that he may sell the same or any portion thereof for cash, and to keep an account of sales, and make a statement of the sales to the mortgagee as stated at intervals. The said mortgage was duly executed and filed for record with the register of deeds of said county prior to the levy of the attachment. The defendant answered and admitted all

Note.—In a note in 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 178, are gathered the cases considering the question whether a chattel mortgage is within the meaning of a sales in bulk sales law. No case considering the question other than those therein referred to have been found except NOBLE v. FT. SMITH GROCERY Co. The question was raised in 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Lee v. Gillen, 90 Neb. 730, 134 N. W. 278, but the court declined to pass upon it and disposed of the case on another point.

the allegations of the petition, except the legality of the mortgage, claiming that the execution of the mortgage by the debtor was a violation of the "sale of merchandise in bulk act" (Session Laws 1907-08, p. 558), and that by reason thereof the mortgage was void and of no effect, as against the attaching creditor, the McAlester Grocery Company. The case was tried to the court without a jury upon an agreed statement of fact, and a judgment was rendered by the court in favor of plaintiff for the amount due under the mortgage, and holding the mortgage valid.

Robertson, C., filed the following opinion.

There are but two questions raised by the record in this case, viz.:

First. Is the act of May 26, 1908 (Session Laws of Okla. 1907-08, p. 558), constitutional?

Second. Is the mortgage of W. B. Thomas to the Ft. Smith Wholesale Grocery Company such a transfer of a stock of goods, wares, and merchandise as to require a compliance with the terms of such act to render it valid as against the creditors of the mortgagor?

That the act in question is valid and the proper exercise of legislative power and authority there seems to be no doubt. In discussing this identical subject, the author of the note in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 331, says: "Statutes regulating the sale and purchase of goods in bulk are of very recent origin. The earliest was that of Louisiana in 1896, but, like mushrooms, they have sprung up in twenty-two states and territories, and already the courts of twelve have passed upon them. The provisions of all have but the one aim—to prevent the sale of goods in bulk until the creditors of the seller have been paid in full. . . . The provisions vary somewhat, but there is a very close similarity in the wording of most of them, and a central idea may probably be traced in all.” Section 1, Acts 1907–08, reads as follows: “Section 1. The transfer of any portion of a stock of goods, wares, or merchandise otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade, in the regular and usual prosecution of the transferor’s business, or the transfer of an entire such stock in bulk, shall be presumed to be fraudulent and void as against the creditors of such transferor, and such presumption may be rebutted only by a proposed transferee showing that, at least ten days before the transfer and in good faith, he made a full and explicit inquiry of the transferor as to the names and addresses of each and all of his creditors, and that he demanded and received from such transferor at least ten days before such transfer, a list of the names and addresses of all of the creditors of such transferor, showing the amount owing each, which statement must be sworn to by such transferor and shall include a declaration that it is a correct list of all of his creditors with the postoffice addresses and the amount owing each; and that at least ten days before such transfer, he notified or caused to be notified of such proposed transfer, personally or by registered mail, each of the creditors of the transferor of whom such transferee had knowledge, or could, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, acquire knowledge; and that such purchase was made by him in good faith for a fair consideration actually paid.” And section 3 of the same act is as follows: “Transfers under this act shall include sales, exchanges, and assignments, but nothing contained in this act shall apply to transfers made by executors, administrators, receivers, assignors under a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors, trustees in bankruptcy, or to sales under judicial process.” The supreme court of the state of Connecticut, in construing the provisions of Pub. Acts 1903, chap. 72, p. 49, which is very similar to the Oklahoma statute, said: “The act under consideration is not unconstitutional, either as applying only to a particular class, namely, retail dealers, or as depriving such persons of their property without due process of law. A law which is uniform in its operation is not rendered invalid merely because of the limited number of persons who will be affected by it. The act in question applies equally to all the people of the state who may engage in the business described. The limitation of the act to retail dealers is not an arbitrary classification.” Walp v. Moar, 76 Conn. 515, 57 Atl. 277. In John P. Squire & Co. v. Tellier, 185 Mass. 18, 102 Am. St. Rep. 322, 69 N. E. 312, the court sustained it under the police power and also under chapter 1, § 1, art. 4, of the state Constitution, which permits the legislature “to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable orders, laws, statutes, and ordinances . . . as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of this commonwealth. . . . Although the requirements of the act are very strict, we cannot say that the determination of the legislature as between the interests of owners of stocks of merchandise and their creditors was so far wrong as to render the statute unconstitutional. Within certain limitations it is for the legislature to judge of the policy and expediency of a law if in other respects they have power to enact it.”

In Neas v. Borches, 109 Tenn. 398, 97 Am. St. Rep. 851, 71 S. W. 50, the court said in construing a similar statute: “That it is merely a regulation of the business of merchandising; that it is not class legislation, and that the limitation of the act to merchants is not an arbitrary classification; that it does not take away the property of the citizen, but only regulates the sales of merchandise in such manner as to prevent fraud.” In McDaniels v. J. J. Connelly Shoe Co. 30 Wash. 549, 60 L.R.A. 947, 94 Am. St. Rep. 889, 71 Pac. 37, the court said. “The act, it is true, does prohibit owners of certain kinds of property from disposing of it in a particular way without complying with certain conditions, but it is not for that reason necessarily unconstitutional.” In Moore Dry Goods Co. v. Rowe, 97 Miss. 775, 53 So. 626, a case decided December 5, 1910, it was held by the court in construing a statute with similar provisions that “the statute in question is not repugnant to the due process nor the equal protection clauses of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.” And cited with approval Lemieux v. Young, 211 U. S. 489, 53 L. ed. 295, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174; Kidd, D. & P. Co. v. Musselman Grocer Co. 217 U. S. 461, 54 L. ed. 839, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 606; John P. Squire & Co. v. Tellier, 185 Mass. 18, 102 Am. St. Rep. 322, 69 N. E. 312; Walp v. Moar, 76 Conn. 515, 57 Atl. 277; Neas v. Borches, 109 Tenn. 398, 97 Am. St. Rep. 851, 71 S. W. 50; McDaniels v. J. J. Con- nelly Shoe Co. 30 Wash. 549, 60 L.R.A. 947, 94 Am. St. Rep. 889, 71 Pac. 37,—all involving statutes fundamentally like this so far as affected by these clauses of the Constitution.

In Kidd, D. & P. Co. v. Musselman Grocer Co. 217 U. S. 461, 54 L. ed. 839, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 806, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice White, in construing a Michigan statute, which to all intents and purposes is like the one now under consideration, said: "The errors assigned embody the proposition that the sales in bulk act in question was not a valid exercise of the police powers of the state, and is hence repugnant to the 14th Amendment, because wanting in due process of law, and denying the equal protection of the laws. Substantially the same arguments are urged as are presented in Lemieux v. Young, 211 U. S. 489, 53 L. ed. 295, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 174. . . . In the Lemieux Case the validity of legislation of the general character of that embodied in the Michigan statute was passed on. A Connecticut law, the constitutionality of which was particularly involved, was held to be a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and not to be repugnant to the due process or equal protection clauses of the 14th Amendment, although it avoided as against creditors sales by retail dealers in commodities of their entire stock at a single transaction, and not in the regular course of business, unless notice of intention to make such sale was recorded seven days before its consummation. . . . 'As the subject to which the act relates was clearly within the police powers of the state, the statute cannot be held to be repugnant to the due process clause of the 14th Amendment, because of the nature or character of the regulations which the statute embodies, unless it clearly appears that those regulations are so beyond all reasonable relation to the subject to which they are applied as to amount to a mere arbitrary usurpation of power. Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425, 46 L. ed. 623, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 425. This, we think, is clearly not the case. So, also, as the statute makes a classification based upon a reasonable distinction, and one which, as we have seen, has been generally applied in the exertion of the police power over the subject, there is no foundation for the proposition that the result of the enforcement of the statute would be to deny the equal protection of the laws.' These principles are decisive against the contentions made in this case, as we do not find in the provisions of the Michigan statute, when compared with the Connecticut statute, such differences as would warrant us in holding that 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the regulations of the Michigan statute are so beyond all reasonable relation to the subject to which they are applied, as to amount to mere arbitrary usurpation of power. The purpose of both statutes is the same, viz., to prevent the defrauding of creditors by the secret sale of substantially all of a merchant's stock of goods in bulk, and both require notice of such sale, and make void, as to creditors, the sale without notice."

The same learned judge in delivering the opinion in Lemieux v. Young, supra, quoted with approval the language of the supreme court of errors of the state of Connecticut which sustained the bulk sales law of the state, and which quotation is as follows: "It does not seem to us, either from a consideration of the requirements themselves of the act, or of the facts of the case before us, that the restrictions placed by the legislature upon sales of the kind in question are such as will cause such serious inconvenience to those affected by them as will amount to an unconstitutional deprivation of property. A retail dealer who owes no debts may lawfully sell his entire stock without giving the required notice. One who is indebted may make a valid sale without such notice by paying his debts, even after the sale is made. Insolvent and fraudulent vendors are those who will be chiefly affected by the act, and it is for the protection of creditors against sales by them of their entire stock at a single transaction, and not in the regular course of business, that its provisions are aimed. It is, of course, possible that an honest and solvent retail dealer might, in consequence of the required notice, before the sale, lose an opportunity of selling his business, or suffer some loss from the delay of a sale occasioned by the giving of such notice, but 'a possible application to extreme cases' is not the test of the reasonableness of public rules and regulations. . . . 'The essential quality of the police power as a governmental agency is that it imposes upon persons and property burdens designed to promote the safety and welfare of the general public.' . . . That the court below was right in holding that the subject with which the statute dealt was within the lawful scope of the police authority of the state, we think, is too clear to require discussion. As pointed out by Vann, J., in a dissenting opinion delivered by him in Wright v. Hart, 182 N. Y. 350, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 338, 75 N. E. 404, 3 Ann. Cas. 263, the subject has been with great unanimity considered not only to be within the police power, but, as requiring the exertion of such power, he said: "Twenty states as well as the Federal government in the District of Columbia, have similar statutes, some with provisions more stringent than our own, and all aimed at the suppression of an evil that is thus shown to be almost universal. California, Civil Code, p. 3440, as amended March 10, 1903 (Stat. 1903, chap. 100, p. 111); Colorado, Session Laws 1903, chap. 110, p. 225; Connecticut, Pub. A statute with the same object attained by a similar remedy has been held valid by the highest courts in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Tennessee, and Washington. John P. Squire & Co. v. Tellier, 185 Mass. 18, 102 Am. St. Rep. 322, 69 N. E. 312; Walp v. Moorar, 76 Conn. 515, 57 Atl. 277; Neas v. Borches, 109 Tenn. 398, 97 Am. St. Rep. 851, 71 S. W. 50; McDaniels v. J. J. Roney, 93 Md. 432, 49 Atl. 661."

A similar statute was upheld by our territorial supreme court in the case of Williams v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 15 Okla. 477, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 334, 82 Pac. 496, 6 Ann. Cas. 970, and the reasons given there are applicable to the case at bar. We feel that it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further. The foregoing decisions, in our opinion, amply sustain the constitutionality of the statute in its every phase. The right to pass such an act cannot, in our opinion, be questioned, as certainly it is a proper subject of legislation, and does not contravene in any sense the provisions of, nor is it in any way repugnant to, the due process clause, or the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Neither is the act violative of any provision of our state Constitution.

Having disposed of this question, let us now determine whether or not the execution and delivery of a chattel mortgage is a "transfer" of a stock of goods, wares, or merchandise otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade. Section 3 of said article provides: "Transfers under this act shall include sales, exchanges, and assignments," etc.

The agreed statement of fact shows that Thomas, the mortgagor, was to remain in possession of the stock and sell the same at retail for cash. The mortgage contained the usual defeasance clause, and gave Thomas, the mortgagor, the right to pay the debt and have the mortgage released at any time. He was in possession when the attachment order was executed. The debt was past due, and no foreclosure had been attempted by the mortgagee. A transfer under this act, to be void, must be either by sale, exchange, or assignment. Is a chattel mortgage, such as was given in this case, either a sale, an exchange, or an assignment? If it is, then it comes clearly within the inhibition of the act, and will be void as to other creditors. If it is not a sale, exchange, or assignment, then it is not within the inhibition of the act, and is valid against attachment creditors. It seems to be admitted by the parties, and correctly, too, that a chattel mortgage is not an exchange, but it is contended earnestly by counsel for plaintiff in error that it is a sale, as well as an assignment.

A transfer, as defined by Bouvier's Law Dictionary, is: "The act by which the owner of a thing delivers it to another person with the intent of passing the rights which he has in it to the latter." Counsel for plaintiff in error, on page 13 of their brief, contend that under this definition a chattel mortgage is a transfer. We cannot agree with the contention, for the mortgagor never surrendered possession under the mortgage, but only agreed to deliver possession upon default or breach of conditions of the mortgage. And the creditor, if so disposed, even after a breach of conditions, could, and in this case did, fail to take possession, and yet the instrument was none the less a chattel mortgage with the possession in the mortgagor, who still had the full right of redemption under the laws of this state.

Bouvier's definition of the word "Sale" is as follows: "An agreement by which one of two contracting parties, called the seller, gives a thing and passes the title to it, in exchange for a certain price." But, under this definition, it is necessary that the title to the thing sold should pass before there would be a sale, and no one surely will contend that under the Oklahoma laws and decisions the title to property covered by chattel mortgage passes until after default and foreclosure.

In Litz v. Exchange Bank, 15 Okla. 564, 83 Pac. 790, it is said: "Under the provisions of our statute, a mortgage does not convey title to the property mortgaged, but only creates a lien thereon. Hence a mortgagor has the undoubted right to pay the indebtedness, which thereby extinguishes the lien, at any time before the property is sold by the mortgagee. One of the objects of the statutory notice of ten days, which is required to be given in case the mortgagee attempts to foreclose his mortgage, is to give the mortgagor an opportunity to pay the indebtedness, and thereby extinguish the lien upon the property." See also Edmisson v. Drumm-Flato Commission Co. 13 Okla. 440, 73 Pac. 958. Neither is a chattel mortgage given under the circumstances such as we find in the case at bar a conditional sale. "Whether there is a debt between the parties is an important inquiry in determining the nature of the transaction. If there was a previous debt, and this was not extinguished by the sale, but remained as a subsisting obligation, the bill of sale, when connected with the debt by proper evidence, will be regarded as a mortgage. But if the previous debt was extinguished by the sale, and the vendor has the privilege of repurchasing within a given time, the transaction is a conditional sale." Jones, Chat. Mortg. 5th ed. § 27, and cases cited. "If a pre-existing debt was extinguished by a bill of sale, a verbal agreement by the creditor to resell on the debtor's fulfilling certain conditions makes the transaction a conditional sale, and not a mortgage. If the previous debt was not discharged by the sale, its continuance raises a strong presumption that the transaction was a mortgage." Ibid. "Sale to be distinguished from mortgage.—So sale is to be distinguished from mortgage, which, in most of the states, is a conditional sale of personal property as security for the payment of a debt as a performance of some other obligation, though, in some states, it is regarded, like the mortgage upon land, as a mere lien upon the property, rather than a conditional sale." 1 Mechem, Sales, § 36. "A sale is a contract for the transfer of property from one person to another for a valuable consideration." 2 Kent, Com. 625. "A sale or exchange is a transaction of property from one man to another in consideration of some price or recompense in value." 2 Bl. Com. 446. A "sale is a word of precise legal import, both at law and equity. It means, at all times, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) a contract between parties to give and to pass rights of property for money,—which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought and sold." Per Wayne, J., Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. 495, 544, 12 L. ed. 1170, 1191. "A sale is the transfer of the absolute title to property for a certain agreed price." Story. "A sale is the transfer by mutual agreement of the absolute title to certain property for a certain price." Schouler. "A sale of chattel is an exchange thereof for money." Parsons.

This settles the question conclusively that a chattel mortgage is not a sale, nor a conditional sale; and the ingenious and able argument of counsel in support of the theory must also fail in the light of the laws and adjudicated cases arrayed against it. Then, having thus disposed of the terms "sale" and "exchange," we must determine whether or not the chattel mortgage herein was an assignment. As we understand the matter, the difference between a chattel mortgage and an assignment is that a chattel mortgage is merely a pledge, lien, or security for a sum of money due; while an assignment passes the complete title with the possession to the assignee, without the defeasance clause, and it is a wiping out or full settlement of the debt, while the chattel mortgage does not extinguish the debt.

"An assignment is a transfer or setting over of property, or of some right or interest therein, from one person to another, the term denoting not only the act of transfer, but also the instrument by which it is effected." Burrill, Assignments, 6th ed. § 1. "Distinguished from mortgages.—The enactment in many states of statutes prohibiting preferences in general assignments has afforded a ground of attack on partial assignments with preferences sometimes successfully resorted to by nonpreferred creditors, where the claims of other creditors are satisfied by the debtor with mortgages or other conveyances. A mortgage resembles an assignment more closely in the leading feature of being a security or provision for debt and involving a resulting interest to the grantor on a certain contingency. An assignment is more than a security for the payment of debts. It is an absolute appropriation of property for their payment. It does not create a lien in favor of creditors upon property which in equity is still regarded as the assignor's, but it passes both the legal and the equitable title to the property absolutely beyond the control of the assignor. There remains, therefore, no equity of redemption in the property, and the trust which results to the assignor in the unemployed balance does not indicate such an equity." Burrill, Assignments, 6th ed. § 6. Gardiner, J., in the case of Leitch v. Hollister, 4 N. Y. 211, speaking of the assignments, observes as follows: "The conveyance, whatever may be its form, is in effect a mortgage of the property transferred. A trust as to the surplus results from the nature of the security, and is not the object, or one of the objects, of the assignment. Whether expressed in the instrument or left to implication is immaterial. The assignee does not acquire the entire legal and equitable interest in the property conveyed, subject to the trust, but a specific lien upon it." Johnson v. Robinson, 68 Tex. 399, 4 S. W. 625. In Van Patten v. Thompson, 73 Iowa, 103, 34 N. W. 763, the court says: "Chattel mortgages covering substantially all of the mortgagor's property and aggregating all that the property is really worth do not amount, in effect, to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, with preferences, even though they provide that the mortgagees shall take immediate possession and sell the goods, unless the mortgagor regards the transaction as a complete disposition of his property." In Manufacturers' & M. Bank v. Bank of Pennsylvania, 7 Watts & S. 335, 42 Am. Dec. 240, it was contended that the conveyance was an assignment in trust to pay a particular creditor, and not a mortgage. But the court observed: "It is clearly a mortgage limited to a trustee in fee with a power to sell, and the statute has regard not to a conditional conveyance which may revert the property in the debtor, but to an absolute assignment to sell and pay at all events." In Johnson's Appeal, 103 Pa. 373, it was held that "no particular form of words is necessary to constitute an assignment . . . under the act of June 14, 1836, . . . but the transaction must be in substance an absolute transfer of property of the assignor in trust for the benefit of his creditors. A mortgage executed by the assignor to a trustee for creditors, in consideration of an extension of time for the payment of the assignor's debts, being a mere security, cannot be treated as an assignment for the benefit of creditors under said act." "A failing debtor conveyed by mortgage all of his property, not exempt by law from execution, to four of his creditors. He owed them about $1,500. The value of the goods conveyed was $1,700. The instrument reserved to the mortgagor any surplus that might remain after paying said indebtedness. Held, on its face, the instrument constituted a mortgage, and not a deed of assignment." Smith v. Moore, 2 Ind. Terr. 126, 48 S. W. 1025. "Where an insolvent debtor makes conveyance of the whole of his property by chattel mortgage to one or more of his creditors in good faith, for the security of a bona fide indebtedness, although in exclusion of other creditors, the transaction lacks the essential elements of a trust for the benefit of creditors, and cannot be brought within the range of the statutes relating to voluntary assignments." Smith-M'Cord Dry Goods Co. v. Jno. B. Farwell Co. 6 Okla. 318, 50 Pac. 149; Nix v. Underhill, 8 Okla. 123, 56 Pac. 959; Smith v. Baker, 5 Okla. 326, 49 Pac. 61; Bessant v. Levy, 5 Okla. 340, 40 Pac. 1118; Turner Hardware Co. v. Reynolds, 2 Ind. Terr. 49, 47 S. W. 307. "Chattel mortgage authorizing the mortgagee to take possession forthwith, and, in addition to the usual power of sale upon default, authorizing the mortgagee to sell at private sale or in the usual course of trade, does not vest any actual title in the mortgagee, and is not inconsistent with the rights of the mortgagors, or their creditors, who may acquire liens to redeem at any time. Hence such mortgage is not void as a general assignment with preferences." Cluett v. Rosenthal, 100 Mich. 193, 43 Am. St. Rep. 446, 58 N. W. 1009. "A chattel mortgage on all of the mortgagor's property intended as a lien only, the mortgagor retaining possession and intending to continue in business, and not to convey the title or right of possession, does not operate as an assignment in favor of the mortgagee as a creditor." Noyes v. Ross, 23 Mont. 425, 47 L.R.A. 400, 75 Am. St. Rep. 543, 59 Pac. 367.

In the case of Hannah & Hogg v. Richter Brewing Co. 149 Mich. 220, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 178, 119 Am. St. Rep. 674, 112 N. W. 713, 12 Ann. Cas. 344, the court expressly holds that "a chattel mortgage is not within the meaning of a statute forbidding the sale, transfer, or assignment of a stock of goods in bulk without certain preliminary proceedings." In Wasserman v. McDonnell, 190 Mass. 326, 76 N. E. 959, it was contended a chattel mortgage of a stock in trade was invalid because of the statute invalidating sales in bulk of stock in trade. The court held, however, that such a statute had no application to the case at bar. The court used the following language in passing on the question: "We are of opinion, however, that this act has no application to the case at bar. The object of the statute was to protect creditors against fraudulent sales. Here no fraud was shown. The mortgage was on six months' time, and was given for a valuable consideration. It does not appear that when it was given the mortgagor had any creditors except the mortgagee. The mortgage was duly recorded." In McAvoy v.

Jennings, 44 Wash. 79, 87 Pac. 53, a trust deed for the benefit of certain creditors was held not to be within the terms and meaning of the sales in bulk act of Washington; the court saying: "The contention that the transfer was void by reason of its being in contravention of what is termed the 'sales in bulk' law, chap. 109, p. 222, Laws of 1901, is untenable, for the reason that this was not a sale within the contemplation of that act. The object of that law was to prevent the vendor, generally a retail merchant, from escaping his responsibilities to his creditors by disposing of all his stock, pocketing the proceeds, and leaving his creditors without redress. But in this case Jennings did not purchase the stock, and, under the terms of the agreement, was not to pay any portion of the value of the stock of which he took possession to the owners. But he simply acted as a trustee, so far as the goods assigned to him went, for the benefit of the creditors."

We fully appreciate the views expressed by the learned counsel when they recite the evil effects which flow from the abuse of the chattel mortgage in cases similar to the one under consideration, but it is not the province of courts to write into statutes words that the legislature did not insert, or to give a meaning to a law that was not intended to be given by the lawmakers. The legislature, with full authority in the premises, prohibited transfers by sale, exchange, and assignment, unless certain conditions have been complied with. The term "mortgage" or "chattel mortgage" was not included in the list. Why, we do not know. Had the legislature intended to include other methods of transfer, no doubt it would have been done. Certainly a chattel mortgage is not such a transfer as was meant by the legislature, and therefore does not come within the inhibition of said act, for the terms of the statute are plain and unequivocal.

We conclude, therefore, that Acts 1907-08 (Session Laws [Okla.] p. 558), are not in conflict with the organic law, either state or Federal, and that a chattel mortgage does not come within the inhibition of said act, and is not void as to the attaching creditors.

The judgment therefore should be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN MARTIN JOHNSON, by Carolina Locke, Guardian ad Litem, Resp't.,
v.

CITY OF NEW YORK, App't.

Municipal corporation — laying sewer — protection of children.

A municipal corporation which closes, by means of barricades, a street in which a deep sewer is being made, is not liable for injury to a child which passes the barricade and slips into the trench from a pile of sand deposited by the side of the trench for use in the work, upon which he goes to play, in the absence of anything to charge it with notice of some special danger to children in the conditions which exist.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Kings County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James D. Bell and Frank Julian Price, with Mr. Archibald R. Watson, for appellant:

The evidence showed the plaintiff clearly guilty of contributory negligence, and the complaint should have been dismissed.

Brennan v. New York, 51 N. Y. S. R. 617, 22 N. Y. Supp. 304; Reynolds v. New York Co. & H. R. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 248.

Defendant was not guilty of negligence.

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, a lad of twelve, fell into a trench which the defendant's contractor had made for the building of a sewer in Gold street, between Tillary and Johnson streets, in the borough of Brooklyn. He sustained severe injuries, and through his mother as guardian he instituted this suit to recover damages. At trial term he recovered a verdict which was sustained by a divided court at the appellate division, and the defendant has brought its appeal to this court. The case is one which must arouse sympathy, even if it cannot bear the test of rigorous legal rules, for the unfortunate plaintiff has doubtless sustained injuries which may affect the whole of his life. It is possible that this consideration may have had its influence in securing a verdict that was not satisfactory to either of the litigants, for both moved to have it set aside. The grounds of these motions are not set forth in the record, but obviously the plaintiff's counsel was not satisfied with the amount ($2,500), and the counsel for the defendant held to his contention, made upon the motions to dismiss the complaint, that the evidence did not support a verdict for the plaintiff.

We think the motion to dismiss the complaint, made at the close of the plaintiff's case, should have been granted; but the necessity for such a ruling was made even more apparent by the evidence adduced on behalf of the defendant. The whole case was then so conclusive against the plaintiff as to require the trial court to grant the motion when it was renewed.

There is no controversy as to the physical conditions which existed in Gold street at the time of the accident. The defendant, through its contractors, was constructing a sewer 12 feet in diameter, and this was to be laid at a depth variously stated of from 25 to 35 feet. The trench for this work was 16 feet or more in width at the top, and left undisturbed a narrow strip of the roadway on either side, probably not more than 6 or 7 feet in width. The walls of the trench were retained by sheathing which, in some places, had been driven down so that the upper end was level with the street, and in other places it protruded somewhat above this level. At intervals along the line of the work there were timbers or planks laid transversely from which were suspended chain hangers for the temporary support of the sewer and other pipes. Along the side of the trench was a "concrete mixer," which apparently occupied a part of the street and extended over into the sidewalk. This structure was movable, and was changed from point to point as the work progressed. Cement, crushed stone, and sand were brought to this mixer, and after being converted into a semifluid concrete, the material was taken in wheelbarrows to the trench. The sand thus delivered was evidently brought in dump carts or wagons, and deposited in such piles as would naturally form in that method of delivery. This was the general condition in Gold street on the 20th day of May, 1908, when the plaintiff was hurt. After the close of the afternoon session of the public school, he came to a place, near the school, where there was a pile of sand 3 feet or more in height, which extended over the walk about 2 feet and out into the street from 5 to 10 feet, so that the outer margin came to a point within a foot, more or less, of the trench. This was near the mixer, which was then about 30 or 40 feet from the entrance to the school. The plaintiff went to this pile where he saw another boy playing, and as he started to go home he slipped into the trench.

His own narrative is as follows: "I tried to get up and go home, my foot slipped, and I went down into the hole. I do not know how big this sand pile was. I went up on it and my foot slipped; my foot slipped on the sand; it caved under me and I went down with it, down into this hole." The only other eyewitness to the whole of the accident was a boy named Richards, who was on the sand pile with the plaintiff. This witness testified: "Between the side of the hole and the sidewalk, and on the sidewalk, on the day the boy was hurt, for about 10 feet there was, well, about 3 feet of sand. This sand was near the hole, about a foot and a half from it. It extended over the sidewalk about 10 feet from it, the edges. I was on that pile of sand. When he [plaintiff] got ready to go home, he started to stand up; when he did he slid right in the hole off the sand. He was sitting down in the sand, playing. He started to get right up and slid down in the hole. There was nothing on the edge of the hole to keep anybody from sliding in." No witness attempts to state how long this particular pile of sand had been there, although there is a bit of testimony from which it may be inferred that the same condition had existed on the previous day. The trend of all the evidence, however, indicates that the conditions were constantly changing as the materials were needed at different points in the progress of the work, and it seems to be a fair inference, even from the testimony for the plaintiff, that this identified pile of sand had not existed for so long a time as to charge defendant or its contractors with notice of probable danger from that one source. This is practically the whole of the story for the plaintiff. There are a number of witnesses who testify as to the general situation, but they add nothing of importance to what has been referred to or quoted.

In what was the defendant negligent? Counsel for the respondent argues that it was the duty of the defendant to keep the street in a safe condition, and he attempts to support his contention by citing such cases as McGarry v. Loomis, 63 N. Y. 104, 20 Am. Rep. 510; McGuire v. Spence, 91 N. Y. 303, 43 Am. Rep. 668; Weston v. Troy, 139 N. Y. 281, 34 N. E. 780, and other similar cases which are obviously not applicable to such a situation as is disclosed by the record in this case. It is horn book law that a municipality is required to exercise reasonable care to keep its streets in a safe condition for travelers and all other persons who may lawfully use them. But that is not the rule which governs a case like this. Cities and villages must build sewers and other conduits, the construction of which necessitates the taking up of pavements and the making of excavations. Manifestly a street that is torn up by such operations cannot be safe in the ordinary acceptation of the term, for the very prosecution of the work creates obvious dangers. In such circumstances a municipality is chargeable with a reasonable degree of care and diligence in employing proper safeguards to prevent wayfarers and others lawfully using a street, from getting into pitfalls and places of hidden danger. That was done in the present instance by barricading the street against vehicular traffic, and by the display of signs indicating that the street was closed. Even that was apparently a work of supererogation, at least by day, for the character of the excavation and its surroundings were such as to bar the usual access to the street, and to give notice to all that for the time being it was closed. For obvious reasons the sidewalks had to be kept open for the use of the abutters and their families, and for the children who attended the public school situate in the block, but not even a child, old enough to go to school, could have misapprehended the situation. The defendant and its contractors had apparently done everything for the safety of the public that reasonable prudence could have dictated, except to fence off the trench or to station a watchman at each sand pile. Nothing in the previous course of the work had indicated any necessity for such extraordinary precautions, and the record contains no suggestion that such a course would have been practicable, even if the law were so stringent as to require it. Doubtless a barrier might have been erected that would have rendered impossible such an accident as befell this plaintiff, but we are not informed whether the sewer could have been built under such conditions. It is evident, also, that a man might have been stationed at each pile of sand to warn away the children, but the record contains no suggestion that children had previously played in the sand. Apart from all this, however, there is the conclusive answer that neither the defendant nor its contractors were bound to go to any such length, unless previous experience with children there might have suggested the necessity for greater care than they exercised. They were not insurers against accident. They were simply bound to use such reasonable care to prevent accident as the nature of the work and the surroundings would suggest to men of ordinary prudence and foresight. It may be that under certain circumstances, which are not here shown to have existed, the defendant and its contractors might have been chargeable with a degree of care respecting children that would not be necessary as to adults. Children have playful instincts which render some dangerous places peculiarly attractive. For purpose of illustration we may refer to the "mixer" in this case as an example. If, for instance, that mechanical appliance had been allowed to continue in motion unattended by workmen with the result that it had habitually attracted children to positions of danger, we might have a case in which even a municipality in the prosecution of work in a public street would be chargeable with a degree of care which, in similar circumstances, but upon private property, could not be imputed to an owner of such an appliance. The well-known "turntable" case (Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L.R.A. 724, 45 Am. St. Rep. 615, 39 N. E. 1068, in which it was held that the defendant was not liable for injuries to a child at a turntable that was left unlocked and unguarded on the railroad lands, was decided upon the principle that one who maintains such an appliance upon his own lands is under no obligation, even to a trespassing infant, to keep it in a safe condition. Conceding that the rule of that case has no application to a similar situation in a public street, we do not perceive how that can help this plaintiff.

The rule of reasonable care must be considered, not in the light of the accident which happened, but with reference to what ordinary prudence should have anticipated as likely to happen. In the absence of evidence tending to show that the defendant was chargeable with notice of some special danger to children in the conditions which existed, it would be as reasonable to hold that, even if there had been a fence around the trench, there should have been a watchman to prevent mischievous boys from climbing over it, as it would be to decide that the defendant should have anticipated that a boy was going to slide into this excavation from a pile of sand 3 feet in height and covering an area of from 8 to 10 feet in diameter.

We have considered the case upon the evidence for the plaintiff, giving him the benefit of every inference which can legitimately be drawn in his favor. We might go farther, and demonstrate by the more complete and convincing evidence adduced for the defendant, that the conditions were clearly such as to impute to the defendant no negligence in respect of the unfortunate accident to the plaintiff. This we deem unnecessary, since the plaintiff's case must fail on his own showing.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ELIZABETH GEROMINI

v.

LOUIS BRUNELLI.

(214 Mass. 492, 102 N. E. 67.)

Husband and wife — alienation of affections — necessity of malice.

Malice is an ingredient of liability to a woman for the alienation of her husband's affections, if his conduct was caused by advice given with a friendly desire to assist him, although it may have been mistaken.

Note. — Malice as essential to an action for alienation of affections, in absence of meretricious relations.

As to the effect of the fact that the husband or wife of the plaintiff, in an action for alienation of affections or criminal conversation, was the active and aggressive party, see the notes to Scott v. O'Brien, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 742, and Miller v. Pearce, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 332.

Generally.

It may be laid down as a general rule, at least where there is no element of seduction or adultery, that a defendant in an action for alienation of affections is not liable unless he acted maliciously whether he is a parent or stranger to the plaintiff's spouse. It is true that, as is hereinafter shown, it requires more evidence to establish malice on the part of the parent, than is necessary in the case of a stranger, but this difference is an evidential one merely.

It does not affect the truth of the above statement that it is always material to inquire whether the defendant was influenced by malevolent or improper motives (Boland v. Stanley, 88 Ark. 562, 129 Am. St. Rep. 114, 115 S. W. 163); and the question is ordinarily one for the jury (Kelso v. Kelso, 43 Ind. App. 115, 86 N. E. 1001).

It is held that in actions of this character, the term "malice" does not necessarily mean that which must proceed from a spiteful, malignant, or revengeful disposition, but implies merely a conduct injurious to another, though proceeding from an ill-regulated mind not sufficiently cautious before it occasions the injury. If the conduct is unjustifiable, and actually caused the injury complained of, malice in law will be implied. Boland v. Stanley, supra; Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397.

Strangers.

While, as will be seen in a subsequent division of this note, the law is inclined to be indulgent toward a parent who by interfering, alienates the affections of his

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Norfolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for causing plaintiff's husband to desert her, which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. O. Howard, for plaintiff:

There is a marked distinction between the rights and privileges of a parent in such cases, and those of a mere intermeddling stranger.

Slight acts tending to dissuade the wife from living with her husband are requisite to a cause of action.

Bennett v. Smith, 21 Barb. 439.

By refusing to follow her husband to Italy, the plaintiff forfeited none of her legal rights.

Bigaouette v. Paulet, 134 Mass. 123, 45 Am. Rep. 307.

Messrs. H. T. Richardson and G. P. Holbrook, for defendant:

Malice on the part of the defendant was the foundation of the action, and, if none or her child, and frequently indulges the presumption that the parent was actuated merely by parental affection and solicitude for the child's welfare, the courts stand ready to condemn a stranger who similarly invades the home. So, while malice, as said before, is always a vital element of every action for alienation of affections, there is this difference between the two lines of cases, namely: in the case of a parent good faith will be presumed in the absence of circumstances indicating malice, whereas a stranger who alienates the affections of another's spouse does so at his peril, and is aided by no such presumption. Boland v. Stanley, supra.

Even though the wife may have a just cause for separation or divorce, she may elect to abide by her situation and remain with her husband, and if she chooses to do so, no stranger has the right to intermeddle with the domestic and marital relations of husband and wife, and if he voluntarily does so, he is amenable for the consequences. Modisett v. McPike, 74 Mo. 636. In this case, however, the court said that it would be otherwise if the wife, having just cause for the separation or for a divorce, voluntarily sought the advice, shelter, and protection of a relative or even a stranger; and that in such a case a relative or stranger affording protection or advice is not answerable to the husband for such conduct, if he acts in good faith and from motives of kindness and humanity.

So, the husband makes out a prima facie case against a stranger when he shows that the latter voluntarily and unasked interfered with his domestic affairs, and intentionally urged and induced his wife to desert and abandon him, and to refuse to live with him; and in the absence of anything in the evidence to justify or excuse such conduct, the plaintiff's right to a recovery is established. Hartpence v. Rogers, 143 Mo. 623, 45 S. W. 650.

In Sickler v. Mannix, 68 Neb. 21, 93 N. W. 1018, involving a wife's action against another woman for alienating her husband's affections, the defendant contended that the petition did not state a cause of action in that it failed to charge that she was actuated by malicious motives, but 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court held that, if the conduct of the defendant was unjustifiable, and actually caused the injury, malice in law would be implied, and that therefore a petition which charged that the defendant wrongfully, wickedly, and unlawfully sought and courted the society of the plaintiff's husband sufficiently charged that it was maliciously done.

In actions for the enticing away and harboring the plaintiff's wife, the New York courts have stated in general terms that the husband has the right to the society and assistance of his wife, and that whoever persuades or entices her to separate herself from him, and thus deprives him of that right, is liable to an action. Schuneman v. Palmer, 4 Barb. 225, and that whenever a wife is unjustifiable in abandoning her husband, he who knowingly and intentionally assists her in thus violating her duty is guilty of a wrong for which an action will lie. Barnes v. Allen, 30 Barb. 663.

In Heermance v. James, 47 Barb. 120, 32 How. Pr. 142, the court indorsed the doctrine that if the defendant, by persuasion or force, prevents the plaintiff's wife from returning to her husband, he is liable, or if he persuades her to stay away from her husband, such persuasion is an unlawful act; and that the law imputes an unlawful purpose to all persons who do an unlawful act; and that if the defendant had done either of these acts, he was liable without reference to his motives and intentions.

In PHELPS v. BERGERS, 92 Neb. 851, 139 N. W. 632, involving a husband's action against another man for alienating the affections of the former's wife, the court held that there was error, as against the plaintiff, in so much of an instruction as told the jury that any enticements of the plaintiff's wife by the defendant with a view of causing a separation, otherwise than those of an adulterous nature, must be shown to have been maliciously done; and that there was error, as against the defendant in the remainder of the instruction, which told the jury that the law presumes malice, if one wrongfully does acts tending to disturb the harmony of the family relations between husband and wife, and that the law existed, there was no liability, even if whatever advice or assistance the defendant gave to the husband was partly or wholly the cause of the desertion.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only exception in this case is to the refusal of the trial judge to instruct the jury as requested by the plaintiff, that she need not prove malice on the part of the defendant in order to entitle her to recover. We do not understand the plaintiff to find any fault with the instructions that were given, if the instruction requested was rightly refused.

We think that the instruction asked for could not have been properly given. In Tasker v. Stanley, 153 Mass. 148, 150, 10 L.R.A. 468, 26 N. E. 417, in an action for alienating the affections of the plaintiff's wife, and enticing her to leave him, it was held that the defendants had a right to show that their advice was honestly given with a view to the welfare of both parties, and that, in order to render them liable, it should appear that the advice was not given concludes in such circumstances that the acts were malicious. In reaching this conclusion the court, after alluding to the presumption of good faith that obtains in favor of a parent, said that only when a stranger interferes in the family matters, there is no presumption of good faith, and that if his acts were wrongful and calculated to alienate the wife's affections from her husband, and did produce that result, he is liable for such damages as he occasions. It is to be noted that this case was appealed by the defendant, and that apparently the only objection to the charge mentioned was the defendant's objection to the statement relating to the presumption of malice, but it does not seem just clear why the court regarded the instruction as erroneous in that respect.

In Miller v. Pearce, — Vt. —, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 332, 85 Atl. 620, involving an action against a stranger for alienating the affections of the plaintiff's husband, the court held that malice need not be found to support a judgment against the defendant, although exemplary damages were claimed, as malice goes to the amount of damages, not to the right of recovery. But this case seems to stand alone on this proposition. GEROMINI v. BRUNELLI goes to the other extreme, and practically places the burden of proof of malice on the plaintiff; and it is the accepted rule of the other cases, that even a stranger is not liable if he did not act from malice, actual or implied. Not only is there a plain implication to this effect in some of the foregoing cases, but it is expressly held that giving advice to a wife which induces her to leave her husband is not actionable if given honestly, with a view to the welfare of both parties, by one who has no special influence or authority over her, and such one may, as defendant in an action for enticing the wife, be permitted to testify that he had no intention to bring about a separation. Tasker v. Stanley, 153 Mass. 148, 10 L.R.A. 468, 26 N. E. 417. See also Modisett v. McPike, supra.

And the New York court holds that one who marries a woman who has obtained an invalid divorce in another state from her former husband is not to be regarded as a mere stranger, intermeddler, or seducer, and cannot be held liable in an action for alienation of affections, where he is to be regarded as having acted in the honest belief that he had the right to marry the woman. Hollister v. Valentine, 69 App. Div. 582, 75 N. Y. Supp. 115.

Therefore, a letter from the judge of a foreign state certifying that a divorce from the plaintiff obtained there by her husband was valid is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing the defendant's good faith. Strock v. Russell, 148 App. Div. 483, 132 N. Y. Supp. 968.

In Whitman v. Egbert, 27 App. Div. 374, 50 N. Y. Supp. 3, involving an action by a wife against another woman for alienating her husband's affections, the court laid down a rule that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the defendant was blamable for plaintiff's husband's infatuation, and that unless the defendant did or said something with the wrongful and wilful intent to engage his affections, and thereby seduce him from his fidelity to his wife, and unless she was successful in this purpose, she was not liable; and that the law imputed to her no fault because of her attractiveness, nor because she may have been pleased with the admiration of the plaintiff's husband. It seems that this case goes upon the ground that the defendant was not guilty of alienating the affections, rather than the ground that she did not alienate them maliciously.

Parents.

In an earlier note appended to Multer v. Knibbs, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 322, presenting the earlier cases on this phase of the question, it is shown that the authorities are agreed that a parent will not be liable to the spouse of his child for causing their separation, if the counsel given and the persuasion used by him are such as he thoroughly and honestly considers to be called for by the best interests of the child,—in other words if his acts are done in good faith and without malice; and that the rule is the same whether the child advised or persuaded is a son or daughter. This rule is supported by the honestly, or was given from malevolent motives. We think that the same principles apply in an action by the wife for persuading and enticing her husband to leave her and take with him their minor children. It is true that the husband is bound to support his wife, and that he is liable to a criminal complaint if he unreasonably refuses or neglects to do so. But we do not think that that fact can affect his right to such advice, or render a third party liable for advice which is given with an honest and friendly desire to assist him, even though it may lead to his separation from his wife, and may turn out not to have been the best advice that could have been given. The liability of the defendant does not depend upon whether the separation resulted wholly or in part from the advice which he gave, but quo animo the advice was given. There must have been an invasion of the plaintiff's rights in some form by the defendant, in order to entitle her to maintain an action against him. In order to show that in the present case, she had to show malice on his part. This she failed to do. It follows that the exceptions must be overruled. See Corey v. Eastman, 186 Mass. 279, 287, 55 Am. St. Rep. 401, 44 N. E. 217; Plant v. Woods, 178 Mass. 492, 500, 51 L.R.A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330, 57 N. E. 1011; Multer v. Knibbs, 103 Mass. 556, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 322, 79 N. E. 782, 9 Ann. Cas. 958.

later cases, which include, besides the other cases cited in this division of the note, the case of Hostetter v. Green, 150 Ky. 551, 150 S. W. 652.

And the existence of malice must be affirmatively proved, for a parent who advises his son or daughter to leave the marital home is presumed to have done so out of parental affection and solicitude for the welfare of the child, and he cannot be held liable unless the plaintiff, who has the burden of proof, establishes that his advice or conduct is actuated by malicious motives. Hossfeld v. Hossfeld, 110 C. C. A. 131, 188 Fed. 61; Jonas v. Hirschburg, 18 Ind. App. 581, 48 N. E. 656; Workman v. Workman, 43 Ind. App. 382, 85 N. E. 997; Heisler v. Heisler, 151 Iowa, 503, 131 N. W. 676; Corrick v. Dunham, 147 Iowa, 320, 126 N. W. 150; Busenbark v. Busenbark, 150 Iowa, 7, 139 N. W. 332; Miller v. Miller, 164 Iowa, 344, 134 N. W. 1058; Cornelius v. Cornelius, 233 Mo. 1, 135 S. W. 65; Miller v. Miller, 122 Mo. App. 693, 99 S. W. 757; Fronk v. Fronk, 159 Mo. App. 543, 141 S. W. 692; Allen v. Forsythe, 160 Mo. App. 262, 142 S. W. 820; Greuneich v. Greuneich, 23 N. D. 368, 137 N. W. 415; Beisel v. Gerlach, 221 Pa. 232, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 516, 90 Atl. 721; Gross v. Gross, 70 W. Va. 317, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 261, 73 S. E. 961; Jones v. Monson, 137 Wis. 478, 129 Am. St. Rep. 1082, 119 N. W. 179.

Any other rule would be an unjust one. For instance, it would be unjust as applied in the situation in the case of Bailey v. Kennedy, 148 Iowa, 715, 126 N. W. 181, where the court said: "Taking the situation of these parties as it was in 1903, the plaintiff's wife was living apart from him, and was in poverty and dependent upon her own efforts to make a living. If, under such circumstances, her father-in-law could not employ her, or even furnish her a home, without being guilty of harboring her in an evil sense, then her situation was very helpless indeed."

For, as has been said, the father's home is the child's refuge and consolation in distress, and when a father receives a married daughter into his household, he does not subject himself to an action for alienation of affections, unless it appears either that he detains the wife against her will, or that he enticed her away from her husband from improper motives. Bad or unworthy motives cannot be presumed in such a case. They are to be positively shown or necessarily deduced from the facts and circumstances. Boland v. Stanley, 88 Ark. 562, 129 Am. St. Rep. 114, 115 S. W. 163.

There can be no recovery from the parent unless the evidence shows either malice, or a continued effort on the defendant's part to keep the parties to the marriage separated. Farneman v. Farneman, 46 Ind. App. 459, 90 N. E. 775, 91 N. E. 968.

And the measure of proof of malice must be greater than is necessary in the case of a mere stranger. Ickes v. Ickes, 237 Pa. 582, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1118, 85 Atl. 885.

An instruction which omits the qualification that the defendant must have acted intentionally or knowingly is properly refused. Powers v. Sumblor, 83 Kan. 1, 110 Pac. 97.

And it is error for the court to charge that it is the duty of the parents to advise their son to live with his spouse. Walter v. Walter, 172 Mich. 351, 137 N. W. 677.

In Ellsworth v. Shimer, 71 Misc. 576, 128 N. Y. Supp. 883, the court holds that in an action for alienating a wife's affections, the quo animo of the defendant is a material point, and it was held that a complaint which did not allege the defendant's motives, or show that there were improper relations between the defendant and the wife, was insufficient, since for all that appeared from the complaint the defendant might have been the wife's father or brother, who had performed only his duty in doing the act which caused the separation.

Without commenting upon the necessity of malice, the court, in Leucht v. Leucht, 129 Ky. 700, 130 Am. St. Rep. 486, 112 S. W. 845, denied a recovery against the parent where the evidence sought to be introduced, apparently for the purpose of showing malice, was incompetent.

In Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397, involving an action by a wife against her father-in-law, it was held that the trial court erred in refusing to charge that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, the defendant must have maliciously caused the separation of the husband and wife; but the supreme court added that if the conduct of the defendant was unjustifiable, and actually caused the injury complained of, which was a question for the jury, malice in law would be implied from such conduct, and that the court should have so charged.

But the Indiana appellate court holds that while the fact that the parent may do the act without legal excuse may warrant the jury in inferring malice, it does not constitute malice as a matter of law, and it is therefore error to instruct the jury that an act is deemed to have been done maliciously when done purposely, without just cause or legal excuse, and that a parent when so acting is liable for damages. Kelso v. Kelso, 43 Ind. App. 115, 86 N. E. 1001.

The protection afforded a parent in this respect is, of course, not an absolute one. The later cases, like the earlier ones set out in the note in 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 324, hold that if the parent acts maliciously and unjustifiably in bringing about the separation, he is liable to the injured party as if he were a stranger. This proposition is supported by implication by some of the decisions above cited in this division of the note, and it has been expressly applied in the following cases: Boland v. Stanley, 88 Ark. 562, 129 Am. St. Rep. 114, 115 S. W. 163; Jonas v. Hirshburg, 18 Ind. App. 581, 48 N. E. 656; Heisler v. Heisler, 151 Iowa, 503, 131 N. W. 676; White v. White, 76 Kan. 82, 90 Pac. 1087; Klein v. Klein, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 28, 101 S. W. 382; Allen v. Forsythe, 160 Mo. App. 262, 142 S. W. 820; Gerner v. Gerner, 185 Pa. 233, 40 L.R.A. 549, 64 Am. St. Rep. 646, 39 Atl. 884; White v. White, 140 Wis. 538, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1100, 122 N. W. 1051.

In Cochran v. Cochran, 196 N. Y. 86, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 160, 89 N. E. 470, 17 Ann. Cas. 782, the court clearly recognizes that a wife can recover from the parents of her husband for the alienation of his affections, where they act unjustifiably and maliciously; but upon the grounds that the wife was erroneously permitted to testify to declarations of the husband tending to show their hostile attitude and disposition, which were made in their absence, the court reversed a recovery for the plaintiff allowed by the appellate division in 127 App. Div. 319, 111 N. Y. Supp. 588.

Other relatives.

The presumption indulged in favor of a parent would also seem to apply in the case of a child. At least, there is an implication in McGregor v. McGregor, — Ky. —, 115 S. W. 802, involving an action by a father against his son, that the son could not be held liable upon the basis of harboring and extending kindnesses to his step-mother, unless the plaintiff proved that he acted from a spirit of malice or revenge.

In Allen v. Forsythe, 160 Mo. App. 262, 142 S. W. 820, involving a joint action by the husband against the father and other relatives of the wife, and recognizing that the element of malice must be present to render the father liable, but holding him liable upon the ground of malice,—the court said that it was willing arguendo to accord to the other defendants the same status as that enjoyed by the father, and to treat them as entitled to any benefit the parental rule conferred upon the father, but it held such defendants, who were brother, sister, and sister-in-law, liable upon the ground that they too acted maliciously.

The North Dakota supreme court holds that whether the rule of presumptive good faith, which obtains in the case of a parent or other blood relative, or the rule applied in the case of a stranger, shall extend to the husband of the sister of the plaintiff's wife, is a question for the jury, the court saying that it was satisfied that it was proper to instruct the jury as to both phases of the question under the testimony, and to leave it to the jury to determine whether the defendant was entitled to the exemption from liability accorded a relative, or not. Luick v. Arends, 21 N. D. 614, 132 N. W. 353.

And the Iowa supreme court seems to take it for granted that the presumption of good faith indulged in behalf of the parents will likewise be indulged in behalf of the plaintiff's sister-in-law. Miller v. Miller, 154 Iowa, 344, 134 N. W. 1058.

Guardian.

The Nebraska court takes the view that the privileges of a parent in this respect extend to a guardian, holding that where advice is given by a parent or guardian which leads to the separation by the child or ward from the husband, the presumption is that the advice was given in good faith, and that he cannot be held liable unless it appears that the advice given by him was reckless or malicious. Trumbull v. Trumbull, 71 Neb. 186, 98 N. W. 683, 8 Ann. Cas. 812. L. A. W.

1. It is not improper to join, in the same count in a petition, an allegation that the defendant took possession of certain personal property belonging to plaintiff and converted it to his own use, with an allegation that defendant entered a building where plaintiff was carrying on a hotel business, took possession of the building, closed same, and thereby destroyed plaintiff's business, where it is alleged that the goods alleged to have been converted were taken from the building at the time it was entered, and the entering of the building and the taking of the personal property are parts of the same transaction.

Damages — destruction of business — profits.

2. The loss of profits proximately resulting from the destruction of an established business constitute an element of damages recoverable for such destruction.

Trespass — attachment as defense.

3. It is not a defense to an action for entering a building occupied by plaintiff as a hotel, ejecting him therefrom, destroying his business, and seizing and converting his goods, that the defendant was acting by virtue of a writ of attachment which he had sued out as plaintiff in an action against the plaintiff in this action, to recover a debt, where there were no grounds for the attachment, and it was dissolved.

Landlord and tenant — eviction — knowledge of illegal sale of liquors — effect.

4. The plaintiff occupied a building belonging to the defendant. The rent was payable in advance. The plaintiff failed to pay at the beginning of the month, and six days later the defendant sued him for the rent, of the current month, sued out a writ of attachment, and by virtue thereof took possession of the personal property in the building, and closed the building, and ejected plaintiff therefrom. The attachment was dissolved. In an action brought against him by plaintiff to recover damages for the closing of his business and conversion of his chattels, defendant offered to testify that plaintiff was selling intoxicants in the building. It appeared that, if true, defendant had knowledge thereof before he demanded rent, but that he brought suit for the rent and closed the building without making complaint as to the unlawful use thereof, or demanding possession thereof. Held, that the evidence as to such use was properly excluded.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Pottawatomie County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injury to his business and for the conversion of personal property by evicting him from leased property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. P. O. Cassidy, for plaintiff in error:

The claim of $1,098.33 for conversion of personal property, and the claim of $1,500, for loss of profits, constitute two distinct causes of action, and should be pleaded in separate counts.

Note. — Loss of profits as element of damages for wrongful attachment.

For the earlier cases on this subject, see subdivision at page 54 of note to Wallace v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 52 L.R.A. 33, upon the general question as to damages for torts as affected by loss of profits.

For notes upon numerous other aspects of the general question as to loss of profits as an element of damages, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, Damages, §§ 107-118.

It seems to be the general rule, as stated in the earlier note, and as held in WELLINGTON v. SPENCER, that a loss of profits which is the proximate result of a wrongful attachment is a proper element of the damages recoverable on account thereof, where the prospective profits were reasonably certain, and not merely speculative or conjectural, and the amount thereof can be estimated with reasonable accuracy.

Thus, the actual, ascertainable loss of profits consequent upon the interruption of a debtor's business is a proper element of damage recoverable for the wrongful attachment of his stock of goods: Sterling v. Marine Bank, — Md. —, 87 Atl. 697.

And in United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Howes, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 131, 109 S. W. 343, an action upon an attachment bond to 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

recover the damages sustained by reason of the wrongful attachment of the plaintiff's property, resulting in the locking up of his store for forty-three days, and necessitating his paying an attorneys' fee of $350, and going to another place and incurring considerable expense there in making his defense, the court said that, in view of the expense the plaintiff was at and the length of time his store was locked up and his business suspended, it could not say that a verdict of $550 was excessive.

But in an action to recover damages for wrongfully suing out a writ of attachment against the property of a copartnership engaged in the painting and paper hanging business, although "in actions of this kind no doubt a recovery may be had for loss of ascertainable profits arising out of an established business," the plaintiff is not entitled to recover prospective profits, where, at the time of the attachment, the business had not been long established and had been disrupted and disorganized by the absconding of the plaintiff's copartner, after he had collected the firm accounts so far as he was able, leaving the stock in trade almost wholly unpaid for, of which absconding the plaintiff notified the firm creditors and allowed them to reclaim the goods which they had respectively shipped to the firm,

The court erred in admitting Spencer's testimony and instructing the jury that they could return a verdict for the loss of profits of his business.

Messrs. J. H. Wood, S. P. Freeling, and J. H. Miley for defendants in error.

Rosser, C., filed the following opinion:

E. W. Spencer occupied a building belonging to J. H. Wellington and used it as a hotel. The rent on the building was payable in advance and was due June 20, 1908. Wellington called on Spencer to pay the rent, but he did not pay. Wellington brought suit against him in justice court the plaintiff laying no claim thereto. McGill v. W. P. Fuller & Co. 45 Wash. 615, 88 Pac. 1038.

And in an action on attachment bonds issued in actions brought by a vendor for an alleged breach of a contract under which he was furnishing the vendee with logs with which to operate the latter's sawmill, while evidence as to the net profits of the plaintiff's sawmill business for the few months prior to the attachment is admissible, "not as in and of itself constituting the measure of damages, but as tending to show what damages the [plaintiff] . . . sustained by the brief interruption of its business," during the time the operation of the mill was suspended on account of the attachment,—loss of profits because of the vendor's refusal to make further deliveries under the contract is not an element of damages recoverable under the bonds. Fidelity & D. Co. v. L. Bucki & Son Lumber Co. 189 U. S. 135, 47 L. ed. 744, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582, affirming 48 C. C. A. 436, 109 Fed. 393.

So, where a debtor was conducting a pool room in connection with a store at the time of the wrongful attachment of his stock of goods, but his pool tables and their appurtenances were not taken or removed in the execution of the writ, and the debtor still carried on some business on his pool tables after the levy of the attachment, loss of profits derived from the conduct of the pool room is not an element of the damages recoverable for the wrongful attachment. Sterling v. Marine Bank, supra.

And the owner of property used in his business and wrongfully attached under a writ against another person cannot recover, as an element of his damages against the attachment plaintiff who procured the illegal levy, loss of profits from his business during the period of litigation concerning the title to the property, arising from a suspension of the business for want of such property, where this loss is traceable to the plaintiff's own refusal to protect himself from the result of the defendant's tort, in that he declined either to give a bond which would have enabled him to retain the property, or to obtain other like property in the open market for his use, and made no effort to keep up the business. Maxwell v. Speth, 9 Ga. App. 745, 72 S. E. 292.

In Moravec v. Grell, 78 App. Div. 146, 79 N. Y. Supp. 533, it was held that in an action against a sheriff for the wrongful conversion of a stock of goods in a store, under a warrant of attachment issued against the property of another person, loss of profits does not constitute an element of dam-for $60 and sued out an attachment. The constable, Arthur, acting under Wellington's direction, attached everything in the building, except some wearing apparel of Spencer and his family, and posted notices on the doors of the various rooms in the building that the building and the contents were attached at the suit of Wellington. The officer set the trunks of Spencer and wife out of the house and locked the doors. Spencer sought other employment and made no effort to regain possession of the house. The case was tried before the justice in a few days and the attachment was discharged. Wellington appealed to the county court, but for some reason not clearly appearing in the record the appeal was dismissed. After a short time the attached property was removed from the hotel building and placed in storage, and Wellington rented the building to someone else. At the suggestion of Wellington or his attorney the holder of a mortgage on a portion of the attached property took possession of the portion mortgaged, without foreclosing, and about a year after the attachment was levied the balance of the property was returned to Spencer. He then brought this suit against Wellington and Arthur, the constable, who made the levy. Plaintiff's amended petition alleged that the defendant's took possession of the hotel business, building, furniture, and equipment, and certain wearing apparel; that the value of the hotel business and good will was $1,500, and of the property taken and not returned something more than $900; that by reason of defendant's wrongful acts the hotel business was broken up; and that he was damaged in the sum of $2,430.33. Wellington filed a motion, which stated that the loss of profits to the hotel business and the damages by reason of the taking of the property were separate causes of action, and which asked to have said causes of action set forth in separate counts. This motion was overruled, and the action of the court thereon is assigned as error.

The point is not well taken. There was only one wrongful act. The destruction of the business was only one item of damages occasioned by the act of Wellington. The fact that a different class of property was affected by the closing of the hotel from that affected by the taking of the furniture did not make a different cause of action, any more than the taking of each item of personal property constituted a separate cause of action. The whole matter was one transaction, and therefore it was proper to state it in one count. If the plaintiff had undertaken to make two counts of his petition, he would have been compelled to state the same facts in both counts. The only difference in them would have been that he would have alleged the extent of his damage with reference to the personal property in one count and to the leasehold interest as to the other. Tootle v. Kent, 12 Okla. 674, 73 Pac. 310.

In Oliver v. Perkins, 92 Mich. 304, 52 N. W. 609, it was held that a petition which alleged that the defendants wrongfully, and without notice or legal proceedings, ejected plaintiff from his office, and removed all his office furniture and placed it in the street, refused to permit and allow the plaintiff to enter his office, and prevented him from carrying on his business, and published to the public that the plaintiff had no right, title, or interest in certain machines or in the business of selling them, and notified all parties from whom the plaintiff had obtained orders for the ma-ages for which a recovery is authorized, but the interest upon the sum of money awarded as the value of the property is the legal substitute for the loss of profits in such a case.

And in an action against an attachment plaintiff for damages for wrongful attachment of certain railroad cars, although the chief business of the attachment defendant was the hiring out of such cars for use on other roads,—its own road being only 17 miles long, and it having a large stock of cars,—it has been held that it cannot recover, as an element of its damages, the profits which it might have made from hiring out the attached cars, because that would be speculative damages; but "the true measure of damages is the interest upon the value of the cars, increased or diminished, as the case might be, by the difference between the deterioration in the cars, if in daily use, and their deterioration while wrongfully tied up, provided, of course the plaintiff could not have avoided all injury from the attachment by simply giving bond,—as it is shown that it was amply able to do,—and retaining possession of its cars." Pittsburg, J. E. & E. R. Co. v. Wakefield Hardware Co. 143 N. C. 54, 55 S. E. 422.

And in State ex rel. Clark v. Parsons, 109 Mo. App. 432, 84 S. W. 1019, an action on an attachment bond to recover for the wrongful attachment and sale of plaintiff's stock of goods, it was held that the proper measure of damages was not the market value of the attached goods when sold at retail, but the amount which it would cost to replace the merchandise in the store,—the court saying: "To permit a plaintiff in an action like this to recover what the merchandise would bring when retailed would be to give him more than compensation for his loss; for he would get at once the probable proceeds of the stock, including a profit, without having incurred the expense of selling."

chines that they should cancel their orders and send new orders to be placed with the defendants, and published to the commercial agencies and the public that the plaintiff was irresponsible, stated a single cause of action. Bahr v. Boley, 85 Hun, 448, 32 N. Y. Supp. 881, was an action for damages for trespass on lands, and the complaint, after alleging the trespass and conversion of property, alleged that "on said day, after forcibly assaulting and ejecting plaintiff, the defendant, maliciously and without cause, caused the plaintiff to be arrested and taken through the public streets of the city of Brooklyn to a station house, in charge of a policeman in uniform." It was held that the plaintiff could allege and prove all his injuries caused by the trespass, either to his person or to his personal property. The court said: "There is no doubt that in an action for trespass on lands the plaintiff could allege and prove all his injuries caused by the trespass either to his person or to his personal property. In such case the cause of action would be the trespass, and the injury to his person and personal property will not be an independent cause of action, but aggravations of the damages. We think that the allegation of the complaint quoted is to be construed as alleging the continuation of a single trespass. In this view there is but a single cause of action set forth in the complaint." See, also, Brown v. Master, 104 Ala. 451, 16 So. 443; Belden v. Granniss, 27 Conn. 511.

The next question presented is whether the closing of the hotel building and consequent destruction of plaintiff's business was an element of damage to which he was entitled. The decisions upon this question are not uniform. A number of cases hold that no recovery can be had for loss of profits. However, not many late cases can be found supporting that proposition. A number of cases hold that no recovery for loss of profits occasioned by the destruction of business can be had unless the act which occasioned the loss was malicious. Kaufman v. Armstrong, 74 Tex. 65, 11 S. W. 1048; L. Bucki & Son Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & D. Co. 48 C. C. A. 436, 109 Fed. 393; Union Nat. Bank v. Cross, 100 Wis. 174, 75 N. W. 992; Braunsdorf v. Fellner, 76 Wis. 1, 45 N. W. 97. But a large number of well-considered cases hold that when the loss of profits is the proximate result of the unlawful act, and the amount is capable of proof to a reasonable certainty, the earnings of a business may be taken into consideration when assessing damages for the unlawful act. Smith v. Eubanks, 72 Ga. 280; Stewart v. Lanier House Co. 75 Ga. 582; Chapman v. Kirby, 49 Ill. 211; Lawrence v. Hagerman, 56 Ill. 68, 8 Am. Rep. 674; Dobbin 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Duquid, 65 Ill. 464; Terre Haute v. Hudnut, 112 Ind. 542, 13 N. E. 686; Moore v. Schultz, 31 Md. 418; Lawson v. Price, 45 Md. 123; Evans v. Murphy, 87 Md. 498, 40 Atl. 109; Goebel v. Hough, 26 Minn. 252, 2 N. W. 847. See Sedgw. Damages, §§ 173 et seq.

The reason that prospective profits cannot be considered in estimating damages is that they are uncertain, and not capable of sufficiently definite proof to justify a verdict or decision as to their amount. The law does require reasonable certainty, but not more than that. In personal injury cases, where there is permanent disability, the juries are always permitted to consider the plaintiff's earning capacity in connection with his probable life duration, and thus, in the face of the fact that we are constantly taught that life is uncertain, and that no one is justified in presuming that he will live any particular length of time. The jury is simply permitted to use the best basis possible for estimating the damages. Why should not the same rule apply in cases where a business has been broken up or interrupted? Of course, juries will not be permitted to merely speculate as to damages. Where the plaintiff has just made his arrangements to begin business, and he is prevented from beginning either by tort or a breach of contract, or where the injury is to a particular subject-matter profits of which are uncertain, evidence as to expected profits must be excluded from the jury because of the uncertainty. There is as much reason to believe that there will be no profits as to believe that there will be profits, but no such argument can be made against proving a usual profit of an established business. In this case the plaintiff, according to his testimony, had an established business, and was earning a profit in the business, and had been doing that for a sufficient length of time that evidence as prospective profits was not entirely speculative. Men who have been engaged in business calculate with a reasonable certainty the income from their business, make their plans to live accordingly, and the value of such business is not such a matter of speculation as to exclude evidence from the jury.

In the case of Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542, the court, speaking by Christiancy, J., said: "This business must be broken up by the ouster, unless the plaintiff could obtain another fit place for it; and if the only place he could obtain was less fitted and less valuable . . . for that purpose, then such business would be injured to the extent of this difference; and this would be the natural, direct, and immediate consequence of the injury. To confine the plaintiff to the difference between the rent paid and the fair rental value of the premises to others, for the balance of the term, would be but a mockery of justice. To test this, suppose the plaintiff is actually paying that full rental value, and has established a business upon the premises, the clear gains or profits of which have been an average of $1,000 per year, and he is ousted from the premises, and this business entirely broken up for the balance of the time; can be allowed to recover nothing but 6 cents damages for his loss? To ask such a question is to answer it."

In Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 611, 22 Pac. 327, the court said: "It is objected that the respondent was allowed to recover damages for the profits which he would have made had he not been prevented, by the injunction, from carrying on his business. We think that this was proper. It must be true that where a party is wrongfully prevented by injunction from carrying on a profitable and established business, he can recover damages therefor. And if the profits which he would have made are not to be allowed, what damages is he to recover? Would it be adequate compensation to reimburse him merely for his expenditures, and for the losses which he might sustain from being prevented from fulfilling existing engagements, and the depreciation of his stock in trade? If this were true, there would be a very convenient way of getting rid of a business rival. A business might be destroyed by a preliminary injunction before the truth of the allegations upon which it was obtained could be inquired into. The best-considered cases agree that, where an established business is wrongfully injured or destroyed, the owner of the business can recover the damages sustained thereby, and that upon this question evidence of the profits which he was actually making is admissible. Terre Haute v. Hudnut, 112 Ind. 550, et seq. 13 N. E. 686; Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 558 et seq.; Chapman v. Kirby, 49 Ill. 219; Simmons v. Brown, 5 R. I. 299, 73 Am. Dec. 66; Gibson v. Fischer, 68 Iowa, 30, 25 N. W. 914; Goebel v. Hough, 26 Minn. 256, 2 N. W. 847; Shafer v. Wilson, 44 Md. 268."

In the case of Chapman v. Kirby, 49 Ill. 211, the court said: "As to the estimate of losses sustained by the breaking up of his established business, there would seem to be no well-founded objection. We all know that in many, if not all, professions and callings, years of effort, skill, and toil are necessary to establish a profitable business, and that when established it is worth more than capital. Can it then be said that a party deprived of it has no remedy, and can recover nothing for its loss, when produced by another? It has long been well-recognized law that, when deprived of such business by slander, compensation for its loss may be recovered in this form of action. And why not for its loss by this more direct means? And of what does this loss consist, but the profits that would have been made had the act not been performed by appellants? And to measure such damages, the jury must have some basis for an estimate; and what more reasonable than to take the profits for a reasonable period next preceding the time when the injury was inflicted, leaving the other party to show that by depression in trade, or other causes, they would have been less? Nor can we expect that in actions of this character, the precise extent of the damages can be shown by demonstration. But by this means they can be ascertained with a reasonable degree of certainty."

The question was decided by the supreme court of the territory in the case of Tootle v. Kent, 12 Okla. 674, 73 Pac. 310.

In the case of Ft. Smith & W. R. Co. v. Williams, 30 Okla. 726, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 494, 121 Pac. 275, the general doctrine with reference to proving expected profits as an element of damages was considered, and a large number of authorities cited and discussed. It was held in that case where a railroad company undertook to deliver a rotary swing, sometimes called a "merry-go-round," to be used at a picnic, knowing the purpose for which it was to be used upon its failure to deliver same, it was liable for the profit that would have been made by the use of the swing during the progress of the picnic; and that opinion clearly points out that the reason evidence as to anticipated profits is excluded in many cases is because they are incapable of being proved with a reasonable degree of certainty.

Defendant assigns as error the instruction that the fact that plaintiff was indebted to the defendant, and that an attachment writ was issued, was no defense to the action. Defendant asserts that this was error, but does not cite any cases or give a satisfactory reason for the assertion. The fact that a man owes another does not give the creditor the right to take his goods or shut up his place of business. The defendant was unsuccessful in the attachment suit. There is nothing in the record showing that any statutory grounds for attachment existed. A person who sues out an attachment and causes it to be levied cannot defend an action for the taking and converting of the property attached and the closing of the house containing the property, upon the ground that the acts were done by virtue of the writ, unless the statutory grounds existed justifying the issuance of the writ. Where malice is charged and exemplary damages asked, the attachment proceedings might be material under restrictions not necessary to be defined here. But malice is not charged here, though the record shows exceedingly oppressive conduct on the part of the defendant.

Finally, it is claimed that the court erred in excluding the testimony of the defendant himself to the effect that he knew that plaintiff sold intoxicating liquor in the hotel. The defendant had the right to eject the plaintiff from the building if he was selling intoxicants there. And, though the statute provides that the landlord may recover possession as in forcible entry and detainer, that does not mean that he must bring such a proceeding if he can obtain possession in any other peaceable way. But it does not mean that he can use force or fraud to obtain possession. In this case, by the abuse of the attachment process, defendant obtained possession by fraud, which was equivalent to force. The evidence shows conclusively that the defendant made this defense as an afterthought. There is no evidence that he made any complaint to the plaintiff that he was using the premises for an illegal purpose. On the other hand, he demanded the rent; and the conclusion is irresistible that, if plaintiff had paid the rent, the defendant would have been willing for him to remain another month. If the plaintiff was engaged in an unlawful business, defendant was conniving at it. He did not make complaint before he got possession, but, on the other hand, sued for the rent for another month. He did not give the unlawful use of the premises as a reason for taking possession. He used the attachment for that purpose. He is in exactly the same attitude as if he had taken possession by force. If he had taken possession by force, he would not be heard to say that he did so because plaintiff was selling liquor. He cannot take possession for one reason and hold it for another. His positions before and since taking possession are inconsistent.

The judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

ASAPH D. CLARK et al., Respts.,
v.

EMMA L. PADDOCK, Appt.

Damages — secured note — diverse provisions — construction.

1. Provisions in a mortgage that default in payment shall mature the entire debt at the option of the holder, and in the note secured by the mortgage, that default shall render the whole sum immediately due and collectable, will be construed together and held to mean that default will render the whole sum due at the option of the creditor.

Same — default — tender — effect.

2. Tender of the amount due before the exercise of the option to declare the whole debt secured by a mortgage due for default in payment of interest will prevent an exercise of the option for that default and the institution of proceedings for foreclosure.

I. Scope.

Cases of several obligations held by several parties and secured by a single mortgage or deed are omitted when the matter of several holders is material upon the question of maturity.

It is not intended to include cases upon the construction of subsequent agreements relating to notes and mortgages. (See Brickell v. Batchelder, 62 Cal. 623.)

As to effect of provision in bond or note that interest when due and unpaid shall be added to the principal, on right to foreclose mortgage securing the same for default in interest, see the note to Castor v. Muramoto, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 108.

For recital in note as to security affecting its negotiability, see the note to Zollum v. Jackson Trust & Sav. Bank, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 858.

As to negotiability of notes secured by mortgage as affected by provisions in mortgage, see the note to Brooks v. Struthers, 35 L.R.A. 536.

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ada County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Good & Vaughan, for appellant:

The tender was sufficient.

38 Cyc. 146-7; Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Potter, 124 App. Div. 814, 109 N. Y. Supp. 435; Bunte v. Schumann, 46 Misc. 593, 92 N. Y. Supp. 806; Jones v. Arthur, 8 Dowl. P. C. 442, 4 Jur. 859; Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 73 Cal. 526, 15 Pac. 89; Loughborough v. McNevin, 74 Cal. 256, 5 Am. St. Rep. 435, 14 Pac. 369, 15 Pac. 773; Oakland Bank v. Applegarth, 67 Cal. 86, 7 Pac. 139, 476.

II. General rules.

The cases of discrepancy in relation to maturity between the bond or note and the mortgage securing it generally are resolved by one of two rules; to wit, first, that if the two instruments are not conflicting, effect is to be given to the provisions of both of them; and, second, that if there is a conflict the terms of the note or bond will control those of the mortgage.

III. Both instruments to be construed together.

The difficult question often is whether or not there is a conflict between the instruments; but in the cases where the bond or note contains a complete statement of the time of maturity, and the mortgage is incomplete in this respect, it is not very material whether there is or is not a conflict, for, if there is, the rule that in conflict the bond prevails would leave the result the same.

Thus, in Kennedy v. Ross, 25 Pa. 256, it was held that the terms of a bond dated September, 1853, for the payment of a certain sum, "with interest from the 1st day of May last, in three equal annual instalments from that date, interest payable on the whole sum annually," cleared the obscurity in a mortgage conditioned for the payment of such sum "in three annual payments, with interest thereon from the 1st day of May, 1853."

Maturity of interest.

Where no separate time of maturity of the interest is given in one instrument, but such a time is stated in the other, such statement will fix the time of maturity of the interest whether such statement be in the note (Winchell v. Coney, 54 Conn. 24, 5 Atl. 354) or in the mortgage (Dobbins v. Parker, 46 Iowa, 357; Muzzy v. Knight, 8 Kan. 456; Bell v. Engvolsen, 64 Wash. 33, 116 Pac. 456).

Thus, where several promissory notes were all payable five years after date, "with interest annually at 6 per cent," and the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A note and mortgage, being parts of one transaction, are to be read together, and the mortgagee may rely on the provision in the mortgage making the principal due for nonpayment of interest, at its option, though the note contains no such provision.

Trinity County Bank v. Haas, 151 Cal. 553, 91 Pac. 385; Phelps v. Mayers, 126 Cal. 549, 58 Pac. 1048; Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 Pac. 1110; Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 248; Fletcher v. Dennison, 101 Cal. 294, 35 Pac. 868; Wilson v. Winter, 6 Fed. 16; Buchanan v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 96 Ind. 510.

A holder of a note stipulating for maturity on default cannot be held to have exercised such option until he manifests his election by some outward act.

mortgage referred to each of these notes as "bearing interest at 6 per cent per annum," and was conditioned upon the payment of the notes "according to their tenor," it was held that the interest was payable annually, and that, upon default in interest, the holder of the notes might foreclose for the interest unpaid, and that it was not necessary to reform the mortgage. Winchell v. Coney, supra.

So, where notes were payable at different times, "with 10 per cent interest per annum from date," and the mortgage provided for payment of the principal, "with interest payment of the principal, "with interest on all of said money at the rate of 10 per cent per annum until paid, payable annually according to the tenor of" the notes, it was held that the interest was payable annually. Dobbins v. Parker, 46 Iowa, 357.

Absence of discrepancy.

In some of the cases the ground of the decision has been that there was no discrepancy as to maturity in the instruments: that is to say, that there was no want of harmony between them.

Thus, in Lyon v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 13 N. Y. S. R. 732, where railroad bonds contained a provision that in case of ninety days' default in the payment of interest, "the principal of this bond will thereby become due and payable upon and subject to all the conditions provided in the mortgage," and the mortgage provided for a waiver of this provision by a majority of the bondholders, it was held that such waiver would not prevent a suit at law on interest coupons of the bonds, as the waiver did not relate to such right.

And where an acceleration clause in the bond matured the debt, but that in the mortgage allowed a sale out of which the mortgagee was to retain the amount then due on the bond, it was held that the whole debt matured on default, and the power of sale was then properly exercised. Harper v. Ely, 56 Ill. 179.

Messrs. Alfred A. Fraser and Charles S. Kingsley for respondents.

Allshie, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion made in this case to strike the agreed statement of facts and the reporter's transcript from the record is not well taken, and must be denied. The stipufore the expiration of twelve months from default, is not precluded by provisions of the mortgage authorizing the trustees, upon default in payment of interest continuing for twelve months, to enter upon and sell the premises, where the mortgage declares its purpose to be to secure the due payment of principal and interest to accrue "according to the tenor and effect" of the bonds and coupons, is conditioned for the payment of principal and interest at the "times and in the manner" prescribed for the payment thereof in the bonds and coupons, and further provides that the mortgagor shall remain in possession of the property until default shall have been made in principal or interest. Central Trust Co. v. New York City & N. R. Co. 33 Hun, 513.

In Mallory v. West Shore H. R. R. Co. 3 Jones & S. 174, where a railroad bond to A and B or bearer had no agreement as to the consequences of a default in payment of interest, but had upon it a certificate signed by A and B, trustees, stating that the bond with other bonds was secured by a certain mortgage, with power of entry and foreclosure in case of default, and "with provision that the principal sum secured by said mortgage should become due, in case the interest on the bonds remain unpaid for four months," and the mortgage was made to A and B, trustees, it was held that a holder of a bond could not sue for the principal on four months' default in the interest, as this default was only available to the trustees.

IV. Conflict in the instruments.

Where there is an actual conflict as to maturity in the instruments, the note or bond will prevail over the mortgage. Ferris v. Johnson, 136 Mich. 227, 98 N. W. 1014, where a chattel mortgage misrecited the due date of the note as later than it was.

So, where the principal of a railroad bond became due after default in interest and demand, a demand was held necessary although the provision in the mortgage omitted the requirement of demand. Indiana 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

lation of facts constitutes a part of the evidence in the case, and is referred to both in the reporter's notes and the findings of the court. The transcript of the evidence is duly settled and certified by the presiding judge in accordance with the statute.

This is an action for foreclosure of a real estate mortgage. On the 16th day of August, 1909, Asaph D. Clark, one of the respondents herein, sold to Emma L. Paddock, the appellant, a farm, and as part payment therefor received two promissory notes secured by a mortgage on the land sold. The first note was for the principal sum of $10,800, due August 11, 1911, and the second note was for the sum of $15,000, due August 11, 1914. The notes each contained the following stipulation: "Interest ana & I. C. R. Co. v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 754, 26 L. ed. 554.

And where, by the note, a default matures the entire debt at the option of the holder, while by the mortgage the maturity takes place upon the default itself, the note controls. Kennedy v. Gibson, 68 Kan. 612, 75 Pac. 1044.

In Linam v. Anderson, — Ga. App. —, 78 S. E. 424, where the note provided for maturity of the principal at the option of the holder on default of interest for thirty days, and the mortgage provided for maturity of the principal at the option of the holder immediately upon any default in interest, it was held that if these clauses were conflicting, that the note would control, the mortgage.

And where the respective clauses were similar to those in the last case, it was held that upon a suit on an interest coupon begun before such thirty days, the mortgagor could not tender the entire amount of the debt. Fletcher v. Daugherty, 13 Neb. 224, 13 N. W. 207.

But, in Swearingen v. Lahner, 93 Iowa, 147, 26 L.R.A. 765, 57 Am. St. Rep. 261, 61 N. W. 431, where the note provided that on default in the payment of interest, the whole principal and interest became due and collectable at the holder's option, and the mortgage provided that in case of thirty days' default in the payment of interest "the note shall become due and payable" and the mortgagee "may proceed at once to foreclose this mortgage, "while it was held that, inasmuch as the holder had waited until after thirty days' default, the note was due and that a tender of interest thereafter could not alter the case; it was also held that whether it was due or not, he had a right to foreclose the mortgage where he did not ask any personal judgment.

In Rothschild v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 84 Hun, 103, 32 N. Y. Supp. 37, where a railroad bond and coupons contained a promise to pay the interest semi-annually, the bond containing also a covenant to pay the principal at a certain date, and reciting that it was "entitled to the benefits to be paid annually, and if not so paid the whole sum of both principal and interest to become immediately due and collectable." The mortgage contained the following stipulation with reference to any default in making payment of interest: "But in case default shall be made in the payments of said principal sums of money or any part thereof as provided in said notes, or if the interest be not paid as therein specified, then, and from thenceforth, it shall be optional with said party of the second part, his executors, administrators, or assigns, to consider the whole of said principal sums expressed in said notes as immediately due and payable, although the time expressed in said notes for the payment thereof shall not have arrived." On about August 3, 1910, the appellant paid to respondent Asaph D. Clark the sum of $1,290 by draft payable to his order, and this sum was received and accepted and indorsed on the notes. On November 2, 1910, appellant paid the first not of $10,800 by draft, and the same was accepted, indorsed, and cashed, and the note surrendered. All interest and principal except the principal sum of the $15,000 note was paid up to August 11, 1910. The interest on the latter note from August 11, 1910, to August 11, 1911, became due and payable on the 11th day of August, 1911, but was not then paid. This interest was not paid, and nothing whatever was done either by the maker or payee until the 27th day of February, 1912. On the latter date, the appellant tendered Clark and subject to the provisions of" a trust deed, "which trust deed also provides, in the several cases of default as therein specifically stated, for the right in the trustee to exercise the power of entry thereby conferred, the right to declare the principal due, to sell in case of nonpayment of such principal, subject to the qualifications therein contained, to which trust deed reference is hereby made,"—it was held that the holder of the bond might maintain an action at law for unpaid interest, even if such right were denied by the mortgage, as if there was a direct conflict the bond must control, and if there was an ambiguity it must be resolved against the maker of the instruments.

There are some cases, however, in which a conflict in the instruments as to maturity has been resolved in favor of the mortgage.

Thus, in Brownlee v. Arnold, 60 Mo. 79, where four notes were given for land payable annually, respectively, and a deed of trust securing the notes stated that the notes should not become due nor the deed be foreclosed until the maturity of the last note, and after the maturity of the first note it was assigned to the plaintiff, who had knowledge of all the circumstances, it was held that he could not recover on it prior to the maturity of the last note. But this case was disapproved in Owings v. McKenzie, 133 Mo. 323, 40 L.R.A. 154, 33 S. W. 802.

See also CLARK v. PADDOCK.

And where it is clear that the contract of the parties was that the security will not be available until a certain period after default in the note, and this contract is only in the mortgage, there cannot be foreclosure before the time so specified in the mortgage.

Thus, where the condition of a mortgage securing a note payable on demand is that, if it be paid with interest within sixty days after such demand, etc., the mortgage may not be foreclosed until sixty days after such demand. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Curtis, 35 Ohio St. 343; Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Jones, 35 Ohio St. 351. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So, in Chick v. Willetts, 2 Kan. 384, where some time after the maker had made a note payable one day after date, he executed a mortgage to secure the note containing a stipulation that if default was made in the payment of the note for two years from the date of the mortgage that instrument might be foreclosed, it was held that the statute of limitations did not begin to run against the mortgage until two years from its date as foreclosure could not take place till that time; but this point was not necessary to the decision of the case.

It will be observed in this connection that in Ferris v. Johnson, 136 Mich. 227, 98 N. W. 1014, the date in the mortgage was a mere misrecital.

And that a general reference in a bond to the mortgage would carry into the bond a clause in the mortgage forbidding a suit for interest was probably held in the insufficiently reported case of McClelland v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. 3 N. Y. S. R. 250, where it is probable that the interest coupons referred to the bond, and that the bond referred to the mortgage; and it was held that the holder of a detached coupon could not sue for his interest when it was provided in the mortgage that the majority of bondholders might instruct the trustees of the mortgage to waive any default and such waiver had been made.

V. Acceleration clause in one instrument only.

a. In general.

It is not intended to discuss here the effect, meaning, or construction of acceleration clauses in themselves, but only the question which arises from the fact that such clause is incorporated in one instrument, and not in the other.

Cases of acceleration governed by statute are not included. For cases where such clauses differed in the two instruments, see supra, III. and IV. For provisions in one instrument as to waiving the acceleration clause in the other instrument, see Lyon the sum of $750 in payment of the interest. This tender was made first by draft and subsequently in gold coin, so no question arises here as to the sufficiency of the tender. It is stipulated that at the time this tender was made "Asaph D. Clark made no objection to the draft as tendered for the payment of said interest, but merely stated that he guessed he would not accept the payment of the $750 interest, and that he would consult his attorney and let the defendant know later." It is further stipulated that "at no time did the said plaintiff or any one in his behalf notify the defendant or any one in her behalf that the said $750 interest was due, and at no time did he make any demand on her for the payment of the same." Clark never gave the appellant any notice whatever, after this tender was made, as to his determination in reference to accepting the payment or of his purpose to declare the debt due, until about 5 o'clock P. M., February 29th, when he stated to appellant's counsel that he had decided to foreclose the mortgage, and that complaint had been filed that afternoon. The complaint in foreclosure was in fact filed at 4:50 P. M., February 19, 1912, which was two days after the tender of payment of the $750 interest due.

The case was submitted to the court on the foregoing facts, and the court decided in favor of the plaintiff and granted a decree of foreclosure, and defendant has appealed. There is no dispute over the facts in the case, and the only question presented

v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. supra, III.; and McClelland v. Norfolk Southern R. Co. supra, IV.

b. In note, and not in mortgage.

That an acceleration clause in the note, and not in the mortgage, permits the foreclosure of the mortgage according to the terms of such acceleration clause, was held in San Gabriel Valley Bank v. Lake View Town Co. 4 Cal. App. 630, 80 Pac. 360, where the court said: "The note and the mortgage constitute one contract; the latter is incidental and stands as security for the former, and whenever the note, for any reason, becomes due, a right of action of foreclosure is at once available." But it is at least doubtful whether the true construction of the mortgage itself did not admit of foreclosure for the full amount.

A fortiori where the note contains an acceleration clause and the mortgage is conditioned for the payment of the note according to its true intent and meaning, there may be a foreclosure on the default provided for by the acceleration clause. Graham v. Fitts, 53 Fla. 1046, 43 So. 512, 13 Ann. Cas. 149.

So, a foreclosure for the full amount was upheld in Farnsworth v. Hoover, 66 Ark. 367, 50 S. W. 865, where the notes contained each a provision that, "on failure to pay interest thirty days after due, the holder may collect principal and interest at once," and the mortgage, after reciting the notes and the dates of their maturity (but not the acceleration clause) was conditioned on the payment of the money, "at the time and in the manner aforesaid."

For effect of acceleration provision in mortgage or note to set the statute of limitations running, see the notes to Hall v. Jameson, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1190, and Lovell v. Goss, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1110.

c. In mortgage and not in note.

1. Effect on foreclosure.

The subject of provision in bond or note that instrument when due and unpaid shall be added to the principal, as affecting right to foreclose mortgage securing the same for default in interest is omitted, as treated in the note to Castor v. Muramoto, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 108.

Though there be no acceleration clause in the note, an acceleration clause in the mortgage will enable the holder, upon the breach mentioned in such clause, to foreclose the mortgage for the full amount of the note, although the debt be not due by its terms.

Swett v. Stark, 31 Fed. 858 (N. D. Ill.); Savannah & M. R. Co. v. Lancaster, 62 Ala. 555; Brickell v. Batchelder, 62 Cal. 623 (on default in taxes); Maddox v. Wyman, 92 Cal. 674, 28 Pac. 838; Phelps v. Mayers, 126 Cal. 549, 58 Pac. 1048; Rasmussen v. Levin, 28 Colo. 448, 65 Pac. 94 (taxes, reversed on other grounds); Taylor v. Alliance Trust Co. 71 Miss. 694, 15 So. 121 (citing Dunton v. Sharpe, 70 Miss. 850, 12 So. 800); Waples v. Jones, 62 Mo. 440; Rumsey v. People's R. Co. 154 Mo. 215; Westminster College v. Peirsol, 161 Mo. 270, 61 S. W. 811; Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Westerhoff, 58 Neb. 379, 76 Am. St. Rep. 101, 78 N. W. 724, 79 N. W. 731; Gore v. Davis, 124 N. C. 234, 32 S. E. 554.

The same was probably held in the following cases, which, however, do not state definitely that the note omits the clause. Gibbons v. Hoag, 95 Ill. 45; Hoodless v. Reid, 112 Ill. 105; Brown v. Miner, 128 Ill. 148, 21 N. E. 223 (taxes also); Gray v. Robertson, 174 Ill. 242, 51 N. E. 248 (taxes); Garrett v. Simpson, 115 Ill. App. 62 (taxes); Pope v. Durant, 26 Iowa, 233 (taxes); Stancil v. Norton, 11 Kan. 218 (taxes); Sharp v. Barker, 11 Kan. 381 (taxes); Ellwood v. Wolcott, 32 Kan. 526, 4 Pac. 1056 (taxes); Condon v. Maynard, 71 Md. 601, 18 Atl. 957 (taxes); Meier v. Meier, 105 Mo. 411, 16 S. W. 223; Hartsuff v. Hall, 58 Neb. 417, 78 N. W. 716 (taxes); Cincinnati Hotel Co. v. Central Trust & S. D. Co. 25 Ohio L. J. 375; Bell v. Engvolsen, 64 Wash. 33, 116 Pac. 456.

In Flesher v. Hubbard, — Okla. —, 132 Pac. 1080, where a note contained a pro-is the question of law to be applied in construing the stipulation contained in the note and the one in the mortgage with reference to default in payment of interest maturing the entire debt. The respondent contends that, notwithstanding the provision contained in the mortgage, the stipulation contained in the note is controlling, and that a failure to make payment of interest when due ipso facto matured the entire debt. The appellant, on the other hand, contends that the stipulation in the note and the one in the mortgage should be read and construed together as parts of one contract, and that, when so read, it will be found that a default in the payment of interest only matures the entire debt by the exercise of an option on the part of the creditor to so declare the debt due.

The cases relied on by respondents do not go to the extent nor support the contention here claimed. In Hutchinson v. Benedict, 49 Kan. 545, 31 Pac. 147, the notes contained the provision that, if any part of the principal or interest should not be paid at maturity, it should bear interest thereafter at the rate of 12 per cent. The mortgage provided that, in case of any default, the whole debt should become due, with interest at 12 per cent from date. The court held that the note should control, and that the clause it contained meant "that both principal and interest were to bear interest after maturity at the rate of 12 per cent per annum."

New England Mortg. Secur. Co. v. Casevision that after maturity the interest rate would be greater, and the mortgage contained an acceleration clause on default of interest, etc., at the election of the holder, it was held that on default in interest the mortgage might be foreclosed for the whole sum.

The same was held in Jones v. Hubbard, — Okla. —, 132 Pac. 1082.

But where the bond provided that the obligor should pay taxes, and, in case of default, the obligee might discharge them and collect the same with interest as part of the bond, and the mortgage provided that if default was made in payment of taxes the mortgagee might sell the premises and from the proceeds retain the principal and taxes and charges, it was held that there could not be foreclosure for a mere default in paying the taxes unless the mortgagee had paid them. Williams v. Townsend, 31 N. Y. 411.

In Frink v. Neal, 37 Ill. App. 621, where by mistake a note payable in three years recited that the interest was payable after maturity, instead of from date, and the deed securing the note recited it as bearing interest from date payable annually, and stated that the whole debt might be declared due for default in payment of interest, it was held that foreclosure might be maintained for default in interest before the three years had expired.

In McLean v. Presley, 56 Ala. 211, where a mortgage securing several notes provided that if payment was made of notes and interest, "as they respectively fall due, then this instrument is void," "but, if I fail to pay the said described promissory notes, as they fall due, with the interest thereon, then," etc., it was held that after failure to pay one note there might be a foreclosure of the whole premises, and the mortgagee had the right to retain out of any surplus over the amounts then due, a sum sufficient to meet the amounts coming due thereafter.

Where a mortgage securing bonds provided

ed for foreclosure on default in interest, and provided that the maturity of the debt should be at the time of the completion of the foreclosure sale, the court postponed the sale for eighteen months in view of the fact that the property was increasing in value, was paying off arrears, and that the ordinary redemption period of one year could not be availed of as the mortgage covered not only real estate, but personal property. American Loan & T. Co. v. Union Depot Co. 80 Fed. 36 (Dist. of Wash.).

In Brockway v. McClun, 243 Ill. 196, 90 N. E. 374 (affirming 148 Ill. App. 465), it was held that an agreement to extend the maturity of the debt did not affect the right of the mortgagee to foreclose for non-payment of taxes according to a provision in the mortgage.

2. Effect on maturity of note or bond.

There is a direct conflict in the cases upon the question whether the effect of an acceleration clause in the mortgage will be limited to foreclosure for the full amount of the note, or whether it will mature the debt itself.

The clause as maturing the debt.

It is not intended to go into the question whether an affirmative act taking advantage of the clause is necessary on the part of the mortgagee, but simply to consider whether in any event the clause when only in the mortgage may mature the note.

Upon the weight of authority a clause only in the mortgage providing that the debt shall become due upon a contingency therein set forth will mature the note, although it be not due by its terms.

Brewer v. Penn. Mut. L. Ins. Co. 36 C. C. A. 289, 94 Fed. 347 (8th circuit); Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Howard, 28 Fed. 741 (C. C. E. D. Mo.); Chambers v. Marks, 93 Ala. 412, 9 So. 74; Gregory v. Marks, 8 Biss. 44 Fed. Cas. No. 5802 (N. D. Ill.); Hennessy v. Gore, 35 Ill. App. 594; Clayton v. Whitaker, 68 Iowa, 412, 27 N. W. 296; First Nat. Bank v. Peck, 8 Kan. 660; Spesard v. Spesard, 75 Kan. 87, 88 Pac.

bier, 3 Kan. App. 741, 45 Pac. 452, simply held that where a note provided for interest at 7 per cent, and the mortgage securing the note called for interest at 12 per cent, the note, being evidence of the debt and the principal obligation, should control.

Rothschild v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. 84 Hun, 103, 32 N. Y. Supp. 37, holds that, where bonds and a trust deed given to secure their payment contained wholly inconsistent provisions, the terms of the bonds must prevail. This was on the theory that the bonds were the evidence of indebtedness and the principal obligation.

Banzer v. Richter, 68 Misc. 192, 123 N. Y. Supp. 678, involved the right of the holder of several notes secured by one mortgage to sue on one note, and subsequently maintain an action on another note that was due by the terms of a contract and chattel mortgage securing the same at the time the first action was commenced. The court held that under the terms of the contract and mortgage no option could be exercised, and that on the happening of the stipulated event the debt became immediately due.

In Fletcher v. Daugherty, 13 Neb. 224, 13 N. W. 207, the court held that the provisions of the note and mortgage must be construed "together as parts of one contract," and that, when so considered, it was evident that the holder of the note and mortgage must in some way elect to declare them due in order to set the statute of limitations running.

576; Kansas Loan & T. Co. v. Gill, 2 Kan. App. 488; Piersol v. Shelley, 3 Kan. App. 386, 42 Pac. 922; Evans v. Baker, 5 Kan. App. 68, 47 Pac. 314; Grand Island Sav. & L. Asso. v. Moore, 40 Neb. 686, 59 N. W. 115; San Antonio Real Estate Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Stewart, 94 Tex. 441, 86 Am. St. Rep. 864, 61 S. W. 386 (in lien securing notes citing Dodge v. Signor, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 45, 44 S. W. 926, notes secured by vendors' lien in deed); Schoonmaker v. Taylor, 14 Wis. 314.

See also, as recognizing the rule, Lewis v. Lewis, 58 Kan. 563, 50 Pac. 454; and Douthitt v. Farrell, 60 Kan. 195, 56 Pac. 9.

The same was probably held in the following cases, which, however, do not state definitely that the clause was not in the note: Leonard v. Tyler, 60 Cal. 299; Beal v. Stevens, 72 Cal. 451, 14 Pac. 186; Moore v. Sargent, 112 Ind. 484, 14 N. E. 466; Snyder v. Miller, 71 Kan. 410, 69 L.R.A. 250, 114 Am. St. Rep. 489, 80 Pac. 970; Pope v. Hooper, 6 Neb. 178; Lantry v. French, 33 Neb. 524, 50 N. W. 679; Green v. Frick, 25 S. D. 342, 126 S. W. 579.

The same seems to have been held in effect in Williams v. Douglass, 47 La. Ann. 1277, 17 So. 805, though the court states that it cites the authorities "without aligning the court on either side of the controversy for the present;" but it was there held that future accruing interest capitalized in notes not yet due on their face must be excluded from the recovery.

A clause in a note that "the interest is paid to maturity by coupon notes hereto attached, which, with the principal, are secured by mortgage," will not overthrow an express agreement in the mortgage that, on failure to pay the interest or coupon notes at maturity, the whole of the mortgage debt shall become due and collectable at the mortgagee's option. Buchanan v. Berkshire L. Ins. Co. 96 Ind. 510.

In Spesard v. Spesard, 75 Kan. 87, 88 Pac. 576, it was held that an acceleration clause as to taxes solely in the mortgage matured the note, although the mortgage was dated some years later than the note.

So, also, where notes and a chattel mortgage were given in pursuance of an earlier agreement, providing that the mortgage should contain the accelerating clause, a default provided for therein will mature the notes. Banzer v. Richter, 68 Misc. 192, 123 N. Y. Supp. 678.

In Germond v. Hermosa Ice Co. 9 S. D. 387, 69 N. W. 578 (where there was probably no acceleration clause in the note), it was held that an acceleration clause in the mortgage would mature the debt on default in interest after an extension of time of the principal, or part thereof, as the interest clause remained unaffected.

The clause as limited to realizing upon the security.

There are other cases, however, which limit the effect of an acceleration clause only in the mortgage to realizing upon the security. Rasmussen v. Levin, 28 Colo. 449, 65 Pac. 94; White v. Miller, 52 Minn. 367, 19 L.R.A. 673, 54 N. W. 736; Capehart v. Detrick, 91 N. C. 344; McClelland v. Bishop, 42 Ohio St. 113; Owings v. McKenzie, 133 Mo. 323, 40 L.R.A. 154, 33 S. W. 802; Lawson v. Cundiff, 81 Mo. App. 169; McMillan v. Grayston, 83 Mo. App. 425; Westminster College v. Peirsol, 161 Mo. 270, 61 S. W. 811 (obiter); Tobin v. Smith, 1 Ohio N. P. 75, 1 Ohio Dec. 675.

In American Nat. Bank v. American Wood Paper Co. 19 R. I. 155, 29 L.R.A. 103, 61 Am. St. Rep. 746, 32 Atl. 305, the court seems to have been of the same opinion, but it was not necessary to the decision of the case.

An acceleration clause in the mortgage, making the debt due on default in payment of taxes, enables a foreclosure to be had, but does not permit the foreclosure of a collateral quitclaim deed which has no provision for acceleration in it. Rasmussen v. Levin, 28 Colo. 448, 65 Pac. 94, the court following the White, Bishop and Owings Cases, supra.

In Taylor v. American Nat. Bank, — Fla. —, 57 So. 678, it was held that a default in interest did not mature the note Magee v. Burch, 108 Mo. 336, 18 S. W. 1078, held that a misdescription in the mortgage of the payees named in the note was not fatal to the security, and that the note itself would prevail.

In Kennedy v. Gibson, 68 Kan. 612, 75 Pac. 1044, the note provided that a default should mature the whole debt at the option of the holder thereof, while the mortgage provided that a default should make the whole debt immediately due. The court held that the provision in the note would prevail, and that the option must be exercised in order to set the statute of limitations running.

It will be seen from a review of the foregoing cases that no one of these covers a state of facts like we are dealing with here, where the note provided that a default should render the whole debt due, and the mortgage provided that default should render the debt due at the option of the holder thereof. If in this case we should adopt the view taken by respondents, we would have to wholly disregard the provision in the mortgage providing that in case of default the debt should fall due at the option of the holder. On the other hand, if we follow the rule of construction that requires every provision of a contract to be given force and effect when possible and where they can be construed in harmony, we would hold that the provision in the note maturing the debt on default of any payment when due, and the clause in the mortgage providing for default, maturing the debt at the option of the holder, are not inconsistent with the intention that a default should in the sense that an assignee of it without notice of the default would take it subject to any defenses between the original parties, although there was an acceleration clause in the mortgage (but not in the note) making the principal due on default in interest.

The Missouri court has not kept to the same side of the question. In Noell v. Gaines, 68 Mo. 649, it was held that an acceleration clause in the mortgage matured the note though there is reason to consider that some of the earlier Missouri cases did not support this view.

But in Owings v. McKenzie, 133 Mo. 323, 40 L.R.A. 154, 33 S. W. 802, supra; Noell v. Gaines, was overruled, and also Brownlee v. Arnold 60 Mo. 79, in so far as it agreed with the doctrine of the Noell Case.

And the other Missouri cases cited above have followed the Owings Case.

There are expressions in Gore v. Davis, 124 N. C. 234, 32 S. E. 554, which seem at first to indicate that the court considered that an acceleration clause in the mortgage matured the debt, but the citation therein of Capehart v. Dettrick, 91 N. C. 344, supra, which holds the contrary, shows that the court was not intending to depart from that case.

VI. Miscellaneous.

In Farrar v. Payne, 73 Ill. 82, it was held that an omission in a deed of trust, of the date of maturity of a note secured, did not make the deed void as against purchasers of the equity of redemption.

In Pettis v. Kellogg, 7 Cush. 456, where after a note had become due a mortgage was given to secure it, conditioned for the payment of the note according to its tenor, it was held that this was a condition to pay the note on demand.

Where notes were made by two makers, and one of the makers gave a mortgage with a clause in it accelerating the payment of the principal if one of the notes or interest should be unpaid, it was held 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that such a default could not make the principal due, as one of the makers did not join in the mortgage; the court not passing upon the question that would have arisen if both had joined in the mortgage. Trease v. Haggin, 107 Iowa, 458, 78 N. W. 58.

In Bourne v. Littlefield, 29 Me. 302, where the question was not as to the date and time of maturity, but as to the identity of the instrument secured, it was held that parol testimony was admissible to show that a note payable on demand, with interest, was the note referred to in a mortgage conditioned for payment on a certain future date not mentioning interest, and referring to the note as payable "at the time aforesaid."

So, where one of the several notes secured by a deed of trust was described in a schedule to the deed as dated October 18, 1833, and payable May 21, 1834, when it was in fact payable April 21, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to show the mistake, particularly as the parties had provided in the deed "that such alterations and additions in and to the schedules hereto annexed may be made by the mutual consent in writing of one of each of the parties hereto, as shall be necessary for a more perfect and correct statement of the matters and things herein contained." Pierce v. Parker, 4 Met. 80.

While without the scope of this note, reference may be made to Lomax v. Smyth, 50 Iowa, 223, where to secure a past-due draft the debtor, after paying the interest to date, made a note with the same date and maturity as the draft, and he and his wife conveyed her land to the creditor, who executed a defeasance to reconvey upon payment of the note twelve months thereafter, with interest payable semiannually; it was held that, as there was a valid agreement for the extension of time of the principal, the creditor could not enforce the note until the time mentioned in the defeasance.

mature the debt at the option of the holder of the note and mortgage. By such a construction the holder of the paper gets all the protection he could possibly get by any construction, because he could exercise his option as soon as a default is made, and by such a construction the statute of limitation would not begin to run against his claim unless he does exercise this option. On the other hand, the debtor is given the protection of having the holder of the paper exercise his option in some manner and by some act. Such a construction saves the debtor from going to the trouble, and oftentimes expense, of raising interest or an installment, and then, upon making tender being informed that the debt has already automatically fallen due.

Stipulations of this kind for the acceleration of the maturity of a debt should be so construed, if possible and consistent with the language employed, as to give the protection intended thereby to both the debtor and the creditor. Such a clause is inserted in a note or mortgage for the purpose of enabling the holder thereof, upon default in payment of interest or principal, as the case may be, to institute his action for the collection of the debt, if he so desires, before the apparent maturity of the instrument as appears upon its face. The financial circumstances of the debtor or the nature of the security may have become such in the meanwhile as to render it necessary and important for the protection of the creditor that he be authorized to immediately prosecute his action for the collection of the debt. This protection is afforded him as fully and amply by requiring him to exercise the option of declaring the debt due as by providing that the debt shall automatically become due on the failure to make the payment. The mere commencement of an action is an exercise of the option (Trinity County Bank v. Haas, 151 Cal. 553, 91 Pac. 385; Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156, 58 Pac. 451), or a notice to the debtor that the debt is overdue, and that the creditor exercises the option of declaring it due, or that if not paid within a specified time the creditor will not receive payment thereafter, would constitute an exercise of the option. In other words, a creditor who is the holder of the paper can suffer no disadvantage or injury whatever by being required to exercise his option. The debtor, on the contrary, is afforded a degree of protection by requiring the creditor to exercise his option, rather than to allow the mere failure to make payment ipso facto mature the debt. So long as the debtor has not got the money with which to make the payment, and does not tender it, the creditor may not be particular about exercising his option, and if not he should not be allowed, after the debt or has gone out and raised the money, and made the tender, to then exercise his option or say the debt has automatically fallen due, when in truth and fact he has done no act whatever that would indicate his understanding or intention that the debt and obligation has matured, or that he has exercised his option to consider it matured.

It should be remembered that this is a foreclosure proceeding whereby the creditor not only seeks judgment for the amount of the debt, but also seeks a judgment and decree for the sale of the specific property encumbered by the mortgage for the payment of the debt. In such a case, the note and mortgage must be considered and construed together as one contract (Lewis v. Sutton, 21 Idaho, 541, 122 Pac. 911; Trinity County Bank v. Haas, 151 Cal. 553, 91 Pac. 385; Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 Pac. 1110), and the creditor should not be allowed to refuse a tender and foreclose his mortgage in spite of the tender, where the very instrument which gives him his security and lien provides that a default in payment of interest shall mature the debt only in case of the exercise of the option to declare the whole debt due. To allow him to do so would be contrary to both the letter and spirit of his lien contract.

The general rule that a note and mortgage given to secure the payment of the same must be construed together as one contract is reinforced by § 4520 of the Rev. Codes of this state, which provides that "there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real estate or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions" of chapter 1, title 10, pt. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, which chapter is entitled, "Actions for the Foreclosure of Mortgages." In other words, under the statute of this state (§ 4520, Rev. Codes), no action can be maintained for the recovery on a promissory note secured by mortgage, unless the action be coupled with an action to foreclose the mortgage, except where it is shown that the security has become valueless. This rule is established both by the decisions in this state and the decisions of the supreme court of California from which our statute was taken. First Nat. Bank v. Williams, 2 Idaho, 670, 23 Pac. 552; Rein v. Callaway, 7 Idaho, 634, 65 Pac. 63; Bartlett v. Cottle, 63 Cal. 366; Barbieri v. Ramelli, 84 Cal. 157, 23 Pac. 1086; McKean v. German-American Sav. Bank, 118 Cal. 336, 50 Pac. 656; Winters v. Hub Min. Co. (C. C.) 57 Fed. 292; Lilly-Brackett Co. v.

Sonnemann, 157 Cal. 192, 106 Pac. 715, 21 Ann. Cas. 1279. See also dissenting opinion in Kelley v. Clark, 23 Idaho, 1, 129 Pac. 926. This being true, it necessarily follows that the action is primarily an action to foreclose the mortgage and obtain a decree authorizing a sale of the mortgaged property. Under the law of this state, "the mortgaged property becomes the primary security, and the personal obligation of the mortgagor a secondary one. The mortgagor, under our statute, is personally liable only after foreclosure, and then only for the balance shown to be due by the return of the sheriff." Rein v. Callaway, 7 Idaho, 634, 23 Pac. 63. Before such a decree can be had, it is necessary to determine the amount due. This is done, however, by the court as a court of equity, and the debtor is not entitled as a matter of law to a jury for the purpose of determining the amount due. Christenson v. Hollingsworth, 6 Idaho, 92, 96 Am. St. Rep. 256, 53 Pac. 211; Shields v. Johnson, 10 Idaho, 476, 79 Pac. 391, 3 Ann. Cas. 245; Naylor v. Lewiston & S. E. Electric R. Co. 14 Idaho, 722, 95 Pac. 827. The primary charge is therefore in rem, and the personal charge or obligation can only arise for a deficiency after the res or thing pledged has been exhausted.

The judgment is reversed and the cause will be remanded, with direction to the trial court to dismiss the action upon payment to respondents of the money tendered into court as proffered by the answer. Costs awarded in favor of appellant.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 1.)

EXCHANGE NATIONAL BANK OF SPO-KANE, Appt.,
v.

ALEXANDER PANTAGES, Respt.

Guaranty — request for loan — knowledge of condition — effect.

The president of a corporation who, with knowledge that a bank will not renew a note of the corporation without his guaranty, telegraphs a request for renewal with the assurance that he will arrange things satisfactorily upon his return, assumes the obligation of guarantor on the note accepted in accordance with such request.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County sustaining a demurrer to a complaint seeking to hold defendant liable as guarantor of a promissory note. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nuzum, Clark, & Nuzum and Sullivan & Christian, for appellant:

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The lower court sustained a general demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint in this case and dismissed the action. The plaintiff has appealed. The complaint alleges in substance: That the plaintiff is a national bank doing business in the city of Spokane. That the Pantages Amusement Company is a corporation conducting a theater and amusement business in Spokane. The Pantages Theater Company is likewise a corporation doing a theater business. That the Pantages Amusement Company is one of a chain telegram with knowledge that the bank would not renew the note without a guaranty.

Although, in Goldring v. Thompson, 58 Fla. 248, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 418, 51 So. 40, the court declared in a general way that a mere request by one to give credit to another does not create a legal liability to pay the debt, and that there must be a guaranty of the debt or a misrepresentation of the responsibility of the person to whom the credit is given in order to create such liability,—the court held that a guaranty was made by the instrument involved reading, "Please ship to Mr. B. L. Hall" certain goods. "Your money is good, I will be in your city in a few days," this being regarded as involving more than a mere request.

A contrary conclusion was reached in a similar situation in Eaton v. Mayo, 118 Mass. 141, where the plaintiff refused to deliver goods to a purchaser until he had obtained a guaranty, and the defendant wrote a letter requesting the plaintiff to let the purchaser have what goods he might want on four months, and that he (the purchaser) would pay as usual,—the court holding that there was no ambiguity in the meaning, and that therefore there was no 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) occasion to resort to the surrounding circumstances or the relations of the parties to ascertain their intent; and that the writing was at most but an expression of confidence on the part of the defendant that the purchaser would himself pay for the goods he was about to purchase.

In the light of all the circumstances it was held in McCauley v. Croes, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 111 S. W. 790, that a guaranty was made by a father of one of the makers of a note, by an instrument directed to the intended payee of the note and reading: "I have sworn off going on notes, but want to help my son, and, if he should not pay . . . I will see that it is fixed, and told the banker that I would." Here the court invoked the principle that the intention of the parties should control, when the intention clearly appears, and that notwithstanding it might be necessary, in order to give such intention effect, to give to words used by them a meaning not uncommonly attached to them, yet not recognized as belonging to them by the compilers of dictionaries. This remark was used by the court in construing the word "fixed" as being used in the sense of "paid."

of theaters controlled by the defendant, beginning at Spokane and ending at Los Angeles, California; theaters in Seattle and Tacoma being a part of the chain. That the Pantages Theater Company is also owned and controlled by the defendant. That at all times the defendant was a stockholder in and president of the Pantages Amusement Company. That on June 15, 1911, the amusement company executed to plaintiff its promissory note for $2,500 due ninety days after date, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum. That the note was renewed when due for a period of ninety days. That on December 12, 1911, when the renewal note became due, plaintiff demanded that the amusement company pay the same or secure the guaranty or indorsement thereof by the defendant. That the amusement company agreed to secure the guaranty of the note by the defendant, and at that time the amusement company executed to plaintiff a new note for the same amount, payable ninety days after December 12, 1911. That said note was not delivered or accepted as an obligation of the amusement company nor in satisfaction of the previous note; but that plaintiff took and held the same in accordance with the understanding with the amusement company until the amusement company should secure the guaranty of the note by the defendant. That on the 14th day of January, 1912, the defendant, for a good and valuable consideration, telegraphed Clark Walker, who is the general manager of the amusement company, under the defendant's signature, a telegram of which the following is a copy, to wit:

San Francisco, Calif., Jan. 14, 1912.
Clark Walker,
Pantages Theater, Spokane.

Tell bank I request them to renew the note. Security just as good now as when loan was first made and they are collecting interest on their money. I will arrange things satisfactory to them upon my return to Seattle.

Alex. Pantages.

That, on account of said telegram and the assurances therein contained, the plaintiff accepted the new note, and did not enforce the payment on the original indebtedness, which, prior to that time, the bank had threatened to do, relying upon the assurances of the defendant that he would arrange things satisfactorily to the plaintiff; and but for these assurances the plaintiff would have proceeded with its remedy on the original indebtedness. That at or about the time of the execution of the original note, the defendant assured the officers of the plaintiff that the amusement company had ample resources to meet the payment of the note, and defendant was instrumental in securing the loan of the money represented by the note and the renewal thereof. That it was to the interest of the defendant that the plaintiff desist from bringing suit upon the note or upon the original indebtedness, for the reason that, if the plaintiff had commenced suit against the amusement company, it could and would have closed the theater in Spokane in which the companies were showing and in other theaters owned and managed by the defendant, broken up the circuit, and made it impossible for the defendant to have shown his attractions in Spokane. That on or about the 26th day of March, 1912, an action was commenced by Lois Pantages, the wife of the defendant, against the amusement company, in King county, on sixteen promissory notes signed by the amusement company, in most cases payable to the Pantages Theater Company, owned and controlled by the defendant; said notes aggregating $10,000. That a receiver was appointed, and all the property of the amusement company sold to the theater company for a nominal consideration. That there is no money or property of the amusement company out of which to satisfy the plaintiff's demands. That it was not true, as stated in the guaranty and telegram of the defendant that the security held by the plaintiff was as good at the time as when the loan was first made; but that the assets of the amusement company were being decreased by the defendant wholly and solely for the purpose of absorbing all of the assets of the amusement company. That plaintiff, on account of the matters contained in the telegram, did not bring suit upon the original indebtedness, but accepted the new note executed December 12, 1911, lost what security it had by reason of the then existing assets of the amusement company, and was prevented from realizing anything from the amusement company on account thereof. That no provision was made by the defendant for the payment of the note, no arrangement of any kind was made to secure the same by the defendant, and the note was never paid. The second cause of action was for a separate note for $2,500, based upon substantially the same state of facts.

The controlling question presented here is whether the telegram hereinbefore quoted constituted a guaranty by the defendant, Alex. Pantages, of the note sued upon. The trial court was evidently of the opinion that this telegram did not constitute a guaranty of the note, and therefore held that the complaint did not state a cause of action upon either note. It is conceded in the briefs that no particular form of words is necessary to constitute a guaranty. The rule seems to be that in order to constitute a guaranty the writing should be so construed as to determine the intention of the parties, or, as stated in Bell v. Bruen, 1 How. 169, 11 L. ed. 89:

"We think the court should adopt the construction which, under all the circumstances of the case, ascribes the most reasonable, probable, and natural conduct to the parties. In the language of this court in Douglas v. Reynolds, 7 Pet. 122, 8 L. ed. 630: 'Every instrument of this sort ought to receive a fair and reasonable interpretation, according to the true import of its terms. It being an engagement for the debt of another, there is certainly no reason for giving it an expanded signification, or liberal construction beyond the fair import of the terms.' Or it is 'to be construed according to what is fairly to be presumed to have been the understanding of the parties, without any strict technical nicety;' as declared in Lee v. Dick, 10 Pet. 493, 9 L. ed. 507. The presumption is of course to be ascertained from the facts and circumstances accompanying the entire transaction."

According to the facts alleged in the complaint, the defendant knew that the bank was not satisfied with the note which was offered as an extension of the payment of the note which was then past due. He then telegraphed to Mr. Walker, who was attempting to arrange for the extension: "Tell bank I request them to renew the note. . . . I will arrange things satisfactory to them upon my return to Seattle." We think it was clearly the intention of the defendant to guarantee the payment of the note, and it was evidently so understood by the bank at that time, according to the allegations of the complaint. In Goldring v. Thompson, 58 Fla. 248, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 418, 51 So. 46, the language used was: "Your money is good. I will be in your city in a few days." It was held that this constituted a guaranty. In Dover Stamping Co. v. Noyes, 151 Mass. 342, 24 N. E. 53, it was said that the plaintiff should be "taken care of." It was held that this constituted a guaranty. In Wills v. Ross, 77 Ind. 1, 40 Am. Rep. 279, where the statement was made, "Give John a little more time and I will see that you get your money," was held to be a guaranty. In J. L. Mott Iron Works v. Clark, 87 S. C. 199, 69 S. E. 227, the statement, "I will see that you are protected in any dealings that you may have with this corporation," was held to be a guaranty. In Birdsall v. Heacock, 32 Ohio St. 177, 30 Am. Rep. 572, the statement, "Please send my son the lumber he asks for, and it will be all right," was held to be a guaranty. We think the language quoted above in this case used by Mr. Pantages in his telegram, under the circumstances surrounding the transaction, was understood to be and was a guaranty of the note. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court was in error in sustaining the general demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

a. Ejectment.

In ejectment against an intruder or a trespasser, it is held by the weight of authority that a possessory title under conveyed, and soon thereafter departed this life. In the same year he deeded his homestead to a daughter, with the understanding that she should deed it back to him when the note should be out of the way. He continued for more than fifteen years to occupy the land, asserting and exercising dominion over it. When requested to reconvey, the daughter, fearing that he contemplated remarriage, delivered to him a life lease made out on a warranty deed blank, which he supposed for some time to be a good deed of conveyance. In 1905 he was adjudged insane and placed in an asylum; symptoms of mental unsoundness having been manifested as far back as 1888. The daughter was shown to have made numerous statements that she did not pretend to own the land, but intended to deed it back. During the father's occupancy, he placed valuable

Prior possession is sufficient title to maintain ejectment against an intruder or trespasser. Wilson v. Fine, 38 Fed. 789; Mickey v. Stratton, 5 Sawy. 475, Fed. Cas. No. 9,530.

The law of Oregon was held to be in force in Alaska, and a person in possession was held entitled to maintain an action to recover possession of real property, from which he had been ousted by a mere intruder. Campbell v. Silver Bow Basin Min. Co. 1 C. C. A. 155, 7 U. S. App. 71, 49 Fed. 47. This was an action to recover mining property. Hill's Comp. (Or.) 1887, § 316, provides that a person who has a legal estate in real property and a present right of possession may recover the same in an action at law.

In Christy v. Scott, 14 How. 282, 14 L. ed. 422, it was held in ejectment that a plea of defendant that the title of plaintiff was not good as against the state was bad. If the plaintiff was actually seised, and the defendant, being a mere intruder, ejected him, it was an unlawful act, and the action was maintainable, notwithstanding the state of Texas might have the true title.

And, where plaintiff had possession and a documentary title, and the defendant had no title, it was held that plaintiff should recover in ejectment. Turner v. Aldridge, 1 McAll. 229, Fed. Cas. No. 14,249.

The party in possession is presumed to be the owner in fee, and, where there was no evidence to the contrary, proof of possession under a color of right was held to be sufficient proof of title in ejectment as against a trespasser. Bradshaw v. Ashley, 180 U. S. 59, 45 L. ed. 423, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 297. It was held that the proof that title was in a third person would not avail the defendant, as title by possession in plaintiff was a title.

improvements upon the land, rented portions of it at times, and collected the rent, and repeatedly offered it for sale. Held, that the facts warranted a finding of adverse possession.

Fraud — conveyance of homestead — rights of creditors.

2. The land being the homestead of the grantor, his creditors could not have been defrauded by his conveyance thereof.

Adverse possession — subserviency.

3. Under the conditions and circumstances indicated, such occupancy was not in subserviency to the title of the grantee.

Guardian — quieting ward's title.

4. The title fully vested by such adverse possession for the statutory period can be quieted as against the daughter in a suit by the father's guardian.

in Alaska shall not be disturbed in the possession of lands actually occupied, it was held that an occupant could maintain ejectment against a United States deputy collector who had taken possession. Miller v. Blackett, 47 Fed. 547. There had been no legislation by Congress.

And possession for seven years was held sufficient to enable plaintiff in ejectment to recover against one showing no title. Burt v. Panjaud, 99 U. S. 180, 25 L. ed. 451.

Plaintiffs brought ejectment, relying on evidence of title by possession for nearly forty years. It was held that the possession of land would not enable the party to maintain a suit against one holding title from the government. Oaksmith v. Johnston, 92 U. S. 343, 23 L. ed. 682. The defendant acquired title in 1866 and entered in 1867.

Alabama.

Possession of land was held to be prima facie evidence of right, and a prior possession under a claim of right short of the period which creates a bar was held to prevail over a subsequent possession. McCall v. Doe, 17 Ala. 533.

The plaintiff in ejectment was held entitled to recover against a trespasser on the strength of prior actual possession, apart from the validity of title introduced. Green v. Jordan, 83 Ala. 220, 3 Am. St. Rep. 711, 3 So. 513.

And in ejectment a prior possession under color of title was held sufficient for plaintiff to recover, unless the defendant had shown a better title, or unless plaintiff was barred by the statute of limitations. Russell v. Erwin, 38 Ala. 44.

And a bare peaceable possession under claim of title was held sufficient to sustain ejectment against one who could not dispute plaintiff's title. Clarke v. Clarke, 51 Ala. 498; Wilson v. Glenn, 68 Ala. 383; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Philyaw, 88 Ala. 264, 6 So. 837 (that a third party had better title was held no defense where there was no privity with defendant); Jernigan v. Flowers, 94 Ala. 508, 10 So. 437; Barrett v. Kelly, 131 Ala. 378, 30 So. 824.

Adverse possession — character of title.

5. Such adverse possession and the operation of the statute of limitations created a title which can be used either offensively or defensively.

(October 7, 1911.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Mitchell County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to quiet title to certain land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles L. Hunt and Park B. Pulsifer, for appellant:

The deed from Moger to defendant was made for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, and, as against him, passed title to the property irrevocably.

Proof of prior possession under color of title was held sufficient to maintain ejectment against a trespasser or a defendant not showing a better title, where the plaintiff was not barred by limitations. Bradshaw v. Emory, 65 Ala. 208.

If plaintiff in ejectment was in possession under claim of the title or by exercising acts of ownership, it was held that he showed a prima facie right of recovery in ejectment. Doe ex dem. Mills v. Clayton, 73 Ala. 359; Beard v. Ryan, 78 Ala. 37.

And possession and acts of ownership were held sufficient to enable plaintiff to recover realty from one who came into possession later without title. Strange v. King, 84 Ala. 212, 4 So. 600.

The plaintiff in ejectment was held entitled to recover where he had prior actual possession and color of title and claim of ownership, and the defendant was estopped from denying his title. Ware v. Dewberry, 84 Ala. 568, 4 So. 404.

A plaintiff in ejectment without title was held entitled to recover by showing prior possession under claim of title, or by the exercise of acts of ownership; but he would not be entitled to recover against a trespasser, unless he showed a prior possession. Payne v. Crawford, 102 Ala. 387, 14 So. 854.

And a grantee in a defective deed, taking possession, was held entitled to maintain ejectment against a party taking possession subsequently, under a defective deed from the same grantor. Branch v. Smith, 114 Ala. 464, 21 So. 423.

A previous possession with claim of title for less than twenty years, with descent cast, was held sufficient title to sustain the claim of a husband to curtesy, and to recover in ejectment against a trespasser. Rochon v. Lecatt, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 609.

In Dothard v. Denson, 72 Ala. 541, it was said: "As to an intruder or trespasser, or as to one who does not show a better right, possession of lands, like the possession of personal property, is prima facie evidence of title, and will support ejectment."

Crawford v. Lehr, 20 Kan. 509; Durand v. Higgins, 67 Kan. 110, 72 Pac. 567; Robinson v. Blood, 64 Kan. 290, 67 Pac. 842.

Possession by grantor of land deeded is presumed not to be adverse to the title and right of possession of the grantee.

Dotson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 81 Kan. 816, 106 Pac. 1045; McNeil v. Jordan, 28 Kan. 7; Sellers v. Crossan, 52 Kan. 570, 35 Pac. 205; Hockman v. Thuma, 68 Kan. 519, 75 Pac. 486; Bird v. Whetstone, 71 Kan. 432, 80 Pac. 942.

An act by the party in possession in negotiating for or purchasing an outstanding adverse title, during the time of the running of the fifteen-year statute of limitations, is a recognition of such title, and stops the running of such statute.

R. Co. 75 Ala. 516, 51 Am. Rep. 475, it was said: "Ejectment was originally classed as a possessory action. Hence it was, that, at common law, any number of actions could be maintained, by laying the demise at a later date. One recovery was only conclusive as to one and the same demise. A right to the immediate possession, in form legal as distinguished from equitable, would always maintain the action, and it will yet. Prior possession is sufficient against anyone afterwards found in possession, unless the latter can show a paramount title, or a possession continuous, peaceable, and adverse, of sufficient duration to toll entry."

In Mickle v. Montgomery, 111 Ala. 421, 20 So. 441, it was said: "The possession of land is prima facie evidence of title, and is sufficient evidence against all who do not show a prior possession or a better title."

In Crosby v. Pridgen, 76 Ala. 385, it was said: "The rule is settled in this state, that peaceable possession of land by an actual occupant, who is in the exercise of acts of ownership or dominion over the premises, whether under claim or color of title, is ordinarily sufficient to authorize a recovery in ejectment against a mere trespasser."

Plaintiff in ejectment, depending entirely on prior possession, was held not entitled to recover against defendant claiming under color of title in Bernheim v. Horton, 103 Ala. 380, 15 So. 822. The party in possession holding under sheriff's deed to the land, who was placed in possession by order of the court, was said to have color of title.

Where the plaintiff in ejectment showed no other right of recovery than the presumption of title arising from possession, it was held that the rule was that the defendant might defeat the suit by showing that he or his grantors had prior possession. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Mathis, 109 Ala. 377, 19 So. 384.

There was no evidence of fraud or undue influence on the part of the defendant in procuring this deed from her father. The deed was absolute on its face, and any parol agreement (had there been any evidence to prove the same) that the land should be held in trust for him was void, and could not be enforced.

And where the verdict was for the defendant in ejectment, it was held immaterial if the court erred in applying the rule as to the extent of the possession under a parol purchase. Hames v. Harris, 50 Ark. 68, 6 S. W. 233.

Plaintiff's ancestor had color of title and died in possession, claiming the land as his own. This was held sufficient to protect the heir in the continuous enjoyment of the possession, and to support an action of ejectment. Wheeler v. Ladd, 40 Ark. 108.

And where plaintiff in ejectment proved that his ancestor died in possession of real estate, under color of title, and claiming to be the owner, it was held that he made out a prima facie case. Weaver v. Rush, 62 Ark. 51, 34 S. W. 256.

But in an action of ejectment by an heir claiming that her ancestor died in possession, it was held that before she would be entitled to recover, it would be necessary for her to show that her ancestor died in possession, and the recovery would be confined to actual possession where there was no color of title. Nicklance v. Dickerson, 65 Ark. 422, 46 S. W. 945.

During the pendency of ejectment, it was held that the defendant could not acquire any new right from the fact that he remained in possession. In Cahill v. Cahill, 75 Conn. 522, 60 L.R.A. 706, 54 Atl. 201, 732, it was held that possessory rights alone would not sustain an action in ejectment, and that where title was not acquired by adverse possession, a legal title should be shown.

In Delaware it was held that ejectment could not be maintained against a trespasser, where plaintiff relied on a possessory title, but had not been in possession twenty years. Doe ex dem. The court said: "According to law, as recognized by the courts of this state, an action of ejectment cannot be maintained on the ground of possession alone short of twenty years, against a mere trespasser, who enters without any color or claim of title, and ousts the party in possession, although there are decisions to the contrary in some of the other states, and particularly in New York."

In ejectment a party in possession under a claim of title was held entitled to recover against a trespasser who subsequently entered. Bradshaw v. Ashley, 14 App. D. C. 485. In this case it was said: "That question is whether, in a suit of ejectment, a plaintiff who has been peaceably in possession of property, under a claim of title, for a period of time even less than twenty years, when the possession has never been voluntarily abandoned or relinquished, is entitled to prevail against a mere trespasser who subsequently enters, but shows no lawful right or title, or claim of title, in himself. And that question, it seems to us, has been conclusively determined in the affirmative for this jurisdiction by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sabariego v. Maverick, 124 U. S. 296, 31 L. ed. 443, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461."

West, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1888 Hiram Moger, a resident of Mitchell county, deeded his homestead to his wife for the purpose of avoiding payment of a note for $175, given for a patent fence machine. During the same year, the property was deeded back to him by his wife, and he deeded it to his daughter, Rhoda Funk; the wife in the meantime having died. Not counting a temporary absence, he continued to live on the land until 1905, when he was adjudged insane and taken to an asylum. In the meantime, he had claimed the land as his own, had put valuable improvements thereon, had rented portions of it, and collected the rents, and had offered it for sale. About 1895, after having erected a house and barn on the place costing upwards of $1,000, he desired the land deeded back to him by Mrs. Funk, but she, being fearful that he contemplated a second marriage, made out on a warranty deed form a life lease, and delivered it to him. His guardian brought this action to settle for him the title to the land. The fourth, or third amended, petition, was filed, containing two causes of action, the first to quiet title, and the second for specific performance of an alleged contract to reconvey. To this

Florida.

In order to recover in ejectment it was held that the plaintiff relying on a possessory title must have had actual possession. Seymour v. Creswell, 18 Fla. 29. The rule was stated that the right to recover on a possessory title could not be resisted by showing that there may be an outstanding title in a third party. But it was said that this was questioned in Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Indiana. The rule was approved in Virginia, Georgia, Kentucky, California, New Jersey, Connecticut, Vermont, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Texas.

And the rule that plaintiff must recover in ejectment on the strength of his own title was applied, and it was held that plaintiff would have to show prior possession or title, as against one who had no title. Burt v. Florida Southern R. Co. 43 Fla. 339, 31 So. 265.

And as against a mere trespasser, it was held that a possessory title was sufficient to entitle plaintiff in ejectment to recover. Jackson v. Haisley, 35 Fla. 587, 17 So. 631.

And a recovery in ejectment was held authorized in favor of plaintiff without title, but who was in prior actual and proper possession. But this rule would only apply to actual possession, and not to lands covered by navigable waters, if plaintiff had no title to or right of possession of the lands opposite. Bass v. Ramos, 58 Fla. 161, 138 Am. St. Rep. 105, 50 So. 945.

Georgia.

Ejectment was held proper in favor of a party having a possessory title where he had abandoned the premises, if the abandonment was made with the purpose of resuming possession. Jones v. Nunn, 12 Ga. 469.

Under Ga. Code, § 3366 (5008), providing that a plaintiff in ejectment may recover the premises in dispute upon his prior possession alone against one who acquires the land by mere entry, it was held that a plaintiff in ejectment was entitled to recover on his prior possession alone, as 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against a trespasser. Jones v. Easley, 53 Ga. 454.

In Hadley v. Bean, 53 Ga. 685, it was said that the rule in Georgia was the same as that stated in the Code, § 3366, before it ever was adopted.

Under Ga. Code, § 3366, prior possession was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain a suit in equity in the nature of ejectment against an insolvent trespasser. Nolan v. Pelham, 77 Ga. 262, 2 S. E. 639.

Under Ga. Code, § 3366, an heir at law was held entitled to recover on the prior possession of his ancestor, but to make a prima facie case it should be shown that the ancestor was in possession under a bona fide claim of right at his death. Watkins v. Nugen, 118 Ga. 375, 45 S. E. 260; Brown v. Colson, 41 Ga. 42; Boynton v. Brown, 67 Ga. 396; Wolfe v. Baxter, 86 Ga. 705, 13 S. E. 18; Bagley v. Kennedy, 85 Ga. 703, 11 S. E. 1091. In the latter case it was held that evidence of possession would change the burden of proof, and put the defendant on proof of title.

Evidence of prior possession by plaintiff in ejectment was held sufficient to put defendant on proof of title. Horton v. Murden, 117 Ga. 72, 43 S. E. 786. The court said: "If plaintiffs had no title, they aver that they had been placed in possession by the former owner, and bare right of possession would entitle them to recover the land. Civil Code, §§ 3875, 5008." Section 3875 (3014) provides that the bare right of possession authorizes recovery by the owner of such right.

Prior possession of land was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain ejectment against a trespasser. Johnson v. Jones, 68 Ga. 825. This was under Ga. Code, § 3014.

Under Ga. Civil Code, § 5008, it was held that a plaintiff in ejectment was entitled to recover on his prior possession alone. And this was held even if he had relinquished possession with animo reverendi. Jackson v. Strickland, 127 Ga. 106, 56 S. E. 107.

The plaintiff in ejectment was held entitled to recover from an intruder upon pleading a demurrer was interposed, on the grounds that the second count did not state a cause of action, that the alleged cause was barred by the statute of limitations, and that several causes of action were improperly joined. This demurrer was overruled, and an answer filed containing a general denial and an admission that the defendant claimed to be the owner of the land, setting up the deed from her father, her life lease to him, a breach by the father of its provision to pay taxes for the year 1907, and that the second cause of action was barred, and praying that her title be quieted. To this answer the plaintiff filed an amended reply, verified on information and belief, containing a general denial and a claim that the deed was secured through false representations and undue influence when the grantor was mentally weak and incompetent. A demurrer to this amended reply, except the general denial, was overruled. Upon the trial the court found that the deed was procured by undue influence, and that the defendant held the same in trust for the benefit of her father, but that his right to recover on this ground was barred; but after making extended findings of fact, the conclusion was reached that the plaintiff had a right to have his title quieted by reason of undisputed, quiet, peaceable, exclusive, and adverse possession since 1888. The defendant appeals and presses forty-three assignments of error; five relating to pleadings, twenty-eight to the findings of fact and conclusions of law, proof of prior possession alone. Evidence of prior possession alone was held sufficient to put defendant on proof that he had a better title. Moss v. Chappell, 126 Ga. 196, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 398, 54 S. E. 968.

Where plaintiff in ejectment claimed under a possessory title holding the land three years, it was held that if the defendant was in possession as a trespasser, he could not rely upon that tortious possession, but if he came in under another party, he might show the latter's title. Jones v. Scoggins, 11 Ga. 119. In this case the court said: "But if the plaintiff, as in this case, relies upon possession acquired bona fide, and nothing else, and the defendant is in possession as a trespasser, the defendant cannot rely upon that tortious possession, nor can he protect himself by showing a title in a third person. The law will not permit him to take anything, or any account, by his trespass."

Illinois.

The prior possession of the land by plaintiff in ejectment was held conclusive on defendant, acquiring possession subsequently, unless he showed a better title. Doe ex dem. Herbert v. Herbert, Breeze (Ill.) 278, 12 Am. Dec. 192.

And proof of actual possession under a deed of ownership was held to be prima facie evidence of title on which a recovery could be had in ejectment, unless the defendant showed a better title. Glantz v. Ziabek, 233 Ill. 22, 84 N. E. 36.

And in ejectment it was held that proof of prior possession by plaintiff, under claim of ownership, was prima facie evidence of ownership and seisin, and sufficient for a recovery unless the defendant showed a better title. Benefield v. Albert, 132 Ill. 665, 24 N. E. 634.

And proof of prior possession by the plaintiff, claiming to be the owner in fee, was held sufficient to authorize a recovery in ejectment unless the defendant showed a better title. Barger v. Hobbs, 67 Ill. 592; DeWitt v. Bradbury, 94 Ill. 446. In the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

last case it was held that the claim of title need not be made by words.

And the possession by plaintiff in ejectment under a deed was held sufficient as against a defendant who showed no title. Coombs v. Hertig, 162 Ill. 171, 44 N. E. 392.

And prior possession alone under claim of title was held evidence of a fee until rebutted, and was sufficient to maintain ejectment. Keith v. Keith, 104 Ill. 397; Harland v. Eastman, 119 Ill. 22, 7 N. E. 59, 8 N. E. 810; Anderson v. McCormick, 129 Ill. 308, 21 N. E. 803. In this last case it was said: "It is sufficient, therefore, for a plaintiff, in order to make prima facie proof of title, to trace his title back to an immediate or remote grantor, who, at the time of his conveyance, was in possession of the land, claiming it in fee."

Possession under a deed from a party claiming to own the land was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain ejectment against one who was a mere trespasser, who could not set up title in a third party. Casey v. Kimmel, 181 Ill. 154, 54 N. E. 905.

And possession of a part of land under a deed which included more land, with claim of ownership to the whole, was held to be a good title against all persons who could not show a title from the United States, or from someone having a prior possession. Bowman v. Wettig, 39 Ill. 416.

Indiana.

Possession was held to be prima facie evidence of title, and the possession of an ancestor was a sufficient foundation to support ejectment on the demise of his heirs. Robinoe v. Doe ex dem. Colwell, 6 Blackf. 85.

In ejectment, where defendant was in possession under a claim of ownership, it was held necessary for plaintiff to show title in himself, and the burden of proof was on him to show such title and right of possession. Wilson v. Johnson, 145 Ind. 40, 38 N. E. 38, 43 N. E. 930. The court said: "If he failed to show title in himself, it would make no difference whether the deand ten to the reception of evidence. Owing to the trial court's restriction of the case to the issue joined upon the first cause of action, any errors which may have occurred in reference to the various pleadings cannot materially prejudice the defendant.

We have examined the findings and the evidence, giving careful heed to the challenge made to many items in the abstract of the appellee, and conclude that the decision is well supported, and, in view of the fact that the cause was tried by the court without a jury, we do not find any evidence wrongfully admitted which could by any fair reasoning be held to have led the court to a wrong determination. There were, as usual, conflicting claims and conflicting feudant had title or not." Plaintiff claimed title by adverse possession under claim of ownership.

Title by prior possession was held sufficient, as against a mere intruder, to maintain ejectment. Doe ex dem. Wood v. West, 1 Blackf. 133.

Kansas.

In ejectment priority of possession was held to give precedence, in the absence of proof of a better title. Duffey v. Rafferty, 15 Kan. 9.

And possession of land under a claim of ownership was held title in low degree, and would prevail over subsequent possession acquired without any right. Mooney v. Olsen, 21 Kan. 691.

The plaintiff having prior possession under a defective tax deed was held entitled to maintain ejectment against a party acquiring possession under a forged deed. Redden v. Tefft, 48 Kan. 302, 29 Pac. 157.

And a party in possession under a title bond, which bond was barred by limitation, was held in ejectment to have a better title than one subsequently acquiring possession under a void tax deed. Jones v. Hollister, 51 Kan. 310, 32 Pac. 1115.

Kentucky.

Possession of land for many years under a claim of title was held sufficient to maintain ejectment against intruders. Jones v. Spralding, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 756, 7 S. W. 31; McLawrin v. Salmons, 11 B. Mon. 96, 52 Am. Dec. 563.

In the absence of all other evidence, the fact of a plaintiff in ejectment having been once possessed of the land was held sufficient prima facie to authorize a recovery against an intruder on that possession. Campbell v. Roberts, 3 A. K. Marsh. 623.

And where the plaintiff in ejectment was in possession, and was ousted by defendant, it was held that a recovery should be had unless the defendant had a better title. Sowder v. McMillan, 4 Dana, 456.

And possession was held sufficient title to enable plaintiff to maintain ejectment 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

testimony, but there is abundant evidence in the record to warrant the finding that from 1888 until his removal to an asylum, in 1905, Hiram Moger manifested symptoms of mental unsoundness which culminated in a mental and physical condition pathetic and repulsive. Many statements testified to by various witnesses as having been made by the defendant afford sufficient basis for the finding that she took the deed with the understanding that the land was to be re-conveyed upon the request of the father, and that the purpose was merely to hold the title until the patent fence matter should be out of the way. The guardian's attorney testified that shortly before the suit was brought she said to him, among other things: "I haven't any interest in the against a trespasser. The defense could not show that title was in a third party. Sowder v. McMillan, 4 Dana, 462; Adams v. Tiernan, 5 Dana, 395.

Actual possession by plaintiff at the time of entry of defendant in ejectment was held to be a necessary foundation, where there was neither actual title nor twenty years' possession. Myers v. McMillan, 4 Dana, 485.

But adverse possession less than twenty years was held insufficient to authorize a recovery based on such possessory right. Breeding v. Taylor, 13 B. Mon. 477.

In Fowke v. Darnall, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 317, it was said: "There are cases where a plaintiff in ejectment may recover on a bare possession only."

Louisiana.

In a possessory action where plaintiff held under a void deed for more than fifteen years, it was held sufficient to show a possession for a year and a day, where the defendant had no title or possession. Bernard v. Shaw, 9 Mart. (La.) 49.

Massachusetts.

In Jackson v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 1 Cush. 575, it was said: "If A enters on the land of B and takes possession, and afterwards C enters on A and dispossesses him, A may well maintain an action against C to recover possession, although his entry on B was without right, and tortious; for mere possession is a good title against a stranger having no title."

Michigan.

A deed by the auditor general of Michigan for taxes, and open and peaceable possession for years, were held to entitle plaintiff to maintain ejectment against one subsequently taking possession. Van Auken v. Monroe, 38 Mich. 725.

And in ejectment, prior possession of land, claiming title, by plaintiff, was held sufficient to make a prima facie case, unless the defendant showed a better title.

land; I don't pretend to own it;" and that she was about to sign a statement to that effect, when her husband interposed and objected. Another witness testified that in a conversation between the Funks and Moger, the latter said he had deeded the place to Mrs. Funk until he could get some trouble about the fence machine settled, when they were to deed it back to him, and that both Mr. and Mrs. Funk said it (the statement) was all right. Defendant herself, upon the stand, in answer to the question as to whether there was any talk or promise on her part that she would deed the property back at any time, answered: "No, sir; no specified time." A brother-in-law testified that she told him she would make the deed back to Moger whenever

Moger called for it. Another brother-in-law testified that she said she did not pretend to own the land, but that she would not deed it back to Moger, because she wanted to keep him from disposing of it. She wrote a letter to her sister in which she stated that her father was mad about the deed to the land; that she had made him what the lawyer called a life lease; that a woman wanted to marry him to get the farm. "Father can use the land as long as he lives, and when he dies it will come to us children, and all of us will get the same share. He cannot deed it away." Of course, if she owned the land, it would not descend to her father's heirs, and the only way the others could get a share would be by deed from the owner. The probate

Covert v. Morrison, 49 Mich. 133, 13 N. W. 390.

Minnesota.

Possession of land by plaintiff's ancestor at the time of his death was held sufficient title to sustain ejectment against one entering subsequently without right. Sherin v. Larson, 28 Minn. 523, 11 N. W. 70.

Mississippi.

Against a trespasser, prior possession of cemetery lots was held sufficient to maintain the action of ejectment. Wilkinson v. Strickland, — Miss. —, 35 So. 177.

To prevent a recovery on a prior possession, by abandonment, the abandonment should be without any intention of resuming possession, and if there was animus revertendi, the plaintiff could recover by virtue of such possession. Hicks v. Steigleman, 49 Miss. 377.

As against an intruder without color of title, it was held that a plaintiff in ejectment could recover on the strength of his former possession, unless the plaintiff was barred by limitation, or had abandoned the premises. Kerr v. Farish, 52 Miss. 101.

And, against a mere intruder, it was held that the plaintiff should not be required to deraign his title, but could recover upon the strength of his former possession. Lum v. Reed, 53 Miss. 73.

And where defendant in ejectment claimed under a tax deed from the state, which was void, it was held that this did not compel plaintiff to deraign title independent of the common source. Johnson v. Futch, 57 Miss. 73. It was held that this deed did not show color of title.

And heirs of a party in possession were held entitled to recover in ejectment against an intruder or one claiming under a void title. Dingey v. Paxton, 60 Miss. 1038. The defendant claimed title under a void tax sale.

And continuous adverse possession for twelve years was held sufficient to maintain ejectment without reference to paper title, as against a subsequent intruder. Anderson v. Moore, 84 Miss. 400, 36 So. 520. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Missouri.

Prior possession accompanied by a claim of the fee was held to raise a presumption of title, and to be sufficient to support ejectment against one who had only naked possession. So, the grantee of the prior possession could claim the same right. Dale v. Faivre, 43 Mo. 556.

In Crockett v. Morrison, 11 Mo. 3, where plaintiff in ejectment sought to recover on a possessory title, it was held that it should be shown that plaintiff's possession had not been voluntarily abandoned. The court said: "This is done by showing that the defendant entered upon his possession, or upon the possession of someone holding under him or trespassing upon him without any title."

And where it was claimed that prior possession would overcome one acquired subsequently by a mere intruder, it was held that the prior possession would have to be accompanied by a claim of title, otherwise the parties would be left where they were found. Norfleet v. Russell, 64 Mo. 176; Alexander v. Campbell, 74 Mo. 146; White v. Keller, 114 Mo. 479, 21 S. W. 860; Dale v. Faivre, 43 Mo. 556.

Where no title appeared on either side, it was held that the prior possession of plaintiff, though short of the statutory bar, would prevail over a subsequent possession, provided the prior possession was under a claim of right, and had not been abandoned. Mulherin v. Simpson, 124 Mo. 610, 28 S. W. 86.

And one having possession of land under a claim of right was held entitled to recover in ejectment from an intruder. Bain v. Bullock, 129 Mo. 117, 31 S. W. 342.

Plaintiff in ejectment was held entitled to recover on proof of prior possession against an intruder, where such prior possession was under a claim of right or color of title. Hall v. Gallemore, 138 Mo. 638, 40 S. W. 891.

Where a recovery in ejectment has been allowed on prior possession only, it was held that this would be limited to cases where defendant was an intruder or tres-judge and others testified to her statement that she did not pretend to own the land, and that the deed was to save the farm from the hands of parties who would take advantage of her father, and she intended to deed it back to him. Considering the relation of the parties, the mental condition of the father, the subsequent conduct and statements of both, the continued unresisted acts and assertion of dominion and ownership for more than fifteen years, they fully justify the conclusion that a title by adverse possession had ripened, unless there be some rule of law preventing such conclusion.

It is asserted that the deed was made for the purpose of defrauding creditors, and therefore as against the grantor must be held good. Whatever the law may have been thought to be at that time, it is certainly now settled that the property was the grantor's homestead, and therefore no creditor could be defrauded by its conveyance. Mull v. Jones, 33 Kan. 112, 5 Pac. 388; Cross v. Benson, 68 Kan. 495, 64 L.R.A. 560, 75 Pac. 558; Weaver v. First Nat. Bank, 76 Kan. 540, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 110, 123 Am. St. Rep. 155, 94 Pac. 273; Shattuck v. Weaver, 80 Kan. 82, 101 Pac. 649.

The defendant also urges that possession by the grantor must be presumed to be in subservience to the title of the grantee. This is no doubt true as a general proposition, when there are no circumstances leading to a contrary conclusion; but when the grantor constantly and persistently, for passer, and would not apply where he was in possession under claim and color of title. Prior v. Scott, 87 Mo. 303; Bledsoe v. Simms, 53 Mo. 305.

Nebraska.

Adverse possession under a void tax deed and payment of taxes was held sufficient to sustain ejectment against an intruder having no claim to title. Robinson v. Gantt, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 51, 95 N. W. 506.

And where plaintiffs in ejectment showed that their ancestor occupied the land claiming to be the owner at the time of his death, and that they were his heirs, this was held sufficient to put the defendant on proof of title or prior possession. Spitznagle v. Vanhessch, 13 Neb. 338, 14 N. W. 417.

And adverse occupancy by the plaintiff and his grantors under a claim of right was held sufficient to maintain ejectment. Lantry v. Wolff, 49 Neb. 374, 68 N. W. 494.

Nevada.

Where plaintiff in ejectment was not shown to have any pre-emption rights, his proof of prior possession entitled him to regain possession against all persons having no better right. McFarland v. Culbertson, 2 Nev. 280.

And where possession was relied upon in ejectment, it was held that it should be an actual bona fide possession. Kraft v. Carlow, 9 Nev. 20.

New Jersey.

The oldest possession, even for less than twenty years, was held to carry the presumption of title sufficient to put the defendant upon his defense, and to overcome the later possession of a mere trespasser. Den ex dem. Penton v. Sinnickson, 9 N. J. L. 149.

New Mexico.

A plaintiff in prior possession under claim of title was held entitled to maintain ejectment against a mere intruder. Deemer v. Falkenburg, 4 N. M. 149, 12 Pac. 717. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And under N. M. Comp. Laws, § 1570. providing that an action of ejectment will lie for a mining claim as well as for any real estate, where plaintiff has been wrongfully ousted from the possession, it was held that the statute included possession wholly disconnected from the legal or even colorable title. It was held that the strength of a possessory title was in prior actual possession. New Mexico, R. G. & P. R. Co. v. Crouch, 4 N. M. 293, 13 Pac. 201. The court said: "If that be shown, it corresponds to the legal title in cases where the rule requires the claimant to recover on the strength of his own, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's, title."

New York.

A prior possession for less than twenty years, where there was no abandonment, was held sufficient to maintain an action of ejectment, and require the defendant to show his title. Smith ex dem. Teller v. Lorillard, 10 Johns. 338. The court said: "A prior possession short of twenty years, under a claim or assertion of right, will prevail over a subsequent possession of less than twenty years, when no other evidence of the title appears on either side."

And a party in possession under color of title was held entitled to recover in ejectment against an intruder who was not allowed to show that title was in a third party. Jackson ex dem. Duncan v. Harder, 4 Johns. 202, 4 Am. Dec. 262.

And where a party in possession made a mortgage and was then disseised, it was held that a purchaser under foreclosure could maintain ejectment against the disseisor and recover on the right of possession of the mortgagor without showing possession in himself. Clute v. Voris, 31 Barb. 511.

And where plaintiff had a possessory title, it was held sufficient to enable him to recover in ejectment against a subsequent possessor short of twenty years without title, on the ground of prior possession. Jackson ex dem. Weidman v. Hubble, 1 Cow. 613.

nearly seventeen years, claims ownership, and exercises all the rights incident thereto, and the grantee from time to time concedes the possession of only a paper title, which is to be revested upon request of the grantor, the rule does not and cannot apply. The authorities cited in favor of the general rule give support thereto, but none of them involves conditions like those now under consideration. The leading case relied upon is Dotson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 81 Kan. 816, 106 Pac. 1045, which holds that such possession will not be considered adverse until the grantor explicitly renounces the title of the grantee, or positively asserts a claim of title in himself, which is brought to the attention of the grantee. The evidence is abundant that the grantor all along asserted ownership in himself, and, as already suggested, the numerous statements made by the grantee, as testified to by various persons, amounted to repeated concessions that the grantor's claim was rightful, and that the shifting of the paper evidence of title back to the real owner was a mere formality.

Finally, it is earnestly insisted that to allow the grantor's title to be quieted on the ground of adverse possession for the statutory period is to change the rightful defensive nature of the statute into that of a wrongful offensive weapon. Under the footnote of 25 Cyc. 983, "Statute no basis of claim for affirmative relief," the Kansas authorities are the only ones cited. Beginning with Corlett v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co.

A continued possession from 1805 to 1821 under a claim or assertion of right was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain ejectment against one who subsequently entered without any pretense of right or title. Jackson ex dem. Murray v. Denn, 5 Cow. 200.

And where the plaintiff in ejectment made out a valid possession, and the defendant did not establish a valid prior possession, it was held that plaintiff should recover. Jackson ex dem. Livingston v. Walker, 7 Cow. 637. It was further held that a purchaser who failed to perform could not set up title.

Proof of prior possession by plaintiff was held sufficient to sustain ejectment against one having no better title. Hopkins v. Mason, 42 How. Pr. 115.

And possession and use by plaintiff without proof of paper title and ouster by defendant were held sufficient in ejectment. Ibid.

And prior possession, though not what was called "adverse possession," was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain ejectment against an intruder or against one whose claim of title was founded on a later possession. Hunter v. Starin, 26 Hun, 529.

A conveyance of land to a person who entered into actual possession thereunder was held to create a legal presumption of good title in the grantee and enable him to maintain ejectment against all intruders who did not show a better title. Zink v. McManus, 49 Hun, 583, 3 N. Y. Supp. 487.

And where the lessor of plaintiff had been in peaceable possession for nearly three years, and the defendant entered upon him without any claim or color of right or title from any person whatever, it was held that plaintiff could recover in ejectment. Jackson ex dem. Murray v. Hazen, 2 Johns. 22.

And a person in possession under color of title was held entitled to recover in ejectment from a trespasser where he had not abandoned the premises. Spies v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 39 N. Y. S. R. 764, 15 N. Y. Supp. 348.

In Brewster v. Striker, 1 E. D. Smith, 321, it was said: "It has been said that mere priority of possession, though all other title be expressly disproved, is sufficient in ejectment to enable the plaintiff to recover against everyone but the party having the true title. Catteris v. Cowper, 4 Taunt. 547, 13 Revised Rep. 682; Allen v. Rivington, 2 Wms. Saund. 111, note. The rule is stated a little too broadly by the reporter in his note to this case in Taunton. Priority of possession is undoubtedly sufficient where nothing but possession is shown by either party, for the prior possession carries with it the presumption of a legal title. It is but a presumption, however, which may be repelled, and which the plaintiff in this case has repelled, by showing that the legal estate is in the executors."

One who succeeded to his ancestor's possession was held entitled to ejectment as against a subsequent intruder. Maltonner v. Dimmick, 4 Barb. 566.

In Jackson ex dem. Klock v. Rightmyre, 16 Johns. 325, the rule is stated that a prior possession under a claim of right not voluntarily abandoned would prevail over a subsequent possession without right, where no proof of title was made on either side.

And in Dominy v. Miller, 33 Barb. 286, it was said: "A person who has been in possession of land for eight or ten years under a color of title may recover in an action of ejectment against a mere intruder or trespasser."

Plaintiff's possession was held sufficient to establish a prima facie right to recover in ejectment against one entering subsequently. Carleton v. Darcy, 90 N. Y. 566, reversing 14 Jones & S. 484. But a showing that defendant was in possession prior to plaintiff would defeat his right of recovery.

And a possession of seven years without more, where there had been an eviction by default in ejectment, was held insufficient to maintain an action to regain possession. Jackson ex dem. Klock v. Rightmyre, 16 Johns. 314, affirming 13 Johns. 367. This was on the ground that a recovery in eject-ment changes the presumption of right founded on a possession less than twenty years.

And where possession in the ancestor of plaintiff was not proved, and plaintiff depended on his title, it was held that plaintiff in ejectment could not recover, although defendants had no title. Enders v. Sternberg, 52 Barb. 222.

And an abandonment by plaintiff in ejectment for thirteen years after an adverse possession for eleven years was held to warrant a finding for defendant. Whitney v. Wright, 15 Wend. 171.

North Carolina.

In this state it seems that a possessory title not perfected by limitation will not sustain ejectment.

Plaintiff in ejectment was held not entitled to recover against an intruder, where plaintiff had color of title, but not seven years' continuous possession. Sheppard v. Sheppard, 4 N. C. (Term. Rep. 108); Ward v. Herrin, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 23; Dex dem. Jones v. Ridley, 4 N. C. (2 Car. Law. Reps. 397).

It was held that ejectment could not be maintained on a naked possessory title where the legal title was in another party. Duncan v. Duncan, 25 N. C. (3 Ired. L.) 317.

North Dakota.

Where plaintiff in ejectment was in possession claiming ownership, in 1890, and the defendants had been in possession since February, 1894, claiming ownership, it was held that the plaintiff must rely on her own title or interest in the premises, and having failed to show any interest or title in herself, she had no right to call upon defendants to defend title or possession. Conrad v. Adler, 13 N. D. 199, 100 N. W. 722.

Ohio.

The possessory title of plaintiff and his ancestors was held sufficient to recover in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

This was held proper, as showing the limitation of defendant's liability on the judgments. In other words, the statute had created a condition of which the plaintiff could avail himself in an action for affirmative relief.

In Gibson v. Johnson, 73 Kan. 261, 84 Pac. 982, it was held that a mortgagor cannot quiet title against the holder of the mortgage on the naked ground that the mortgage is barred, following Hogaboom v. Flower, 67 Kan. 41, 43, 72 Pac. 547, 548. In the latter case Flower sued to quiet title against his mortgagee, who set up the mortgage in defense, the answer showing that it was barred, and it was held that the plaintiff could quiet his title. It was said that "a right of action thus barred is dead for all ejectment where the defendant had no title. Ludlow v. McBride, 3 Ohio, 240.

Ejectment was held to be maintainable on a possessory right only against a disseisor who showed no better right. Ludlow v. Barr, 3 Ohio, 388.

The plaintiff in ejectment, in possession of premises under a defective title, was held to have prima facie right to recover against a party subsequently entering. Newnam v. Cincinnati, 18 Ohio, 323.

Pennsylvania.

A prior possession was held sufficient to enable the plaintiff in ejectment to recover against an intruder. Kline v. Johnston, 24 Pa. 72. The court said: "A man who enters on what is called vacant land, with a view to acquire title under the laws of the state, may recover against one who turns him out of possession without right."

A disseisor who first deprived the true owner of his possession in land was held to have the same right to the possession thereof as against any person subsequently entering on the same without his consent or the authority of the owner, that the owner had against him. Hoey v. Furman, 1 Pa. St. 295, 44 Am. Dec. 129.

And possession of land by a corporation was held sufficient title in ejectment to recover from one holding under an invalid tax sale. Rockland & V. Coal & Oil Co. v. McCalmont, 72 Pa. 221. In this case the legal title was in one of the members of the corporation.

In ejectment possession was held to be presumptive evidence of seisin in fee, until the contrary was shown. Jones v. Bland, 112 Pa. 176, 2 Atl. 541.

In Woods v. Lane, 2 Serg. & R. 53, it was said: "A naked possession is good title to recover in ejectment against one who puts me out of possession and can show no better title than mine."

A party was in possession of disputed land between lots. He sold his lot, thus cutting off all access to the disputed part. In a subsequent action of ejectment against a neighbor who took possession, it was held purposes while the bar continues. . . . It is as if no such right had ever existed." p. 43.

In Updegraff v. Lucas, 76 Kan. 456, 93 Pac. 630, 94 Pac. 121, 13 Ann. Cas. 860, it was held that injunction would lie against execution upon a dormant judgment, because the plaintiffs sought only "to hold what the law had already given them." p. 459. In Girard Trust Co. v. Jones, 81 Kan. 753, 106 Pac. 1052, it was held that a tax deed good on its face, of record more than five years, the holders being in possession, vests in them an absolute title. It was further held, however, that when the fee title holder sought to foreclose or extinguish the mortgage lien, and made the tax deed holders (who had an absolute title) defendants, while they could set up their tax deed, they could not properly ask to have their title quieted. The tax deed holders did in fact ask to have the title quieted, and it was said that they were "at least entitled to set up the tax deed by way of defense, and to prove that it was a valid conveyance which defeated the lien of the mortgage, and a judgment to that effect is as far reaching and effective as would be one which quieted their title as against the lien holder." p. 755.

The weapon and shield phrase is proper in many cases and under many circumstances, but it cannot be of general application. Whenever possession and the statute of limitations have created a fixed status, vesting a good title against all adverse that the proof did not show that plaintiff had not abandoned, and he could not recover. Akin v. Byrd, 153 Pa. 23, 25 Atl. 866.

Texas.

A purchaser of school land in possession was held entitled to maintain ejectment against a trespasser. This was without regard to plaintiff's title. Gray v. Thompson, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 33, 23 S. W. 926.

Vermont.

Actual seisin was held sufficient to recover as well as to defend against a stranger to the title. Ellithorp v. Dewing, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 141. The court said: "He who is first seized may recover or defend against anyone except him who has a paramount title. If disseised by a stranger, he may maintain an action of ejectment against the disseisor."

And a prior possession under claim of title was held in itself sufficient title in ejectment, unless the premises should be left so long as to raise presumption of abandonment, where the defendant set up no title. Warner v. Page, 4 Vt. 291, 24 Am. Dec. 607.

And a mortgagee in possession was held entitled to recover in ejectment against a stranger, until he showed a better title. Reed v. Shepley, 6 Vt. 602.

And a possessory right under a deed was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain ejectment against an intruder. Russell v. Brooks, 27 Vt. 640.

Virginia.

In ejectment it was held that the party ousted could recover the premises upon his possession merely, and his right to recover could be resisted only by showing that the defendant had title, or authority under the title. McMurray v. Dixon, 105 Va. 605, 54 S. E. 481. This was said to be one of the exceptions to the general rule that the plaintiff in ejectment recovers on the strength of his own title. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

And against an intrusion by a stranger without title, on a peaceable possession, such possession was held sufficient to maintain the action of ejectment. Rhule v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 102 Va. 343, 46 S. E. 331. The court said that this exception to the rule as to proof of title in ejectment was as well established as the rule itself.

And against a mere intruder, an heir was held entitled to rely on the possession of his ancestor, and maintain ejectment. Tapscott v. Cobbs, 11 Gratt. 172. It was held no defense to show that title was in a third party.

In Miller v. Williams, 15 Gratt. 213, it was said: "If the plaintiffs, holding peaceable possession of the land, had been entered upon and ousted of such possession by the defendants, having neither title to, nor authority to enter upon, the premises, according to a recent decision of this court they could have maintained ejectment upon their possession alone, without showing a legal title."

In Suttle v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. 76 Va. 284, it was said: "This court also held, in Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. (Va.) 276, that a person in peaceable possession of land, who is entered upon and ousted by a stranger without title, may recover in ejectment upon the strength of his mere previous possession. The reason is that actual seisin is evidence of title against all the world except the true owner, and the law will not permit that seisin to be wantonly invaded by one who himself has no title."

In Suttle v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. supra, it was said: "We do not mean to assert, as is sometimes broadly laid down, that with us ejectment is purely a legal action, and the right of possession essential to sustain it must, in all cases, be such as follows the legal title. Where, however, the title to the land in fee is the foundation upon which a recovery is predicated, the action partakes essentially of the nature of the old writ of right, is a substitute for it, and a recovery is conclusive upon the parties."

claimants, such title constitutes a weapon offensive, as well as defensive; and the fact that this condition has been brought about by the running of the statute does not change its character, or the rights thereunder. Certainly as to title by adverse possession this court is in line with practically all the courts of this country.

In Wood v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 11 Kan. 324, and at page 348, it was said: "A mere trespasser, without color of right or title, who has been in the actual possession of real estate for fifteen years, claiming title thereto, becomes the owner of the property by virtue of the statute of limitations, if the property has been owned during all that time by some individual or individuals, and not by the United States."

Wisconsin.

Title by possession was held a degree of title, and sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain ejectment against an intruder. Bates v. Campbell, 25 Wis. 613. This was under Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 141, §§ 2-4, providing that no person can recover in an action for real estate unless he has, at the time of commencing the action, a valid subsisting interest in the premises and a right to recover, and that the complaint shall set forth that the plaintiff has an estate or interest, stating the same.

And where the defendant was an intruder, and claimed in ejectment under his naked possession only, the prior possession of the plaintiff was held sufficient to recover regardless of whether there was an outstanding title. Mission of Immaculate Virgin v. Cronin, 14 Misc. 372, 36 N. Y. Supp. 77.

And actual possession of land was held sufficient to sustain ejectment where the defendant did not show a better title. Elofrson v. Lindsay, 90 Wis. 203, 63 N. W. 89.

English cases.

In Allen v. Rivington, 2 Wms' Saund. 111, it was held that in ejectment, where the plaintiff had priority of possession and the defendant showed no title, the plaintiff should have judgment. In the reporter's note it was said: "This case is evidently in direct contradiction to the well-established rule that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover by the strength of his own title, without any regard to the weakness of the defendant's. The word 'ejectment' was probably used by mistake instead of ejectione firma; in fact, in Siderfin's report of this case, the action is stated to be the latter."

In Doe ex dem. Hughes v. Dyball, 3 Car. & P. 610, Moody & M. 346, it was held in ejectment that where the tenant held peaceable possession for about a year, it was sufficient evidence of title against a trespasser.

In Gildehaus v. Whiting, 39 Kan. 706, 711, 18 Pac. 916, 919, the following was quoted with approval from Roots v. Beck, 109 Ind. 472, 9 N. E. 698: "When the bar of the statute becomes complete, however destitute of the color of title such occupancy may have been under, to the extent that it was actual, visible, and continuous, a title by prescription arises in the adverse occupant. This title is in all respects equal to a conveyance in fee." p. 475.

In Anderson v. Burnham, 52 Kan. 454, 34 Pac. 1056, it was held (syllabus, ¶ 1): "Possession of land by an adverse occupant for more than fifteen years, which is actual, notorious, continuous, and exclusive, will give title thereto, although such possession is entirely destitute of color of title."

plaintiff's possession, but did not find that the defendant had the primer possession, nor that he entered in the right or by the command of any who had title. The plaintiff had judgment. Bateman v. Allen, Cro. Eliz. 437.

But under 13 Eliz. chap. 20, avoiding a lease of a rectory by eighty days' nonresidence of the rector, it was held that a stranger could rely on this when sued in ejectment by the lessee. Doe ex dem. Crisp v. Barber, 2 T. R. 749.

The rule in ejectment was stated, that the plaintiff cannot recover but upon the strength of his own title. Roe ex dem. Haldane v. Harvey, 4 Burr. 2484.

b. Trespass to try title.

This action has been used in but few of the states. In South Carolina it seems that a mere possessory title would not be sufficient. In Texas, where this action is most used, it seems that possession would be sufficient title against a trespasser.

Possession was held to be sufficient evidence of title against any wrongdoer, whether he was a trespasser, or whether he claimed title, but did not show it. Walkins v. Smith, 91 Tex. 589, 45 S. W. 560.

Prior possession was held to be sufficient title to enable plaintiff to maintain the action of trespass to try title against an intruder. Alexander v. Gilliam, 39 Tex. 227. The court said: "The maxim that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of the defendant, is applicable to all actions for the recovery of property. But if the plaintiff had actual prior possession of the land, this is title strong enough to enable him to recover from a mere trespasser, without title."

Proof of possession was held to be sufficient title to enable plaintiff to recover in an action of trespass to try title against a trespasser. Ibid.; Parker v. Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. 71 Tex. 132, 8 S. W. 541.

In an action of trespass to try title, it was held that if plaintiff could maintain the action, it would be under three years'

In Liebheit v. Enright, 77 Kan. 321, 322, 94 Pac. 203, Enright sued to quiet title on the ground of adverse possession, and also on the strength of a tax deed acquired from another. It was there held that he could not be required to elect, and that he could maintain his action. It was said: "There was no reason why the plaintiff, holding under adverse possession, should not fortify and protect his possession and title thereunder by procuring an outstanding tax title from another party, nor any reason why he might not set up both as against the defendants." The closing paragraph of the opinion (page 323 of 77 Kan.) is in these words: "There being proof of adverse possession sufficient to give title and to sustain the finding and judgment of the court, it is unnecessary to consider the claim of right under the tax title."

In Viking Refrigerator & Mfg. Co. v. Crawford, 84 Kan. 203, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 498, 114 Pac. 240, it was again held that one claiming to be the owner by adverse possession can maintain a suit to quiet his title.

1 Cyc. 1135, states that in America the doctrine is almost universal that possession for the statutory period not only bars the remedy of the holder of the paper title, but extinguishes his title, and vests title in fee in the adverse occupant, and cites decisions from twenty-nine states, one territory, and the United States Supreme Court, and proceeds: "The title acquired by adverse possession is a title in fee simple, and is as possession under color of title. Scott v. Rhea, 21 Tex. 709. Section 15, Stat. Limitations, Hart. Dig. art. 2391, provides that any suit to recover real estate as against adverse possession under color of title shall be instituted within three years next after the cause of action accrued.

In Lea v. Hernandez, 10 Tex. 137, it was said: "It is true that one in actual, peaceable, and lawful possession of land may maintain an action against a mere trespasser by whom he has been dispossessed, but it is held that, where the plaintiff claims to recover on this ground, the fact of his prior possession must be clearly and unequivocally proved. Jackson ex dem. Klock v. Hudson, 3 Johns. 383, 3 Am. Dec. 500. We are of opinion that the evidence did not establish the fact of such possession in the plaintiff."

In Wilson v. Palmer, 18 Tex. 592, it was said: "It appears now to be a well-established principle, though once doubted, that a prior occupancy is sufficient title against a wrongdoer." But it was held that the proof did not show a continuous possession, or that it had not been abandoned by plaintiff.

In Bonner v. Wiggins, 52 Tex. 125, it was said: "As against a mere trespasser, possession is sufficient title to support an action. Linard v. Crossland, 10 Tex. 464, 60 Am. Dec. 213."

In Caplen v. Drew, 54 Tex. 493, it was said, in an action of trespass to try title: "What constitutes a sufficient title to make a prima facie case against a defendant in possession is discussed and clearly stated by the present chief justice in the case of Keys v. Mason, 44 Tex. 143, wherein it in effect is said, that merely a prior possession to that under which the defendant claims, with a regular claim of title, connecting himself with such prior possession, would overcome the presumption of right arising from the defendant's possession, and throw upon him the burden of disproving the plaintiff's case, or showing a superior title in himself."

to try title mere prior possession would not be sufficient without proof of title. The court said: "This action was brought, as stated, expressly to recover the land in dispute, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had title to the same; and even if the old rule as to the necessity of proving title should now be held to be modified so as to allow a person deprived of the possession of land, under proper allegations, to recover that possession without proof of title, it can have no application to this case. Here prior possession cannot stand for title, although it is an action in the form prescribed by the Code, and not technically trespass to try title under the statute."

A possession of sixteen years only was held not to take the place of title. Young v. Watson, 1 McMull. L. 449. This was an action of trespass to try title. The possession proved had terminated fifty years before the suit. O'Neill, J., said: "Where the plaintiff's possession, actual or constructive, is entered upon, I think that such possession is evidence of title to put the defendant to prove his title." Referring to this case in Geiger v. Kaigler, supra, it was said: "What Judge O'Neill says in the same case most probably had reference to an action of quare clausum fregit."

In trespass to try title, it was held that plaintiff could not recover on possession, where there was proof of title in another, under whom defendant claimed. Hallett v. Eslava, 2 Stew. (Ala.) 115.

c. Writ of entry.

An entry on public land was held sufficient to maintain a writ of right against all other persons. Thomas v. Hatch, 3 Sumn. 170, Fed. Cas. No. 13,899.

Possession under a claim of right was held to constitute legal seisin which would avail in a writ of entry against everyone not having an older and better title. Pettingell v. Boynton, 139 Mass. 244, 29 N. E. 655. The court said: "Even if it had been shown that the possession of the demandants was not that of the true owner, as there may be a possession perfectly perfect a title as one by deed from the original owners, or by patent or grant from the government."

At page 1138 the rule is thus stated: "Where the bar of the statute has become absolute, it is just as available for attaching as for defensive purposes, and its availability in this respect will not depend upon the occupant continuing in the actual possession of the property. He may maintain ejectment against any person acquiring the possession from him by force or fraud, or who has made entry thereon during a temporary absence of the occupant, even though he be the true owner. It is likewise an incident of the completion of the statutory bar that the title thus acquired will be quieted in the adverse holder on a bill in equity for that purpose, even against the holder of the legal title barred, and the defendants will be enjoined from asserting title to the premises from former ownership that has been lost."

To the same effect as the paragraph last quoted is Jenkins v. Dewey, 49 Kan. 49, 30 Pac. 114, which was a suit to quiet title legal and valid against one, and yet wholly insufficient as against another, it was proper to instruct the jury upon this point that, if the demandants had shown a good title as against the tenant, they were entitled to recover."

Prior naked possession was held sufficient title in a writ of right against persons claiming only by a possession subsequently acquired. Hubbard v. Little, 9 Cush. 475. The court said: "Actual possession of land gives a good title against a stranger having no title. Nor does this violate the well-established rule that a party is to recover upon the strength of his own title only. A possession, prior in point of time to that of a tenant, who has himself no title, but only a subsequent possession acquired by an ouster of the demandant, is a better title, upon the strength of which a party is entitled to recover."

A demandant was held entitled to maintain a writ of entry if he showed title or possession. Graves v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 44 N. H. 462. So, prior possession was held sufficient against one who had no title. Gibson v. Bailey, 9 N. H. 168; Straw v. Jones, 9 N. H. 400.

Where one entered under a warranty deed, it was held that he could maintain a writ of entry, although his title was less than a freehold. Melcher v. Flanders, 40 N. H. 139. And possession of the grantor was held sufficient to enable the grantee to maintain the writ against one having no title. Wells v. Jackson Iron Mfg. Co. 47 N. H. 235, 90 Am. Dec. 575.

And where a person was in possession of land, claiming to hold in fee simple, it was held that he could maintain a writ of entry against an intruder. Porter v. Perkins, 5 Mass. 233, 4 Am. Dec. 52.

A demandant in a writ of entry was held entitled to rely on a possessory title against an intruder who had no title. Litchfield v. Scituate, 136 Mass. 39.

In Christy v. Scott, 14 How. 283, 14 L. ed. 422, it was said: "But if the plaintiff had actual prior possession of the land, this is strong enough to enable him to recover it from a mere trespasser, who entered without any title. He may do so by a writ of entry, where that remedy is still practised."

But a prior possession was held insufficient where it had been abandoned. Blaisdell v. Martin, 9 N. H. 253. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

d. Quieting title.

In some states a possessory title is held sufficient to maintain an action to quiet title. But in some states the plaintiff's possession must have been founded upon a legal or equitable title, as in Oregon.

Possession of plaintiff by guardian until majority, claiming as heir of his mother, who claimed under the will of her husband, was held to be a claim and color of title, and was held sufficient to sustain a complaint to quiet title. Pacheco v. Wilson, 2 Ariz. 411, 18 Pac. 597.

And possession and occupation of land were held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain an action to quiet title against one who was only a trespasser. McGovern v. Mowry, 91 Cal. 383, 27 Pac. 746. Cal. Civ. Code, § 1006, provides that occupancy for any period confers a title sufficient against all except the state and those who have title by prescription, accession, transfer, will, or succession.

And an action to quiet title by a person in possession claiming ownership under color of title was held proper. Mitchell v. Trowbridge, 47 Colo. 6, 105 Pac. 878.

And prior possession of plaintiff was held sufficient to enable her to maintain an action to quiet title against one who acquired her possession by mere entry. Watkins v. Nugen, 118 Ga. 375, 45 S. E. 260. Ga. Civ. Code, § 5008, is the same as § 3366. The defendant had a deed from one who had no title, and the deed was void because the consideration was immoral.

Under Ind. Code, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 1070, providing that an action may be brought by any person, "either in or out of possession," to quiet title, it was held unnecessary to allege that plaintiff was in possession. McCaslin v. State, 99 Ind. 428.

And actual possession was held sufficient to give the occupant the right to maintain an action to quiet title against any person claiming an adverse interest. Brenner v. Bigelow, 8 Kan. 496. This was under Kan. Civ. Code, § 594, providing that an action may be brought by any person in possession of real property, against any person who claims interest therein, adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse estate.

And under Kan. Civ. Code, § 594, a party in possession had the right to maintain an action to quiet title. Giltinan v. Lam- against a husband who, not having joined with his wife in her conveyance more than fifteen years previously, claimed still to own an interest in the land which had been adversely possessed for the statutory period.

Mr. Justice Field, in Sharon v. Tucker, 144 U. S. 533, 544, 36 L. ed. 532, 535, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720, 722, in holding that title can be quieted by one who has acquired it by adverse possession, said: "As the complainants have the legal right to the premises in controversy, and as no parties deriving title from the former owners can contest that title with them, there does not seem to be any just reason why the relief prayed for should not be granted." See also Brown v. Anderson, 90 Ind. 93, holding that ejectment can be maintained; Independent Dist. v. Fagen, 94 Iowa, 676, 63 N. W. 456, and Knight v. Knight, 178 Ill. 553, 53 N. E. 306, holding that a grantee is bound to take notice of his grantor's possession and acts of ownership.

Finding no errors in the rulings of the trial court materially prejudicial to the defendant, the judgment is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ert, 13 Kan. 476; Giles v. Ortman, 11 Kan. 59.

In order to maintain an action to quiet title under Kan. Civ. Code, § 594, it was held that plaintiff must have actual possession. Douglass v. Nuzum, 16 Kan. 515; Douglass v. Bishop, 24 Kan. 749; Pierce v. Thompson, 26 Kan. 714.

Title by naked possession was held sufficient to maintain an action for possession and to quiet title, where the defendant did not show any title. Asher v. McCarty, 2 Ky. L. Rep. 218.

To entitle a party to a proceeding under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 321, § 1, similar to § 449 of the Code, to compel the determination of claims to vacant lots, it was held that the plaintiff should have been in the actual possession of the property for three years. Churchill v. Onderdonk, 59 N. Y. 134; Cleveland v. Crawford, 7 Hun, 619.

Actual possession for three years was held sufficient to entitle plaintiff to maintain an action under N. Y. Code Proc. § 449, providing for the determination of claims. Ford v. Belmont, 69 N. Y. 567. Plaintiff was defeated by reason of prior possession of defendant.

And under 3 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 5th ed. p. 600, providing for the determination of a claim to real property where plaintiff has been in the actual possession for three whole years before the service of notice, it was held that where the three years' actual possession did not immediately precede the action, it could not be maintained. Boylston v. Wheeler, 61 N. Y. 521.

Under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1638-1639, providing for the determination of a claim to real property where plaintiff has been in possession for three years, it was held that it was not essential that such possession should be adverse for three years to the defendant's claim. Diefendorf v. Diefendorf, 132 N. Y. 106, 30 N. E. 375.

Under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1638, it was held that the possession should be under some claim of title in order to maintain the action. Bohn v. Hatch, 133 N. Y. 70, 30 N. E. 659.

Plaintiff in possession under claim of title was held entitled to maintain a suit to quiet title. Schroeder v. Gurney, 10 Hun, 413. The court said: "There is a 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

class of American cases, of highly respectable authority, which hold that the actual possession of land under a claim of title, whether well or ill-founded, proves or constitutes seisin in the sense of the common-law."

But Oregon act, providing that any person in possession of real property may maintain a suit in equity against another, who claims an estate or interest adverse, to determine such claim, was held not to apply where the possession was not founded on a legal or equitable title. Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. 402, 18 L. ed. 925. Plaintiff was in possession claiming under a town-site act, which was held to confer no title as against a patent under which defendant claimed.

A party in possession, against whom a judgment in forcible entry and detainer had been rendered, was held not authorized to maintain an action to quiet title under Oregon Code, § 500, providing that a person in possession may bring a suit to quiet title. Tichenor v. Knapp, 6 Or. 205.

In King v. French, 2 Sawy. 441, Fed. Cas. No. 7,793, which was a suit under Or. Civ. Code, § 500, to quiet title, the court followed the rule of Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. 410, 18 L. ed. 927, as to naked possession being insufficient.

Where there was no adverse possession under color of deed for seven years, or sufficient adverse possession without color of title, it was held that a suit to quiet title should be dismissed. Baltzell v. McKinnon, 57 Fla. 355, 49 So. 546; Fla. Gen. Stat. 1906, §§ 1721-22.

And under Wis. Rev. Stat. chap. 141, § 29, authorizing an action to quiet title by one in actual possession, it was held that a complaint was defective in failing to state that plaintiff was in possession, although it stated that plaintiff's grantor was in possession when he made a deed to plaintiff. Shaffer v. Whelpley, 37 Wis. 334.

e. Trespass.

A possessory title is held sufficient to sustain a recovery for injuries to the possession. Where the injury is permanent, as in a taking by a railroad, it seems there are some cases which deny the right of recovery, on a possessory title, of full damages.

Possession was held to be prima facie evidence of title in fee, in an action for injuries to building and ground by a neighbor leaving an excavation so that high water damaged plaintiff. Rau v. Minnesota Valley R. Co. 13 Minn. 442, Gil. 407.

And where plaintiff was in possession, and defendant had a good title by paper, but he had lost all title by reason of adverse possession of a third party for fifteen years, it was held that plaintiff could maintain an action of trespass quare clausum against defendant. Hughes v. Graves, 39 Vt. 359, 94 Am. Dec. 331. The court said: "Quenton had no deed, but his adverse possession for the statutory period gave him an absolute, indefeasible title to the land against the whole world, on which he could either sue or defend as against the former owner. That being the case, is there sufficient virtue left in the defendant's paper title to warrant him in disturbing the plaintiff's possession?"

And naked possession was held sufficient to protect plaintiff against everyone but the true owner. A trespasser could not gainsay his right. Shumway v. Phillips, 22 Pa. 151.

And a plaintiff in trespass quare clausum fregit was held not required, in order to maintain his action, to show his title so long as he could show a right of possession, either adverse to or consistent with, the title set up by the defendant. Todd v. Jackson, 26 N. J. L. 526.

And driving stakes around the corners of unappropriated lands, and erecting salt works thereon, where that was the usual mode of taking possession, was held sufficient to base an action of trespass quare clausum thereon. Cook v. Rider, 16 Pick. 186.

Plaintiff in trespass quare clausum fregit had been in possession of land of the state, exceeding his grant. It was held that he could maintain the action for cutting trees, although the commonwealth, since the trespass, had limited plaintiff's boundaries so as not to include this land. Cutts v. Spring, 15 Mass. 135.

In Slater v. Rawson, 6 Met. 439, it was said that possession of land without title or color of title was sufficient to enable the plaintiff to recover the land from a trespasser.

And where two locations interlocked, it was held that plaintiff could maintain an action of trespass quare clausum upon his prior possessory title. Spurr v. Bartholomew, 2 Met. 479. In this case no adverse claim was interposed for nearly thirty years.

If plaintiff proved that at the time of the alleged trespass he was in possession of the place where a hydraulic ram was erected, it was held that he would be entitled to recover damages for the trespass, without further proof of title, unless the defendant proved he had a better title, or a possession in common with plaintiff. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Bartholomew v. Edwards, 1 Houst (Del.) 17.

Possession alone was held sufficient to support an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. Pearson v. Smith, 1 N. C. pt. 2. p. 444, (Conference, 367); Lamb v. Swain, 48 N. C. (3 Jones, L.) 370 (in this case the plaintiff claimed title under his deed); Myrick v. Bishop, 8 N. C. (1 Hawks) 485; Horton v. Hensley, 23 N. C. (1 Ired. L.) 163; Smith v. Ingram, 29 N. C. (7 Ired. L.) 175.

And a person in actual possession of a mining claim before defendant acquired any rights was held entitled to maintain an action against trespassers. North Noonday Min. Co. v. Orient Min. Co. 6 Sawy. 503, 11 Fed. 125, 9 Mor. Min. Rep. 524.

In an action for trespass quare clausum it was held no defense to plead title in a third party, where plaintiff was in possession under color of title. Connor v. Johnson, 59 S. C. 115, 37 S. E. 240. The court said: "It must be kept in mind that this is an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, and not an action of trespass to try titles; and that there is this fundamental difference between these two actions; vis., that in the former, the object being to recover damages for trespass upon the possession of the land, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show title himself, but possession merely; while in the latter, the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show title in himself, and must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's title."

And trespass quare clausum fregit was held to be an action for the violation of plaintiff's possession; and if he was in the actual occupancy, he could maintain an action without regard to title. Johnson v. M'Ilwain, Rice, L. 375.

In Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Gratt. 462, it was said: "The remedy for a forcible or unlawful entry was designed to protect the actual possession, whether rightful or wrongful, against unlawful invasion, and to afford summary redress and restitution. The entry of the owner is unlawful if forcible, and the entry of any other person is unlawful, whether forcible or not. If the defendant enters unlawfully, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, without any regard to the question of his right of possession. His actual possession, of itself, gives him a right of possession against any person not having a right of entry. That the land belongs to the commonwealth will make no difference."

One holding land under a lease that was void was held entitled to maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against a trespasser. Graham v. Peat, 1 East. 246. Kenyon, Ch. J., said: "There is no doubt that the plaintiff's possession in this case was sufficient to maintain trespass against a wrongdoer; and if he could not have maintained an ejectment upon such a demise, it is because that is a fictitious remedy founded upon title. Any possession is a legal possession against a wrongdoer."

In Chambers v. Donaldson, 11 East, 74, which was an action of trespass, Bayley, J., held: "The question is, whether a mere wrongdoer, when sued for a trespass upon the possession of another, has a right by this mode of pleading to call upon him to set out his title. If the command of the person in whom soil and freehold is pleaded may be traversed, then no other than the person who has the title to the freehold can compel the party in possession to show his own title to that possession; but if the command be not traversable, then every wrongdoer may call on the party in possession to make that disclosure. Trespass is now understood to be a possessory action; but it must cease to be so, if every wrongdoer could in this manner oblige the party in possession to set out his title."

And in trespass quare clausum fregit, where the defendant did not claim on prior possession or title, it was held that prior occupancy was a sufficient title for plaintiff. Catteris v. Cowper, 4 Taunt. 548, 13 Revised Rep. 682.

In Lambert v. Stroother, Willes Rep. 221, it was said that trespass is a possessory action founded merely on the possession, and it is not at all necessary that the right should come in question.

A possessory title was held sufficient to enable the owner to recover damages for discontinuing a highway. Hawkins v. Berkshire County, 2 Allen, 254.

And for alteration of a highway. State Lunatic Hospital v. Worcester County, 1 Met. 437.

And for taking land by a railroad. Andrew v. Nantasket Beach R. Co. 152 Mass. 506, 25 N. E. 966; Sacramento Valley R. Co. v. Moffatt, 7 Cal. 577.

And for taking land by an aqueduct company. Chandler v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 125 Mass. 544.

The title necessary to be proved in an action for injury caused by fire from a railroad train was held to be the same as in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. McNarra v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 41 Wis. 69. The court said: "But if he was in the actual possession and occupancy of the land when the trespass was committed, he may maintain trespass or replevin, according to the exigencies of the case, without making any proof of a paper title, unless the defendant prove an adverse title thereto of a higher character than a mere possessory one."

In an action for damages from a fire by railroad train where the answer put in issue the title of plaintiff, it was held that plaintiff should have been required to prove title by another method than parol evidence, unless such testimony proved title by adverse possession and the statute of limitations. Mayo v. Spartanburg, U. & C. R. Co. 40 S. C. 517, 19 S. E. 73.

But in an action by one in possession of land claiming title, against a city, for a nuisance from water, it was held that a recovery could not be had for a permanent injury on proof of possession only. Winches- 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

ter v. Stevens Point, 58 Wis. 350, 17 N. W. 3, 547. In this case the court said: "There are authorities which hold that the seisin of the plaintiff in any real action is proved, prima facie, by evidence of his actual possession under claim of title. That is, these facts afford presumptive evidence of seisin in fee simple, until the contrary appears. But that rule would not save the plaintiff's case, because she offered evidence which disproved or overcame the presumption arising from these facts. She was not content to show actual possession under claim of title, but she undertook to prove title and failed. The evidence was probably offered to prove an adverse possession, under paper title, for ten years. That would have been sufficient had she established the fact of such adverse possession for the requisite time. But she did not; so the question returns, Was not the plaintiff bound, under the circumstances, to prove her title? We think she was."

The plaintiff who was in possession in an action for damages in condemnation was held required to show title. Robbins v. Milwaukee & H. R. Co. 6 Wis. 636. The court said: "The party from whom it is taken can, obviously, demand payment for no greater interest than he may have had therein. To enable the plaintiff to recover at all, he must show some title. If it be a bare possession or occupancy, he certainly cannot demand and recover payment for the fee. If his estate be that of a lease for years, he cannot recover as for a freehold estate."

In Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Owen, 8 Kan. 409, it was said: "We have not failed to notice the case of Robbins v. Milwaukee & H. R. Co. supra, where a contrary doctrine is maintained, and perhaps correctly in that state. Certainly it is not convincing to us as applicable to the law of this state; and so far as we can see, the case stands alone, and unsupported by authority. Cases under laws that admit the taking without compensation being first made, and authorize the owner to initiate proceedings to recover damages, are not applicable to our laws."

f. Partition.

The holder of a possessory interest in mining property was held not entitled to maintain a bill in equity for partition in the Federal court. Strettell v. Ballou, 3 McCrary, 46, 9 Fed. 256, 11 Mor. Min. Rep. 220. The legal title to this land was held to be in the United States.

g. Injunction.

Where plaintiff had been in possession for three years, it was held that he could have an injunction to prevent interference with the possession pending an action to compel the determination of a claim. Stamm v. Bostwick, 30 Hun, 71. This was an action under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1638, providing for determination of claim.

In Montgomery v. Robinson, 4 Del. Ch

490, an injunction was granted against the defendant to prevent him from tearing down a partition wall and encroaching on plaintiff, who had held adverse possession to said wall. The wall was then abandoned by defendant and the bill dismissed by consent.

II. Title by adverse possession.

a. Quieting title.

The weight of authority is to the effect that a title acquired by adverse possession may be quieted, and the cloud on the same removed in an action by the party holding such adverse possession. Such title is held sufficient for offensive as well as defensive purposes.

And in an action to quiet title by one having title by adverse possession and by tax title, it was held that he could not be put to election as to which title he would rely upon. Liebheit v. Enright, 77 Kan. 321, 94 Pac. 203. It was held that his title by adverse possession was sufficient.

The plaintiff in a suit to quiet title was held to be entitled to maintain the action, and to relief, where he and his grantors had adverse possession for fifteen years under a claim of ownership. Viking Refrigerator Mfg. Co. v. Crawford, 84 Kan. 203, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 408, 114 Pac. 240. They had no color of title.

In Thompson v. Greer, 62 Kan. 522, 64 Pac. 48, referred to in FREEMAN v. FUNKE, the statute of limitation was not asserted. The phrase "sword" and "shield" was on the point of effect of answer with counterclaim giving jurisdiction to court.

Corlett v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 60 Kan. 134, 55 Pac. 844, was an action to foreclose a mortgage against a grantee of a mortgagor. The term, "a weapon of resistance, not of attack," was applied because the answer pleading the statute and asking title to be quieted was not a "cause of action," under the statute authorizing a counterclaim and set-off.

In Burditt v. Burditt, 62 Kan. 576, 64 Pac. 77, where it is said that the statute of limitations is "a statute of defense, not a weapon of attack," the plaintiff's ancestor was in possession of land, and the defendant held the title and advanced money to pay for the same and to pay taxes, and was to reconvey the land on repayment of the money. The plaintiff pleaded the statute of limitation to the answer, which set forth the items due. But it was held that the statute of limitation did not apply as the property was defendant's security.

In Capell v. Dill, 82 Kan. 652, 109 Pac. 286, where the defendants successfully defended against the claim of plaintiff to have his title quieted, but failed in their demand for affirmative relief, because they could not quiet title against an unpaid mortgage, the court said: "The statute of limitations, while a shield for defense, is not a weapon of attack, and cannot be made the basis of affirmative relief." 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

In Bowman v. Cockrill, 6 Kan. 311, the court said: "It is admitted that statutes of limitations can never operate except to bar actions, and can never operate to disturb vested rights. They can never operate where no cause of action exists, and can never operate except when rights have already been disturbed. The effect of the operation of the statute of limitations is not to create a cause of action; its effect is to take away a cause of action already created by acts of one or both of the parties. The effect is not to disturb rights, nor to transfer property; but to leave rights and property just where the parties themselves have voluntarily chosen to leave them during the running of the statute." In this case the defendant in ejectment held under a tax deed which was sustained as a valid deed, and not subject to attack after two years. The statements supra therefore were dicta.

A mortgagor was held not entitled to quiet title against the holder of the mortgage on the ground that the right to foreclose was barred by limitation. Gibson v. Johnson, 73 Kan. 281. Kan. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 4453, Code Civ. Proc. § 25, provides that when a right of action is barred by limitation, it shall be unavailable either as a cause of action or a ground of defense.

Johnson v. Wynne, 64 Kan. 138, 67 Pac. 549, referred to as a case holding that the statute of limitation is a shield, and not a weapon of offense, was a suit to quiet title brought by a judgment debtor against an execution creditor, claiming the lien was lost by the lapse of one year where an order of revivor was not made.

Adverse possession of land under a bond for title, for more than twenty years, was held sufficient to authorize a suit to quiet title and to remove a cloud on the same. Marston v. Rowe, 39 Ala. 722.

And title by adverse possession for twenty years was held sufficient to authorize a suit to quiet title. Harms v. Kransz, 167 Ill. 421, 47 N.E. 746. 1 Starr. & C. Anno. Stat. p. 419, chap. 22, § 50, provides that a chancery court may determine bills to quiet title whether the lands are improved and occupied or unoccupied.

And where plaintiffs' adverse possession was sufficient to bar rights of previous owners, it was held they could maintain an action to quiet title. Sharon v. Tucker, 144 U. S. 533, 36 L. ed. 532, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720; Stellwagen v. Tucker, 144 U. S. 548, 36 L. ed. 537, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 724; Alexander v. Pendleton, 8 Cranch, 462, 3 L. ed. 624.

And title acquired by adverse possession was held sufficient to maintain a suit in equity to remove a cloud on title. Parker v. Miller-Brent Lumber Co. 157 Ala. 282, 47 So. 580; Torrent Fire Engine Co. v. Mobile, 101 Ala. 559, 14 So. 557.

And possession sufficient to secure title by limitation was held to operate as a complete investiture of title, and to enable plaintiff to maintain an action to enjoin a trespass and to quiet title. St. Francis Levee Dist. v. Fleming, 93 Ark. 490, 125 S. W. 132, 659.

And a party whose adverse possession had ripened into a title was held entitled to all the remedies to quiet his possession that were incident to possessions under written titles. Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 365, 94 Am. Dec. 722.

In an action to quiet title, the plaintiff proved possession of mining ground. It was held that he made out all the title required to entitle him to the relief demanded. Niagara Consol. Gold Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill Consol. Min. Co. 59 Cal. 612. Plaintiff's title was purely a possessory one.

And title by adverse possession was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain a suit to quiet title. McCormack v. Silsby, 82 Cal. 72, 22 Pac. 874.

In Scorpion Silver Min. Co. v. Marsano, 10 Nev. 370, 12 Mor. Min. Rep. 502, under Nev. Civ. Practice Act, § 256, providing for quieting title against the assertion of a claim to real property prejudicial to the plaintiff, it was held that it was immaterial how the plaintiff acquired possession, and that the defendant should plead and prove a good title or else lose. On this question, Blasdel v. Williams, 9 Nev. 161, to the contrary, was overruled.

Under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1638, providing for actions to determine claims to real estate, it was held that adverse possession under claim of title by plaintiff, as required by statute, was sufficient to compel the defendant to show his title. Stackhouse v. Stotenbur, 22 App. Div. 312, 47 N. Y. Supp. 940.

And in an action under § 1638, N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., where plaintiff proved possession within the time required, and the defendant did not prove any title, it was held that final judgment should bar the defendant from all claim of title. Merritt v. Smith, 50 App. Div. 350, 63 N. Y. Supp. 1068.

And a suit to quiet title was held proper where plaintiff had acquired title by adverse possession under claim of ownership. Parker v. Metzger, 12 Or. 407, 7 Pac. 518.

In an action to quiet title, it was held that the complainant should show himself to be the owner of the legal title—the thing obscured—before he could have the cloud removed. King v. Coleman, 98 Tenn. 570, 40 S. W. 1082. The court said in regard to the defendants: "If they had no claim whatever but that of mere possession, he would still be required to produce such title before he could have them ejected." This was under Shannon's Code (Tenn.) § 4970, providing that any person having a valid subsisting legal interest in real property, and a right to the immediate possession, may recover in ejectment.

In some states ten years' adverse possession is held sufficient to authorize a suit to quiet title.

So, ten years' adverse possession under claim of title was held sufficient to sustain a suit to quiet title. St. Luke's 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Parish v. Miller, — Iowa, —, 84 N. W. 686; Cramer v. Clow, 81 Iowa, 255, 9 L.R.A. 772, 47 N. W. 59; Tourtelotte v. Pearce, 27 Neb. 57, 42 N. W. 915.

And in an action to quiet title, where complainant had been in possession for ten years before defendant entered, and the latter had not been in continuous possession for such a length of time, it was held that plaintiff could maintain the action and was entitled to the relief. Echols v. Hubbard, 90 Ala. 309, 7 So. 817.

And under Cal. Civ. Code, § 1007, it was held that the finding that plaintiff had had adverse possession for more than ten years prior to the commencement of the action established his title. Orack v. Powelson, 3 Cal. App. 282, 85 Pac. 129.

A mortgagee took possession under a void foreclosure. More than ten years thereafter, his grantees brought suit to quiet title. It was held that under N. D. Rev. Code 1899, § 5207, providing that an action for relief not herein provided for must be commenced within ten years, the right of the mortgagor was barred and plaintiff entitled to relief. Nash v. Northwest Land Co. 15 N. D. 566, 108 N. W. 792.

A purchaser of land at sheriff's sale after ten years' possession was held entitled to maintain a suit to quiet title, under Ind. Burnes's Rev. Stat. 1894 (§ 293, Rev. Stat. 1881), prohibiting an action for the recovery of property sold on execution, by the debtor after ten years. Marley v. State, 147 Ind. 145, 46 N. E. 466.

Adverse possession of land for ten years under an oral contract of purchase from defendant was held to entitle plaintiff to maintain an action to quiet title. Quinn v. Quinn, 76 Iowa, 565, 41 N. W. 316.

The defendant in a suit to quiet title was held entitled to affirmative relief upon a title by limitation on cross petition, where plaintiff discontinued. Cramer v. Clow, 81 Iowa, 255, 9 L.R.A. 772, 47 N. W. 59. The court said: "It is claimed that, while a defendant in possession may plead the bar of the statute in defense, he has no right to make it the basis of an action to quiet title. The cases cited by counsel to sustain this claim do not, in our opinion, support this position. Actual adverse possession of real estate for ten years creates a title by prescription, and it is well settled that the right is not merely defensive, but is, for all practical purposes, a title, and that an action to quiet title founded upon such possession may be maintained."

Adverse possession by a school district of school land for ten years, under a claim of ownership, was held to entitle occupant to a suit to quiet title. Independent Dist. v. Fagen, 94 Iowa, 676, 63 N. W. 456. This was on the ground that a title created by prescription was available for all practical purposes.

And in an action to quiet title, it was held that the plaintiffs and grantors, having been in the open, notorious, exclusive, continuous adverse possession for more than ten years as owners, could have the title quieted. Petersen v. Townsend, 30 Neb. 373, 46 N. W. 526.

And where plaintiff and his grantors had been in the open, exclusive, and adverse possession of land under claim of title for more than ten years, it was held that he could maintain a suit to quiet title, under Or. Civ. Code, § 504. Logus v. Hutson, 24 Or. 528, 34 Pac. 477.

A party in adverse possession of land for ten years was held entitled to maintain an action to quiet title. Moody v. Holcomb, 26 Tex. 714. The court said: "Naked possession for the length of time, and with the incidents, enumerated in the statute, invests a party with a title or right to his land as fully and completely as it could be done by a deed or patent."

In an action to quiet title, it was held that thirty years' possession by virtue of a location and survey was sufficient to enable plaintiff to recover. Turner v. Rogers, 38 Tex. 582. The court said: "The right of entry to those laboring under no disability was certainly tolled long before the appellants entered upon the land; and under our law the right of entry is not only tolled, but a right of action accrues to one who has been ousted of such a possession. Our statute confers this right after ten years' uninterrupted adverse possession."

Under some statutes seven years' adverse possession will authorize a suit to quiet title.

So, under Ill. Stat. chap. 83, § 7, the same as statute 1839, it was held that where a party was in possession under color of title, and had paid the taxes for ten years, an action could be maintained by a suit to quiet title. Mickey v. Barton, 194 Ill. 446, 62 N. E. 802. This statute provides that when a person having color of title, made in good faith to vacant land, shall pay all taxes for seven successive years, he shall be deemed the legal owner; provided that if a person having a better paper title shall during the seven years pay the taxes, the section shall not apply.

In Ross v. Cobb, 48 Ill. 111, it was held that a party in possession, claiming title by reason of paying taxes seven years, could not maintain partition without showing that the defendants were not under disability. It was said that they could maintain a suit to quiet title.

And under the Ill. act 1839, it was held that a party in possession who had paid taxes for seven years, claiming title under a tax deed, could maintain a bill to quiet title. Chicago v. Middlebrooke, 143 Ill. 265, 32 N. E. 457.

An entry under a tax deed and the payment of taxes for seven years were held sufficient title to enable the party in possession to maintain a suit to quiet title. Walker v. Converse, 148 Ill. 622, 36 N. E. 202. This was under Ill. act. 1839.

In Bellefontaine Improv. Co. v. Niedringhaus, 181 Ill. 426, 72 Am. St. Rep. 269, 55 N. E. 184, the action was one for partition and to quiet title, brought by the party in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

possession for seven years under payment of taxes.

b. Ejectment.

1. Generally.

The weight of authority in the United States seems now to be in favor of the doctrine that possession of land during the full period of limitation, under such circumstances as would make a valid defense, amounts to an investiture of title which may be actively asserted in ejectment in all respects as if acquired by deed.

In Bunce v. Bidwell, 43 Mich. 542, 5 N. W. 1023, it was said that adverse possession was not "a right of defense merely, but it is, for all practical purposes, a title, and affirmative remedies might be had upon it as against the original owner, should he afterwards succeed in obtaining possession."

In Taylor v. Burnside, 1 Gratt. 165, speaking of the statutes of limitation, the court said: "The effect of these statutes is to render a continued adversary possession, for a sufficient length of time, conclusive in the action of ejectment against the right of possession, and in the writ of right against the right of property. This result is so absolute that such adversary possession is not only a sufficient defense on the part of the defendant or tenant, but, where it has existed on the part of the plaintiff or demandant, is a sufficient ground for recovery against the strongest proof of better title."

In Stewart v. Harris, 2 Swan, 656, referring to the statute of limitation, the court said: "This statute, therefore, in the given case, has the effect to vest the legal title in the person in whose favor it may operate; and he may support or defend the action of ejectment, in virtue of such title, in like manner as in the case of a registered deed."

In Hubbard v. Godfrey, 100 Tenn. 150, 47 S. W. 81, it was said: "In Tennessee ejectment is, by the act of 1851-52, chap. 152, § 2, distinctively a real action. That act provides, viz.: 'Any person having a valid, subsisting, legal interest in real property, and a right to the immediate possession thereof, may recover the same by an action of ejectment.' Shannon's Code, § 4970."

In Beale v. Hite, 35 Or. 176, 57 Pac. 322, 58 Pac. 102, it was said, "But where, as in this state, an adverse possession of real property for the period prescribed by the statute vests a perfect title in the possessor as against the whole world, and gives him all the remedies incident to the possession and ownership under a written title in the title (Parker v. Metzger, 12 Or. 407, 7 Pac. 518), it seems to us no other reasonable conclusion can be reached than that such possession must be under a claim of title in the occupant, and with an intention to hold it against all the world."

And in Reid v. Anderson, 13 App. D. C. 30, in answer to the question, "What are the essential constituents of adverse possession to make it effectual either as ground for recovery in ejectment, or as a defense to that action?" it was said that the most material element would be continuous adverse possession.

In Jacks v. Chaffin, 34 Ark. 534, continuity of possession was held not necessary after the bar of the statute attached.

In Morris v. Brooke (Del.) 25 Alb. L. J. 90, an action of ejectment to recover for an alluvial bar attached to plaintiff's island, it was said: "I have no doubt that a grant from the proprietors or the commonwealth may be presumed from a long undisturbed possession."

In ejectment possession was held sufficient title to recover, where it would amount to a bar if in the defendant. Holtzapple v. Phillibaum, 4 Wash. C. C. 356, Fed. Cas. No. 6,648. To defeat this right, it was held that the adverse party would have to prove an entry made or a suit brought in time.

A plaintiff in trespass to try title, claiming title through the operation of the statutes of limitations, was held required specifically to plead such title, under Tex. Rev. Stat. 1895, § 3371, providing that the statute of limitation shall not avail in any suit unless it be specifically set forth as a defense in the answer. Erp v. Tillman, 103 Tex. 574, 131 S. W. 1057, reversing — Tex. Civ. App. —, 121 S. W. 547.

In an action of trespass to try title, where plaintiff pleaded title by the statute of limitations, it was held that he could also plead and rely on other sources of title. Mayers v. Paxton, 78 Tex. 196, 14 S. W. 568.

In Molino v. Benavides, 94 Tex. 413, 60 S. W. 875, it was said: "We think it proper to say that we are not inclined to recede from the rule announced in Mayers v. Paxton, supra, as to a necessity of pleading specially the statute of limitations, where the plaintiff in an action of trespass to try title seeks to recover upon a title acquired by adverse possession."

And under Or. Civ. Code, § 313, providing that any person who has a legal estate in real property and a present right to the possession may recover such possession by an action at law, it was held that one who had acquired title by adverse possession under a claim of title could maintain this action. Joy v. Stump, 14 Or. 361, 12 Pac. 929.

In Greene v. Couse, 127 N. Y. 386, 13 L.R.A. 206, 24 Am. St. Rep. 458, 28 N. E. 15, it was said in regard to title by adverse possession: "And title so established may be as effectual as that created in any other manner, for the purpose of remedy or defense founded upon it."

An action of ejectment founded only upon adverse possession was held to be maintainable against the true owner. Barnes v. Light, 116 N. Y. 34, 22 N. E. 441. The court said: "As the plaintiff's claim of title was not founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree, it was necessary for him to show an actual continued occupation of the premises under a claim of title not founded upon written evidence exclusive of any other right. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 370, 371."

And a city in possession of land was held entitled to recover the same in ejectment from an intruder, where there had been no abandonment with the intention not to return. New York v. Carleton, 113 N. Y. 284, 21 N. E. 55.

In ejectment it was held that if, from the possession proved, title could be inferred, it was competent evidence of title as against the defendant, who was without any claim of title, and the plaintiff should prevail, although title was actually in a third party. Hensler v. Hartman, 16 Abb. N. C. 176, note.

And title by possession was held in ejectment to be prima facie evidence of a fee. Day v. Alverson, 9 Wend. 223.

Title by prescription was held to be a complete title, and to sustain an action of ejectment as well as a record title. Dahlem v. Abbott, 153 Mich. 465, 116 N. W. 1007.

In ejectment under a claim of title and possession for many years, it was held that no presumption against the title could be had by reason of the grant by the state to a third party sixty years prior to the suit. Bennett v. Horr, 47 Mich. 221, 10 N. W. 347.

But in Snowden v. Loree, 122 Fed. 493, an ejectment case, it was said: "We find no evidence of facts sufficient to vest in the plaintiffs a title by adverse possession for the statutory period. Such title, if proven, has been held sufficient to entitle one to recover in ejectment."

Interruption of possession of plaintiff before the statute of limitation attached was held to give a good defense in ejectment. Scott v. Mills, 49 Ark. 266, 4 S. W. 908.

Former possession for seven years was held insufficient to enable the occupant to maintain ejectment against the claim of an older patentee, under Ky. act 1809, providing that possession, to bar actions, must have continued for seven years next preceding the commencement of the action. Dorch v. Thompson, 12 B. Mon. 380.

In Ray v. Sweeney, 14 Bush, 1, 29 Am. Rep. 388, it was said that adverse possession sufficient to bar the former owner would be sufficient to maintain ejectment in the matter of easements. But in this case the cause of action had not accrued.

And adverse possession was held not to give title where the legal title had not passed out of the United States. After it so passed prior possession could not avail where the occupant was ejected by suit. Adverse possession then ceased. In a subsequent suit prior possession was held of no avail where the defendant claimed under color of title. Dunn v. Miller, 75 Mo. 260.

Under statute 20 Car. II. chap. 3, avoiding all future grants of the Forest of Dean by the Crown, it was held that the lessor of the plaintiff could not recover in ejectment against a stranger, as he could recover only on the strength of his own title. Goodtitle

v. Baldwin, 11 East, 488, 14 Revised Rep. 674. In this case the lessor's father encroached on the forest sixty years previously, which continued for forty-one years, and continued after his death by possession of his widow for two years, and the defendant had possession for seventeen years.

Adverse possession was held not to create prescription against the state. Kahoomana v. Moehonua, 3 Haw. 635.

Where possession was without color of title, it was held that the presumption was that the possession was in subordination to the legal title, until the contrary was shown. Lund v. Parker, 3 N. H. 49.

In Phillips v. Carroll, 5 Ky. L. Rep. 599, the syllabus of the unreported case says: "The chancellor will not require those holding the legal title to land to surrender it to one whose only claim of title is in an adverse possession, although he might be entitled by reason thereof to retain possession in his own right."

3. Possession twenty years or more.

Twenty years or more is usually held sufficient lapse of time to acquire title by adverse possession commencing under color or claim of title. In some states the time is much shorter under the statute. Where the title is complete, ejectment can be maintained by the holder even against the original owner.

The sufficiency of paper title was held immaterial where both parties claimed under the common source of title, and plaintiffs and their deviser had been in adverse possession for more than forty years under claim of title. Robinson v. Hillman, 36 App. D. C. 576.

And the continued adverse possession of land under a deed for more than twenty-five years was held sufficient to authorize a recovery in ejectment. Orr v. Hollidays, 9 B. Mon. 60.

And adverse possession under a claim of title for more than thirty years was held to support an action of ejectment. Rheinfort v. Abel, — N. J. Eq. —, 80 Atl. 1059.

And adverse possession for over twenty years with claim of title was held sufficient to maintain ejectment against the true owner. Jackson ex dem. Gee v. Oltz, 8 Wend. 440, 5 Mor. Min. Rep. 202.

In ejectment, possession for twenty-four years under claim of title was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain the action. Innis v. Campbell, 1 Rawle, 373.

And exclusive, peaceable, uninterrupted possession under color of the title for forty-five years was held sufficient to sustain an action of ejectment. Houx v. Batteen, 68 Mo. 84.

In Mobley v. Griffin, 104 N. C. 112, 10 S. E. 142, it was said that one of the ways to establish a good title against the world by plaintiff in ejectment was: "Without exhibiting any grant from the state, he may show open, notorious, continuous adverse and unequivocal possession of the land in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

controversy, under color of title in himself and those under whom he claims, for twenty-one years before the action was brought. . . . He may show, as against the state, possession under known and visible boundaries for thirty years, or as against individuals, for twenty years, before the action was brought. Sections 139 and 144, Code of North Carolina."

In Fisk v. Hopping, 169 Ill. 105, 48 N. E. 323, where plaintiffs and their grantors had been in possession forty years, it was said that if a deed in plaintiff's title is insufficient, "the evidence still shows a prima facie title in plaintiff" in ejectment.

If plaintiff entered in possession under a deed, and continued in possession for a period of twenty years, it was held that this constituted title under which he could maintain ejectment against any intruder. Eddy v. Gage, 147 Ill. 162, 35 N. E. 347.

And thirty years possession under a claim of right was held to give a good title on which ejectment could be maintained, unless defendant had a better title. Davis v. Thompson, 56 Mo. 39.

A possession under a claim of title was held sufficient to maintain an action of trespass to try title. Smoot v. Lecatt, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 590. The court said: "The true rule appears to be that twenty years' possession under a claim of right creates a legal presumption of a grant, so that its production may be dispensed with, unless it should be rendered necessary to rebut a paper title adduced by the adverse party; and such was the decision of this court at the last term. . . . This is a lapse of time which, by our statute, is sufficient to toll the right of entry. The adoption of this period may be regarded as a legislative sanction given to the correctness of the above rule. We also hold that a like possession for a shorter period creates a presumption of right less conclusive, but which is legally sufficient to regain or defend possession, unless the adversary can establish an anterior possession without abandonment, or paper evidence of his title."

The holder under a junior patent was held entitled to recover from a holder under a senior patent, by showing continuous possession for more than twenty years. Chiles v. Jones, 7 Dana, 529; Forman v. Ambler, 2 Dana, 108; Voorhies v. Graham, 1 A. K. Marsh. 233.

And possession undisturbed for twenty-five years under a contract to make a deed will raise the presumption that the purchase money had been paid, and sustain ejectment. Briggs v. Prosser, 14 Wend. 227.

Under N. C. Code, § 139, providing that possession of land under color of title twenty-one years would bar an action by the state, it was held that where no grant from the state was introduced, the burden of proof would not be shifted to defendant without prima facie proof of possession under color of title for twenty-one years. But if either party showed a patent, seven years' possession of plaintiff made a prima facie case. Hamilton v. Icard, 114 N. C. 532, 19 S. E. 607.

Twenty years' adverse possession under color of title was held to confer a perfect right of entry and a right to recover in ejectment. Roberts v. Sanders, 3 A. K. Marsh. 28.

And adverse continuous possession of land for more than thirty years was held to give perfect title, and the holder might regain possession the same as if he had a perfect paper title. Sutton v. Pollard, 96 Ky. 640, 29 S. W. 637.

And twenty years' adverse possession was held sufficient to enable the occupant to maintain ejectment where he had been deprived of possession. Armstrong v. Risteau, 5 Md. 256, 59 Am. Dec. 115.

In Plummer v. Lane, 4 Harr. & McH. 72, 1 Am. Dec. 395, it was held that the plaintiff in ejectment, in deducing his title, should show a grant of the land for which the ejectment was brought, and a regular title from the grantee, or seisin of the land, and a dying seised of the person under whom the lessor derived his title, and a regular title from the person dying seised, or twenty years' uninterrupted and exclusive possession of the land.

Open, peaceable, notorious, continuous, adverse, and quiet possession for twenty years was held sufficient to maintain ejectment. Dalton v. Bank of St. Louis, 54 Mo. 105.

And the lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment was held required to count upon and show a possession of the land within the time to which the right of entry was limited under the N. J. act of 1798, within twenty years next before the action was brought. But it was held that he need not show a possession of twenty complete years, or of any other number of years, further than necessary to constitute a full and peaceable possession. Den ex dem. Johnson v. Morris, 7 N. J. L. 6, 11 Am. Dec. 508.

Under N. J. act 1799, § 9, Gen. Stat. p. 1977, § 23, providing that no person shall hereafter make any entry into any lands, but within twenty years next after his right or title shall first accrue, it was held that where plaintiff had been in possession of land for twenty years subsequently claimed by a railroad as part of its right of way, he could maintain ejectment. Spottiswoode v. Morris & E. R. Co. 61 N. J. L. 322, 40 Atl. 505.

N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 368, providing that the person who establishes the legal title to the premises is presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law, was held to mean that, in actions for the recovery of real property, while seisin or possession within twenty years was required, at the same time it would be presumed in favor of the person establishing the legal title, unless the premises were held adversely to the legal title for twenty years before the action. Deering v. Riley, 38 App. Div. 164, 56 N. Y. Supp. 704.

Undisturbed possession for thirty-eight years was held to give plaintiff the right to recover in ejectment, from a party who had recovered in ejectment on a default judgment. Jackson ex dem. Wright v. Dieffendorf, 3 Johns. 269. The possession was under a survey that was erroneous.

In Jackson ex dem. Klock v. Rightmyre, 16 Johns. 314, it was said: "In Jackson ex dem. Wright v. Dieffendorf, supra, a judgment by default in ejectment was not allowed to be a bar to a new ejectment and recovery by the tenant. But what did the tenant show in that case? A previous possession of thirty-eight years under a claim of right, and that was showing an absolute right of possession sufficient to toll an entry."

To entitle the plaintiff to recover in ejectment on the ground of prior possession, it was held that he should prove twenty years' uninterrupted adverse possession on the part of the lessors of the plaintiff, or those under whom they claim, or a right to the possession by the death and seisin, under the statute, of someone under whom they claim. Moody v. McKim, 5 Muni. 374.

In ejectment it was held that if the plaintiff proved twenty years possession, it would be sufficient prima facie title. Hylton v. Brown, 1 Wash. C. C. 204, Fed. Cas. No. 6,980.

And where no other title was shown, possession in plaintiff for twenty years was held evidence of a fee. Denn ex dem. Tarzwell v. Barnard, Cowp. pt. 2, p. 597.

And twenty years possession was held to be as good title for plaintiff in ejectment as though he were a defendant. Stokes v. Berry, 2 Salk. 421. It was said: "The same point was ruled by Holt, Ch. J., at Lent assizes for Bucks, 12 Wm. III., because a possession for twenty years is like a descent which tolls entry, and gives a right of possession which is sufficient to maintain ejectment."

In Federick v. Searle, 5 Serg. & R. 236, it was said that adverse possession for twenty-one years would be sufficient title to maintain the action of ejectment, and justify a recovery.

And in Cooke v. Voss, 1 Cranch, C. C. 25, Fed. Cas. No. 3,179, there was a judgment in ejectment for plaintiff, where he showed a possession of forty-four years, and the defendant failed to pay the annual rent.

In Chastang v. Chastang, 141 Ala. 451, 109 Am. St. Rep. 45, 37 So. 799, the title of plaintiff in ejectment was based on a claim of adverse possession of twenty years, and the defendant held a complete paper title from the government.

And in Smoot v. Lecatt, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 590, it was said: "What is the shortest prior possession under color of right that can be adjudged sufficient to create a legal presumption of title against one who holds a subsequent naked possession? . . . Perhaps, the subject will not admit of any definite uniform period less than twenty years."

Plaintiff in ejectment was held entitled to recover on proof that claimant and those under whom he claimed had adverse, exclusive, and continuous possession of the premises for at least twenty years before the commencement of the action. Willin v. Roe, — Del. —, 78 Atl. 773.

And where plaintiff in ejectment showed an adverse possession for twenty years, so that entry was barred, it was held that he would be entitled to recover against a defendant whose possession for a less period was lawful. Riverside Co. v. Townshend, 120 Ill. 9, 9 N. E. 65.

The holder of title under the twenty years statute of limitations was held entitled to maintain an action to recover possession of the land, against any person who might enter upon it after the twenty years statute had run. Sanitary Dist. v. Allen, 178 Ill. 330, 53 N. E. 109.

And adverse possession for more than twenty years was held sufficient to enable occupant to bring ejectment against the original owner, who had obtained possession after the bar of the statute was complete. Kepley v. Scully, 185 Ill. 52, 57 N. E. 187.

Twenty years adverse uninterrupted possession was held sufficient title to maintain ejectment. Childs v. Jones, 4 Dana, 479.

But in Mitchell v. Mitchell, 1 Md. 44, in ejectment under Md. act 1818, chap. 90, providing that twenty years possession shall be a bar to any claim derived from the state under any patent, provided this should not affect any title under any common or special warrant or warrant of resurvey laid before the act, it was held that plaintiff, in addition to possession, should negative any outstanding title. Plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title.

In Bradshaw v. Ashley, 14 App. D. C. 485, it was said: "It is very true that in the state of Maryland a very different doctrine has been adopted, and consistently adhered to, and the rule of the case of Smith ex dem. Teller v. Lorillard, 10 Johns. 338, has been repudiated. Mitchell v. Mitchell, supra. And it is likewise true that the doctrine of the courts of Maryland, as expounded in the case just cited, has generally been understood to be the law of this District in reference to actions of ejectment. But whatever may have been the understanding, it must now be regarded as settled law for us, settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sabariago v. Maverick, 124 U. S. 261, 31 L. ed. 430, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461, that the doctrine announced by Chancellor Kent in the case of Smith ex dem. Teller v. Lorillard, supra, must prevail with reference to the class of cases covered by it."

3. Possession fifteen years.

Possession adverse under a claim or color of title, for fifteen years, has been held sufficient to maintain ejectment where such time is fixed by limitation laws.

In ejectment, evidence of possession under claim of title for fifteen years was held sufficient as against a party claiming an invalid tax deed. Hollenback v. Eas, 31 Kan. 87, 1 Pac. 275.

And a party having possession under a claim of ownership was held entitled to maintain ejectment against one who had no title. Manspeaker v. Pipher, 5 Kan. App. 879, affirmed in 58 Kan. 788, 51 Pac. 229.

And in an action to recover possession of land, continuous adverse possession for fifteen years under claim of title was held sufficient to maintain the action. It was not necessary to show title from the commonwealth. Taylor v. Arnold, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 516, 17 S. W. 361.

The holder of a possessory title to land for fifteen years under claim of title was held entitled to convey, and his grantees could recover the same. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 793, 29 S. W. 876.

And after title is acquired by adverse possession, it was held that the holder thereof may recover the same by suit, in the same manner as if he had perfect paper title. Sutton v. Pollard, 96 Ky. 640, 29 S. W. 637.

In ejectment it was held that if the plaintiff entered on the land, claiming and holding the same by a well-defined boundary for fifteen years before the entry by the defendant, he should recover. Ratcliff v. Elam, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 772, 21 S. W. 352.

And actual adverse possession of land continuously and uninterruptedly for fifteen years, claiming the same, was held sufficient to authorize a recovery in ejectment. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Rayl, 32 Ky. L. Rep. 870, 107 S. W. 298.

And where plaintiff and those under whom he claimed had been in the uninterrupted possession of land, claiming title for fifteen years, it was held to support an action of ejectment. Barlow v. Bowne, Brayton (Vt.) 135.

A party in adverse possession of land for fifteen years, under a claim of title, was held entitled to recover in ejectment against a trespasser. Middleton v. Johns, 4 Gratt. 129. It did not appear that the land had been granted to anyone by the commonwealth.

And the plaintiff who had adverse possession of land for more than fifteen years was held not required to show title from the commonwealth in order to maintain an action to recover possession. Warmoth v. Fitchen, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 584.

Fifteen years adverse possession was held sufficient to sustain ejectment and cut off an adverse title. Nowlen v. Hall, 128 Mich. 274, 87 N. W. 222.

In White v. McNabb, 140 Ky. 828, 131 S. W. 1021, it was said that adverse possession of land continuously for fifteen years would be sufficient title to enable the owner to maintain an action of ejectment.

In Chism v. Trent, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 849, 10 S. W. 648, it was said that a continued adverse and actual possession for fifteen years would not only toll a right of entry, but confer a right of entry and a right of action to recover the possession.

In Austin v. Bailey, 37 Vt. 219, 86 Am. Dec. 703, it was said: "If Gamsby and the Heatons had acquired title by fifteen years of adverse possession, such title thereby became perfect, and was as good as a paper title by the record from the original proprietors. It was no longer a mere possessory right. It had ripened into a legal estate in fee in the land."

4. Possession for ten years.

Ten years' adverse possession under claim or color of title was held sufficient to give a title on which ejectment could be maintained, where ten years is the limit by statute.

Ten years' adverse possession under a claim of right was held equivalent to a legal title on which ejectment could be maintained, but this only extended to actual possession. If possession was taken under color of title, the claimant would not be limited to the land occupied, but could claim extent of title conveyed to him. Ryan v. Kilpatrick, 66 Ala. 332.

A right to lands acquired by ten years' adverse holding, with the exceptions provided in Ala. Code 1876, §§ 3234-3250, was held to arm such holder with all the powers of offense and defense which an unbroken chain of title conferred. Barclay v. Smith, 66 Ala. 230.

In ejectment, where the plaintiff relied upon adverse possession, it was held necessary for him to establish all the essential elements,—open, notorious, under claim of right, and continuous for the period prescribed by the statute of limitation. Bishop v. Truett, 85 Ala. 376, 5 So. 154.

Adverse possession for the period prescribed by the statute was held not only to give a right of possession, but also a right of entry and of action as plaintiff against the strongest proof of title. Hackett v. Marmet Co. 3 C. C. A. 76, 8 U. S. App. 149, 52 Fed. 268. In this case the plaintiff had possession and had paid taxes for ten years, and a tenant refused to surrender.

And to toll entry or perfect title which, by mere possession, would sustain an action of ejectment, it was held that the possession should be actual, public, or notorious, adverse, or in independent right, and continuous. The adverse holder need not cultivate or reside on the land. Black v. Pratt Coal & Coke Co. 85 Ala. 504, 5 So. 89.

And where a widow entered on land pursuant to an agreement, defective because not witnessed or acknowledged, and held possession ten years, it was held that she could maintain a suit for possession even against the holder of a perfect paper title. Hall v. Caperton, 87 Ala. 285, 6 So. 388.

And actual and continuous possession of land under a claim of ownership, openly and notoriously adverse and hostile to the legal title and all others for the statutory period of ten years, was as good as a deed in fee from the record owner. Murray v. Hoyle, 97 Ala. 588, 11 So. 797, first appeal, 92 Ala. 559, 9 So. 368.

Mississippi Code, p. 829, act 1844, § 1, provides that every possessory, ancestral, mixed, or other action shall be brought in seven years; § 3 provides that an actual adverse possession of ten years vests a full and complete title to the land. It was held that a party in such possession might sue for possession within the time given in § 1, without further evidence of title than possession for ten years. Ellis v. Murray, 28 Miss. 129.

Even against the true owner, who was in possession of his own, it was held that a plaintiff might recover by showing that at a time when those having the right of entry were under no disability, he and those under whom he claimed held, for the period prescribed by statute, open, notorious, unbroken, adverse possession, that the land was not voluntarily abandoned, and that the dispossessor has not held long enough to bar. Jones v. Brandon, 59 Miss. 585.

In ejectment, if the plaintiff, by himself or tenants, had the visible, notorious, continued, and actual adverse possession for the period of ten years prior to the suit, it was held that he should recover. Schultz v. Arnot, 33 Mo. 172.

Ten years' adverse possession, except as against the government and parties under disabilities, was held to create an affirmative title on which ejectment could be maintained. Barry v. Otto, 56 Mo. 177.

And adverse possession for ten years under an oral purchase, where the consideration was paid, claiming title, was held sufficient to maintain ejectment. Ridge-way v. Holliday, 59 Mo. 445.

In order to recover in ejectment on adverse possession, it was held that something more than mere prior possession should be shown. It was held necessary to show adverse possession for a time long enough to give title, or that possession was prior to that of defendant, or that plaintiff's possession was taken and held under a claim of right, and that he had not abandoned possession. Alexander v. Campbell, 74 Mo. 142.

And adverse possession for over ten years was held to give the holder such a title as that he could maintain ejectment. It was further held that a judgment in ejectment against him was no bar to a second action by him. Ekey v. Inge, 87 Mo. 493.

Proof of actual adverse possession of land for more than ten consecutive years under color of title was held sufficient to enable plaintiff in ejectment to recover. Kelley v. Kurz, 118 Mo. 414, 24 S. W. 171.

A title acquired by adverse possession in Missouri was held to be in every respect as good for purposes of attack or defense as a title by deeds running back to the government. Scannell v. American Soda Fountain Co. 161 Mo. 606, 61 S. W. 889.

And adverse possession for ten years under a claim of title was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to maintain an action to remove a cloud on the title. Merchants' Bank v. Evans, 51 Mo. 335.

In Martin v. Bonsack, 61 Mo. 556, when plaintiff recovered in ejectment on an adverse possession of ten years under a claim of title, the court said: "The tendency of recent adjudications is to admit explanations of a possessor of property as to his title, not with a view to set up such title, but to show whether his possession was adverse under the statute of limitations or otherwise."

An alien in possession of public lands for eleven years was held entitled to maintain ejectment against a mere intruder. Courtney v. Turner, 12 Nev. 345.

A person who has held land adversely for ten years was held to have a good title by virtue of such possession which could be affirmatively asserted in ejectment. Cave v. Anderson, 50 S. C. 293, 27 S. E. 693.

And a title acquired by adverse possession under a claim of title was held sufficient to support ejectment. Harrelson v. Sarvis, 39 S. C. 15, 17 S. E. 368. The court said: "The statute of limitations has a double aspect; besides affording a shield of defense, it may, under certain circumstances, give title capable of being asserted actively." As was said by Judge Earle in Young v. Watson, 1 McMull. L. 449, cited with approbation in the case of Geiger v. Kaigler, 15 S. C. 273: "A plaintiff can only make out a perfect title by producing a grant, or by proving such a possession as will give title in himself, or in someone from whom he derives title."

In an action of trespass to try title, it was held that the plaintiff claiming title by adverse possession against the holder of the paper title should show his adverse possession for the full statutory period. Abel v. Hutto, 8 Rich. L. 42; Cantey v. Platt, 2 McCord, L. 260.

The statute of limitations was held to have a double aspect, besides affording a shield of defense, it can give under certain circumstances a title capable of being asserted actively. Harrelson v. Sarvis, 39 S. C. 14, 17 S. E. 368. So, it was held that adverse possession for twelve years under partition proceedings was sufficient to sustain suit in ejectment.

And adverse possession for ten years was held to confer a good title, but it was held that plaintiff in ejectment should recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of his adversary's title,—it was necessary to prove a grant from the state or facts from which a grant would be presumed. Duren v. Kee, 50 S. C. 444, 27 S. E. 875.

And adverse possession for fifteen years was held sufficient to maintain ejectment. The fact that plaintiff paid taxes for a number of years was sufficient to raise the presumption that the state had parted with title. Busby v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. 45 S. C. 312, 23 S. E. 50.

And adverse possession of land for ten years under color of title was held sufficient to enable plaintiff to recover in ejectment against any title. Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345. The court said: "I have mentioned ten years as the time one must hold 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

such adversary possession in order to give him a perfect title even against the party who has a perfect written title, because by our statute the right of entry and the right to bring an action to recover land is barred by ten years after the time the right to make such entry or bring such action first accrued. (W. Va. Code, chap. 104, § 1, p. 546.)"

More than thirty years occupancy and possession under a claim of title was held sufficient to maintain ejectment under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 4211, providing that where the occupant enters into possession under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right founding such claim upon deeds, and there has been a continued occupation and possession under such claim for ten years, the premises shall be deemed to have been held adversely. Hecker v. Horlemus, 74 Wis. 21, 41 N. W. 966.

Adverse possession for ten years was said to give a title which would sustain ejectment. Burks v. Mitchell, 78 Ala. 61.

In Lucy v. Tennessee & C. R. Co. 92 Ala. 246, 8 So. 806, it was said: "An adverse possession of land which continues unbroken for ten years will confer a title which will sustain as well as defeat an action of ejectment; and the principle applies alike where possession is held under color or claim of title and where the possession was that of a mere trespasser."

5. Possession for seven years.

In some states the statute fixes the time of seven years' adverse possession under color or claim of title as constituting a defense. This is held to give such a title as will sustain the plaintiff in ejectment.

A defective patent was held sufficient to give color of title and fix the limits of possession, and a continuous adverse possession under it or without any color, when the limits of possession were shown for a period of over seven years, was held to create a title sufficient to maintain ejectment. Logan v. Jelks, 34 Ark. 547.

And when the possession of plaintiffs and their grantors was open, notorious, and adverse, and continued for more than seven successive years before defendant entered into possession, this was held sufficient to enable plaintiffs to maintain ejectment. Crease v. Lawrence, 48 Ark. 312, 3 S. W. 196.

An occupant for seven years was held to have an indefeasible title, not only sufficient for protection, but also for recovery against all the world, under Ga. act 1767, providing that all writs, suits, or action shall be taken within seven years next after the cause of action accrues, and no person having any right of entry into lands shall make said entry but within seven years after the right accrues. Johnson v. Lancaster, 5 Ga. 39.

And under Ga. act 1767 seven years' possession under color of title was held sufficient to entitle the party having such possession to maintain ejectment against one claiming under a regular chain of title. Watkins v. Woolfolk, 5 Ga. 261.

And possessory title for more than seven years was held sufficient to enable plaintiff in ejectment to recover against a trespasser. Buckner v. Chambliss, 30 Ga. 652, the court said: "prior possession will prevail in ejectment over a subsequent one acquired by mere entry, without any lawful right."

Continuous possession for seven years, with color of title, was held sufficient to support ejectment against a tenant in possession. Davis v. Stripling, 32 Ga. 656.

And possession for seven years under an agreement to divide a disputed boundary was held sufficient to entitle plaintiff to ejectment. Shiels v. Lamar, 58 Ga. 590.

In Hinchman v. Whetstone, 23 Ill. 185, it was said: "And it has been uniformly held that after the occupant has acquired the benefit of the bar which a statute of limitations confers, he may recover the possession and also for injuries committed on the premises as against a stranger, by simply proving his occupancy for the period of limitation." Ill. act March 2, 1839, § 2, provides that when any person having color of title in good faith to vacant land shall pay the taxes for seven successive years, he or she shall be deemed the legal owner to the extent of the paper title. In Paullin v. Hale, 40 Ill. 274, the above case was noticed, and the difference between that case and Harding v. Butts, 18 Ill. 507, said to be that in the Harding Case the party never had been in possession and in the Hinchman Case he had and recovered on this prior possession.

Under Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 83, § 7, providing that when a person having color of title to vacant land shall pay all taxes for seven consecutive years he shall be deemed the legal owner, it was held that he could sue for possession. Gage v. Hampton, 127 Ill. 87, 2 L.R.A. 512, 20 N. E. 12. This was the same as Laws 1839, p. 266.

And under Ill. act 1839, where claim and color of title, payment of taxes, and possession concurred in for seven years, such claim could maintain ejectment against the holder of the original title in fee. Chiles v. Davis, 58 Ill. 411.

And under Ill. act March 2, 1839, § 2, it was held that when the bar of the statute attached to the occupant, if he temporarily left the premises, he could recover the same from all persons against whom he could plead the statute as a bar if he had been sued. Paullin v. Hale, 40 Ill. 274. The court said a right to land "acquired by limitation is affirmative, and can be enforced."

And under Ill. act 1839, the holder of title acquired by limitation who had once held possession was held entitled to use the statute affirmatively, and he could recover the land from one who claimed to have the paramount title. Hale v. Gladfelder, 52 Ill. 91. In this case the plaintiff had agreed to sell the premises to a party who took possession and then abandoned the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

same. This possession was held to inure to plaintiff.

Where both the right of entry and the right of action were lost by the statute of limitation, it was held that the party in adverse possession would conclusively be presumed to be the owner, and to be vested with the title, which could not be cut off by the act of the former holder in regaining possession by a tort. Faloon v. Simshauser, 130 Ill. 649, 22 N. E. 835.

And after the bar of the statute of limitations had attached and the party claiming thereunder acquired possession, it was held that the statute was as available for attacking as for defensive purposes. Donahue v. Illinois C. R. Co. 165 Ill. 640, 47 N. E. 714; McDuffee v. Sinnott, 119 Ill. 449, 10 N. E. 385.

In ejectment it was held that the law did not require that the seven years' adverse possession of plaintiff, with color of title, which gave a title under the statute of limitations, should be possession next preceding the commencement of the action. Christenbury v. King, 85 N. C. 229. This was on the ground that seven years' adverse possession with color of title, or twenty years' adverse possession without color, gives title where the title is out of the state.

Seven years adverse possession in Tennessee was held sufficient to maintain ejectment. But proof should be made that the state has made a grant to someone; if this is not proved, twenty years' adverse possession will raise the presumption of a grant. Cannon v. Phillips, 2 Sneed, 211. The court said: "The doctrine of presumption of title, rests upon the simple fact of long-continued use and enjoyment, and requires no aid from 'color of title.' Possession of land is prima facie evidence of title; the law supposes that it had a legal origin, and, when undisturbed for the period of twenty years, it becomes, in view of the law, an assurance of title of no less force or efficacy than the actual grant, whose place it supplies."

6. Possession over five years.

When a party was in adverse possession for over five years, it was held that he acquired a title; and if, after he was thus vested, he was ousted by the party holding a paper title he could recover in ejectment. Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 540, 95 Am. Dec. 205; Langford v. Poppe, 56 Cal. 73.

c. Specific performance.

Title by adverse possession is generally held sufficient to enable the vendor to maintain an action for specific performance against a purchaser, in the absence of a contract for a perfect record title.

A title by adverse possession for twenty-one years was held sufficient to enable the holder to maintain a suit for specific performance. Shober v. Dutton, 6 Phila. 185.

Open notorious adverse possession of land for the term of ten years was held to give the possessor a perfect title, sufficient for enforcing specific performance for its sale. Ballow v. Sherwood, 32 Neb. 666, 49 N. W. 790, 50 N. W. 1131.

And title by adverse possession under claim of title was held sufficient to enforce specific performance of contract of purchase. Bohm v. Fay, 18 Abb. N. C. 175. In this case possession was over fifty years and there was an absence of one deed.

Fifty years' undisputed possession under an unbroken chain of title was held to establish title by adverse possession, and to enable the holder to require specific performance of contract of purchase. Clarke v. Wollpert, 128 App. Div. 203, 112 N. Y. Supp. 547.

And a title acquired by adverse possession was held sufficient to maintain an action for specific performance. Ottinger v. Strasburger, 33 Hun, 466, affirmed in 102 N. Y. 692.

In an action for specific performance of contract to convey, it was held that where the vendor and those under whom he claimed had adverse possession under a claim of title for nearly one hundred years, the title would be sufficient to maintain the action. Abrams v. Rhoner, 44 Hun, 507.

And where plaintiff had a good title by adverse possession for more than thirty years, it was held that he could maintain an action for specific performance against a purchaser. O'Connor v. Huggins, 16 N. Y. S. R. 130, 1 N. Y. Supp. 377.

And where adverse possession was had for thirty-eight years, under claim of title, and during that time no one made any adverse claim of ownership, it was held that the vendor could enforce the contract of sale and require the purchaser to take the title. Freedman v. Oppenheim, 187 N. Y. 101, 116 Am. St. Rep. 595, 79 N. E. 841.

Title by adverse possession was held sufficient to maintain an action for specific performance by a vendor against a vendee. Pratt v. Eby, 67 Pa. 396. In this case there was a defect that rendered the title unmarketable.

A deed deficient as to attesting witnesses was held cured by adverse possession for ten years. The plaintiff was held entitled to specific performance of a contract of purchase. Lyles v. Kirkpatrick, 9 S. C. 265.

And where the plaintiff had title by adverse possession, it was held that he should have a decree of specific performance against a purchaser. Scott v. Nixon, 3 Drury & War. 388. In this case the chancellor said: "What, then, is this law of this court on questions of this kind? The court has to consider, first, whether de facto a title has been made out; and, secondly, whether there is sufficient evidence of title to satisfy the court, before it obliges an unwilling purchaser to accept the title. With regard to the first, it is a matter of perfect indifference how the title is made out, provided the purchaser gets a title; whether it be by escheat, abatement, disseisin, intrusion, or possession and non-claim, or destruction of contingent remain- 46 J.R.A.(N.S.)

ders, is a matter of no consequence, provided there be a valid legal title; whether the evidence is sufficient is a different question."

In Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 575, it was said: "It must not be taken, from anything that we have said, that we do not regard a title good that rests alone upon a clear adverse possession of twenty years: nor that we pronounce the title of the vendors in the case before us as defective. What we hold is, that the vendee has brought such facts and circumstances as call upon the vendors to show how they may be met and nullified before they can compel him to complete his purchase."

In Ottinger v. Strasburger, 33 Hun, 466, it was said in Mott v. Mott, 68 N. Y. 247, a doubt was expressed whether a purchaser could be compelled to take a title depending upon adverse possession and parol proof to support it, unless in a case beyond all reasonable doubt.

In Ottinger v. Strasburger, supra, the court, after referring to Hartley v. Jamea, 50 N. Y. 38, "where it was said in a general way, 'the plaintiff was not bound to accept a title resting on adverse possession,'" said: "But this point was not included in the case as it was presented to the court, and the statement made concerning it therefore is not entitled to be followed as authority."

But in an action by a vendor for specific performance, based on title by adverse possession, it was held that in order to make plaintiff's title good, she was bound to show that the defendant could not hereafter be called upon to litigate with strangers to this action who might claim title under some former owner. Simis v. McElroy, 160 N. Y. 156, 73 Am. St. Rep. 673, 54 N. E. 674. In Freedman v. Oppenheim, 187 N. Y. 101, 116 Am. St. Rep. 595, 79 N. E. 841, this case was distinguished, the court saying: "In no place in the opinion does it appear that title by adverse possession clearly established does not in some instances furnish a marketable title."

In Heller v. Cohen, 154 N. Y. 299, 48 N. E. 527, it was held in an action for specific performance, that it was not sufficient that the plaintiff had merely held possession undisturbed for twenty years, as this did not show that the possession was adverse.

And where the terms and conditions of a contract of sale showed that the purchaser should have a good title by record, it was held that he would not be compelled to accept a title depending on adverse possession. Noyes v. Johnson, 139 Mass. 436, 31 N. E. 767.

d. Trespass.

The holder of title by adverse possession is held entitled to maintain an action of trespass, and trespass quare clausum, and for damages in eminent domain proceedings.

In an action of trespass quare clausum, by a party in possession for nineteen years under a defective instrument as color of title, the burden was cast on the defendant to establish a better title. McInerney v. Irvin, 90 Ala. 275, 7 So. 841. The court said that ten years of adverse possession under such muniment of title "arms such holder with all the powers of offense and defense."

And possession of land for fifteen years was held sufficient to maintain trespass for cutting timber. Farmer v. Lyons, 87 Ky. 421, 9 S. W. 248.

Possession for eight or ten years, claiming title, was held sufficient title in fee simple to enable the occupant to claim the damages caused in eminent domain proceedings. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Owen, 8 Kan. 409.

Fifteen years' adverse possession of right of way was held sufficient to enable holder to maintain an action for damages against the railroad attempting to occupy the same under a contract with a prior owner. Pollock v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. 103 Ky. 84, 44 S. W. 359.

Adverse possession of land for ten years under claim of ownership was held to give such title as would sustain a claim for damages from improper construction of an adjacent railroad. Swenson v. Lexington, 69 Mo. 157. But a city would not be liable for the negligence of a railroad company.

In Wadleigh v. Marathon County Bank 58 Wis. 546, 17 N. W. 314, it was said: "Although the action is in the nature of trespass, it is brought to recover damages for a permanent injury to the freehold. Were no damages claimed other than for the mere invasion of plaintiff's possession, the lands being wild and vacant, it would be incumbent on him to prove his title thereto in order to show a constructive possession in himself. The cause of action being permanent injury to the land, to entitle the plaintiff to recover he must establish his title. The reason of this is, if the plaintiff is not the owner of the land a recovery by him would be no bar to an action for such injury brought against the trespasser by the real owner. The cases which establish these propositions are Hungerford v. Redford, 29 Wis. 345; Austin v. Holt, 32 Wis. 478."

And in an action of trespass, it was held that the plaintiff made a prima facie case by proving his possession under a deed for more than thirty years. Baier v. Zieglerbauer, 66 Wis. 524, 29 N. W. 277.

e. Injunctive relief.

The holder of title by adverse possession was held entitled to maintain an action for injunction to prevent the illegal opening of streets through the land. Schock v. Falls City, 31 Neb. 599, 48 N. W. 468.

And a landowner inclosing and retaining part of the highway for thirty years was held to be entitled to enjoin a road supervisor from interfering with the same. Axmear v. Richards, 112 Iowa, 657, 84 N. W. 686.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

L. B. POINDEXTER et al., Appts.,

v.

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

Contempt — jurisdiction — information on official oath.

1. Jurisdiction of a contempt proceeding is conferred by an information under the official oath of the prosecuting attorney and a citation directed by the judge to be issued by the clerk, setting forth the information, although the information is not specifically verified or supported by affidavit.

Appearance — waiver of delay in serving citation.

2. Appearance in a contempt proceeding waives failure to serve the citation before the return day.

Appeal — contempt — sufficiency of pleading — case made by evidence.

3. In reviewing a conviction for contempt, the question of guilt will be determined from the evidence at the trial, regardless of what was charged in the information.

Contempt — counsel permitting juror to drink liquor in his room.

4. An attorney is not guilty of contempt of court by merely remaining in his room at the hotel when a juror in the case in which he is engaged comes there for a drink upon invitation of his associate counsel, with whom he shares the room, without excluding the juror from the room or reporting the matter to the court, if he had no knowledge of the invitation or who the person was who sought admission to the room.

Note. — Misconduct toward jurors as contempt.

For a discussion as to summoning biased or otherwise improper jurors or talesmen as contempt, see note in 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013.

This note is confined to cases in which it was sought to punish misconduct toward jurors as a contempt of court, and does not include cases in which tampering with jurors was urged as a ground for a new trial and in which it was incidentally said that such conduct amounted to a contempt of court.

The authorities agree that any attempt designed to corruptly influence a juror in the discharge of his duties is punishable as a contempt of court. 9 Cyc. 15.

It is not essential to such an offense that the misconduct should be in the presence of the court or within the courthouse precincts.

Concerning prospective jurors.

Making inquiry concerning one who had been drawn on the jury, for the purpose of ascertaining if there was any reason for challenging him should he be drawn on Same — furnishing liquor to jurors.

5. The attorney for defendant in a murder case who, without knowing to whom he is speaking, invites the bailiff and one of the jurors in his case to his room to drink liquor, and furnishes it to them upon their calling after he knows who they are, is guilty of contempt of court.

Same — juror and bailiff — drinking with counsel for defendant.

6. A juror in a murder case, and the bailiff having charge of him, who, upon the invitation of counsel for defendant, go to his room to drink intoxicating liquor, are guilty of contempt of court.

Appeal — contempt — modifying sentence.

7. An attorney, a juror, and a bailiff connected with a murder case who have been the jury in the defendants' case, is not a contempt of court. Wells v. District Ct. 126 Iowa, 340, 102 N. W. 108.

In Ex parte McRae, 45 Tex. Crim. Rep. 285, 77 S. W. 211, it was held that the mere effort to secure the services of a party to find out how a juror stands in reference to a pending case does not authorize punishment for contempt, where the party so employed neither makes an effort to tamper with the juror, nor holds out any inducement to the juror to decide one way or the other, nor talks with the juror about the case.

And in United States v. Carroll, 147 Fed. 947, it was held that an unsuccessful attempt to secure the services of a party to do what he could to influence jurors in favor of a pending case is not punishable as a contempt of court, as it does not obstruct or impede the due administration of justice within the meaning of § 725, U. S. Rev. Stat. U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 583, statutes restricting the power of the United States courts to punish for contempt.

But calling attention to a pending suit by a suitor, and discussing it in the presence of some of the jurors who may have to try it, is a contempt of court. Baker v. State, 82 Ga. 776, 4 L.R.A. 128, 14 Am. St. Rep. 192, 9 S. E. 743.

So, conversing with a prospective juror who has been summoned for jury service, about the merits of a pending case, and attempting to improperly influence him to render a verdict in the cause, is a contempt of court. Marvin v. District Ct. 128 Iowa, 355, 102 N. W. 119. The court said that the essential element of the charge made was an attempt improperly to influence the courts of justice as administered through the medium of a jury trial; that the interest behind the act and the offensiveness thereof were the same, whether the juror had been sworn to try the issues in the case, or was in waiting subject to call for service. To the same effect is State ex rel. Webb v. District Ct. 37 Mont. 191, 95 Pac. 593, 15 Ann. Cas. 743, where it was held that one who at 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

guilty of contempt of court in furnishing and drinking intoxicating liquor in the attorney's room may be relieved of a jail sentence by the appellate court if they have sought in every way to purge themselves of intentional disrespect for the court.

APPPEAL by defendants from and certiorari to the Circuit Court for Lawrence County to review judgments punishing them for contempt of court. Reversed as to Poindexter and modified and affirmed as to the others.

Statement by Wood, J.:

On March 11, 1913, one Benningfield was being tried in the circuit court of Lawrence tempts improperly to influence a juror is guilty of contempt, whether a juror be actually sworn upon a particular case, or is only a member of the panel from which a trial jury is to be selected. And this is the rule recognized in Re Cuddy, 131 U. S. 280, 33 L. ed. 154, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 703.

In Coleman v. State, 121 Tenn. 1, 113 S. W. 1045, it was held that one who conversed with persons summoned for jury service, stating that he was desirous of having them on the jury in his case because of their long acquaintance, complaining that he had no friends on the jury at a former trial, and suggesting that it was not necessary for them to advise the court how long they had known the accused unless they were asked, was guilty of contempt of court, such conduct being an "unlawful interference with the process or proceedings of the court" within the meaning of the statute empowering the court to inflict punishment as contempts of court in such cases.

An attempt to corruptly influence members of the venire of jurors in attendance upon the court, in favor of one of the parties to a pending case, from which a trial jury would be drawn, is punishable as a contempt of court under a statute restricting the power of the United States courts to punish for contempt to cases of misbehavior in the presence of the court" or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," though the conduct complained of occurred in a saloon several blocks distant from the place where the court was held. Kirk v. United States, 112 C. C. A. 531, 192 Fed. 273. To the same effect is United States v. Carroll, 147 Fed. 947, where it appeared the conduct complained of occurred on the street several blocks distant from the courthouse.

Concerning jurors selected to try the case.

Attempting to influence and corrupt jurors by bribery is a contempt of court. Hurley v. Com. 188 Mass. 443, 74 N. E. 677, 3 Ann. Cas. 757; Langdon v. Wayne county on an indictment charging him with murder in the first degree. The attorneys present representing the defendant were L. B. Poindexter and Oscar Blackford. L. C. Going, one of the attorneys for the defendant, was not present while the jury was being selected. He arrived at Walnut Ridge about 2 o'clock Thursday morning, March 13, 1913. He found all the rooms of the Rhea Hotel occupied, and there was no other hotel in town. He was assigned to the room in the Rhea Hotel occupied by Poindexter, associate counsel representing the defendant. He continued to occupy this room with Poindexter until the trial of Benningfield was over. When Going arrived, the jury had been impaneled and put in charge of a special officer. The jurors were instructed, among other things, to remain together during the recess of the court, and to let their conduct be, as it had been in the past, free from any sort of criticism, not to separate from each other unless accompanied by the bailiff, stay as nearly as they could separated from crowds, not to permit anyone to talk to them about the case or talk in their presence or hearing about it, and not to receive any information as to the merits of the case from any source whatever. The jurors, in the instructions, were impressed with the importance of the case, and their duties, and of the necessity of not permitting anyone to approach them concerning it.

Going did not know at that time the juror Moseley, and the bailiff, Freer. On Thurs-

Circuit Judges, 76 Mich. 358, 43 N. W. 310; Gandy v. State, 13 Neb. 445, 14 N. W. 143; Toozer v. State, 5 Neb. (Unof.) 182, 97 N. W. 584; Kirk v. United States, 112 C. C. A. 531, 192 Fed. 273.

In Hurley v. Com. 188 Mass. 443, 74 N. E. 677, 3 Ann. Cas. 757, it was said: "Contempts of this kind are most dangerous assaults upon the integrity of our courts in the trial of cases. It is inconceivable that any court would treat such an offense as anything less than a criminal contempt of the gravest character."

One who has endeavored to bring about a disagreement of the jury by bribery may be punished for contempt of court, under a statute empowering the court to punish any misconduct by which the rights or remedies of a party in a pending civil cause may be defeated, impaired, or prejudiced. Langdon v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 76 Mich. 358, 43 N. W. 310.

A suggestion to the attorney of one of the parties in a pending suit that a certain member of the jury could be approached and illegally influenced in obtaining a verdict or a mistrial, and an offer to do so, constitute a contempt of the court. Bradley v. State, 111 Ga. 168, 50 L.R.A. 691, 78 Am. St. Rep. 157, 36 S. E. 630.

So, one who, for the purpose of securing money for himself, falsely pretends to another interested in the result of a cause that he can corruptly influence with money the jurors trying the cause, to return such a verdict as he desires, is guilty of contempt of court, though he had no intention to bribe and merely intended to cheat the party out of the money. Little v. State, 90 Ind. 338, 46 Am. Rep. 224. The court said that such an act tends to disgrace and degrade the jury in the minds of the person to whom the corrupt proposition is submitted, and that it is the intention of the law that courts shall have the means of commanding merited respect, not only for themselves, but also for all who are engaged in the administration of the law as officers or jurors of the court.

Conversing with a juror during the intermission of the court about the verdict to be rendered in the case is a contempt of court. Drady v. District Ct. 126 Iowa, 345, 102 N. W. 115; Re Gorham, 129 N. C. 481, 40 S. E. 311.

Requesting a juror to favor one on trial for murder, and to do all he could for him, is evidence of an attempt to improperly influence a juror in the discharge of his duty and conduct, which was calculated to impede and obstruct the proper administration of justice, and as such punishable as contempt of court. Re Moore, 79 S. C. 399, 60 S. E. 947.

So, where it appeared that the defendant was seen in close conversation with a juror during the trial, or after they began to deliberate on their verdict, it was held in Davidson v. Manlove, 2 Coldw. 346, that the circumstance, unexplained, is sufficient to authorize the trial court to grant a new trial and to subject the party to punishment for contempt of court.

To the same effect is Re Odum, 133 N. C. 250, 45 S. E. 569, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 296, where it was said that a defendant who entertained one of the jurors on his case all night, and who was seen conversing with another juror alone in a secluded spot during a recess of the court, was guilty of contempt of court.

Calling out to the jury in a loud voice, as they were crossing the street from the hotel to the jury room to deliberate upon their verdict, not to convict the defendant, is a contempt of court. Ex parte Creely, 8 Cal. App. 713, 97 Pac. 766.

Passing a note to a juror, after the jury had retired to consider their verdict, requesting him to hold out for defendant, constitutes a contempt of court. Ex parte Smith, 40 Tex. Crim. Rep. 179, 49 S. W. 396.

One who, during the pendency of a trial, publishes a scurrilous article concerning the same and hands a copy of such article to the jurors, is guilty of contempt of court. Field v. Thornell, 106 Iowa, 7, 68 Am. St. Rep. 281, 75 N. W. 685.

One who took a juror to a saloon and approached him on the subject of render-day he cross-examined the witnesses for the state, but gave no attention to the personnel of the jury. During the recess of the court at the noon hour that day, Smith, one of the attorneys for the state, and several others, drank with Going in room No. 24, occupied by him and Poindexter. After court adjourned in the afternoon of that day, Moseley, accompanied by Freer, the bailiff, started down to the office of the hotel to get a cigar, and at the head of the stairs met Going, and someone remarked that he would like to have a drink of Whisky, and Going said that he had some whisky in his room. Thereupon several persons, including Moseley and Freer, went to room No. 24 with Going and took a drink. Moseley and Freer immediately left the room after getting the drink. Going did not at that time know Moseley and Freer, and said he did not know that one was a juror and the other a bailiff until the bailiff told Going that Moseley was a juror, whereupon Going stated that he might have said something about the case, not knowing Moseley and the bailiff, and Freer replied that he would not have permitted anything to be said about the case. The case was not discussed. Poindexter was not in the room during the occurrence.

ing a verdict is guilty of contempt, though the juror refused to hear anything on the subject and the matter was immediately dropped. Emery v. State, 78 Neb. 547, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1124, 111 N. W. 374.

But merely saying to a juror, "You are on the jury next week" to which the juror replied that he knew he was, and it appeared that the parties then separated, does not warrant punishment for contempt of court, where there is no evidence to indicate that defendant undertook to influence him or even talk about the case in any way. Ex parte Wright, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 141 S. W. 971.

An agent of the defendant is not guilty of contempt of court merely because he ate dinner at the same table, in a crowded lunch room, with jurors impaneled to try the defendant's case, where it appeared that the jurors approached the table on their own motion at which he was already seated with one of the witnesses, because of their inability to find another convenient place. State ex rel. Kimbrell v. Clark, 134 Mo. App. 55, 114 S. W. 538.

The mere fact that the defendant's agent accepted an invitation from three of the jurors who were trying the defendant's case to play several games of pool during the noon adjournment, with the result that the jurors lost, and, according to the custom, the losers paid the proprietor the cost of the games and the winner purchased each a cigar, though an impropriety, was not such conduct as to sustain a charge of contempt of court for tampering with the jury, where it appeared that the jurors involved were men of high character and of large business interests, that he was at no time alone with the jurors, and did not discuss the case on trial, and the occurrence did not in anywise affect their action on the case. Ibid.

A defendant's agent is not guilty of contempt of court for engaging in a general conversation on the subject of hunting with several jurors, witnesses, and others, including the opposing lawyer. Ibid.

It is a contempt of court for one to make an arrangement with a juror to give a signal, after the jury has retired, to indicate whether an agreement is likely, for the purpose of enabling him to make a 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

bet on the matter of agreement of the jury to better advantage, although he said nothing about the merits of the case or how he wished the jury to decide. State v. Doty, 32 N. J. L. 403, 90 Am. Dec. 671. The court said: "The jury cannot be isolated unless the court is prompt to punish those who infringe in the slightest degree the order directing such isolation. I think public policy requires that no one should escape punishment who is found in any respect invading the privacy of the jury room."

Likewise the act of a newspaper reporter in secreting himself in the jury room, taking notes of the deliberations, and subsequently publishing his recollections of the debate of the jurors, is a contempt of court. Re Choate, 24 Abb. N. C. 430, 18 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 180, 9 N. Y. Supp. 321, affirming 8 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 1.

Obtaining information in regard to a verdict by eavesdropping while the jury were considering their verdict, and reporting the same to a newspaper, was said to be a flagrant contempt of court, and a most reprehensible invasion of the precincts of justice. Orman v. State, 24 Tex. App. 495, 6 S. W. 544.

Disrespectful remarks by an attorney to the jury while they were being impaneled, to the effect that he could not win the case in that county, so that his questioning will be very particular, and remarking in his opening address to the jury that lawyers usually close their statements of this kind with the expression that they expect a verdict at the hands of the jury, but that he did not expect more than a hung jury here against the defendant, constitute a contempt of court. Re Maury, 205 Fed. 626. The court said: "The fact that they were addressed to the jury does not lessen their objectionable character. In jury trials, the jury is part of the court, so far as the attitude of counsel towards it is concerned, and it is entitled to the same respect, consideration, and protection to which the court itself is entitled."

An unprovoked assault upon the plaintiff's attorney upon the street, because of his argument in the case, in full view of the jury room, where they had retired to deliberate upon their verdict, is a contempt

The next day, Friday, March 14th, Going was about half through with his argument for the defense when the court took a recess for the noon hour, giving cautionary instructions to the jury and the bailiff, as above stated. Going and Poindexter went to their room. Going took a drink of whisky, leaving the bottle on the table in the room. He lay down across the bed, resting and thinking about the remaining portion of his argument to be resumed at the afternoon session of the court. Poindexter was making his toilet and preparing for the noon meal. A knock at this juncture was heard at the closed door, and one of them said, "Come in;" Moseley and Freer went in. Moseley remarked that if there was any whisky in the room he was going to have it. He picked up the bottle of whisky, and stated that "a man don't have to give a man whisky; when you find it, drink it." Someone spoke about that time, and said, "You boys better shut that door." One of them closed the door. Moseley took a drink, turned to the hydrant for water, and went out. The case was not discussed. Neither Going nor Poindexter knew who was knocking at the door when one of them said, "Come in."

Moseley explained his conduct by saying of court. United States v. Barrett, 187 Fed. 378. In so holding the court said that it may also be the duty of the court to set aside the verdict in such a case, for the reason that a verdict rendered where the parties, in sight of the jury, fight over questions arising in the case, is not in accordance with that serene, pure, and impartial administration of the law.

An attempt corruptly to influence a juror in a pending case may be punished as a contempt of court under a statute restricting the power of the United States courts to punish for contempt to cases of misbehavior in the presence of the court, "or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," though the conduct complained of occurred at the defendant's place of business, a half mile distant from the courthouse. McCauley v. United State, 25 App. D. C. 404.

Concerning the grand jury.

In Harwell v. State, 10 Lea, 544, it was said: "the grand jury is a constitutional part of the court, and any illegal or corrupt interference with them in the discharge of their duties, or attempt by outside influence to control their action, would be a contempt of court, for which the offender should be punished."

But it appeared in the above case that the conversation that took place between an outsider and a grand juror on a matter that was before the grand jury for consideration was not of such a character as to indicate that defendant corruptly sought to interfere with the proceedings, as he said nothing to dissuade the juror from finding a true bill, and seemed to be inspired more by impertinent curiosity than a corrupt purpose or intentional violation of law, and it was accordingly held that the finding that the defendant was guilty of contempt of court should be reversed, as not being supported by the evidence.

Writing and sending an insulting letter to the grand jury, in relation to matters which were the subject of their investigations, in substance, accusing and denouncing many of the jurors of permitting themselves to be corruptly used by a person of wealth for the purpose of making present-ments and finding indictments against the writers' client upon matters which were the subject of litigation between the parties in the civil courts, is a contempt of court. Re Tyler, 64 Cal. 434, 1 Pac. 884.

And, in Bergh's Case, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 266, it was held that the delivery to the grand jury of a contemptuous and insulting letter constituted a contempt of court within the meaning of the statute providing for the punishment of disorderly, contemptuous, and insolent behavior committed during the sitting of the court. But a letter from the president of the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals to the grand jury, reviewing and expostulating against their action in ignoring a bill founded on a complaint for promoting a dog fight, which had been preferred by an agent of the society, ought not to be construed as designed to interrupt the administration of justice, but rather as an honest endeavor to discharge his official duty, where it appeared that he was at the time authorized by the attorney general of the state and the district attorney of the county to act as a deputy for those officers in all prosecutions within the cognizance of the society, and, as so construed, could not be considered as a contempt.

It is a contempt of court for one to attempt to induce grand jurors to indict persons not under arrest. Doan's Case, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 521.

An attempt to corruptly influence a grand juror may be punished as a contempt of court under the statute restricting the power of the United States courts to punish for contempt to cases of misbehavior in the presence of the court, "or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," though the conduct complained of occurred in a saloon several blocks distant from the courthouse. Pierce v. United States 37 App. D. C. 582, certiorari denied in 223 U. S. 732, 56 L. ed. 634, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 528.

Effect of statute making interference with jury an indictable offense.

The majority of the cases hold that the mere fact that improper interference with a juror may be indictable does not deprive he was feeling bad, and wanted a drink of whisky. He told the bailiff he "had to have it; he was tired and worn out, and was not used to being penned up like cattle." He went to the room of his own volition. Neither Poindexter nor Going had any knowledge that he was going there at that time. Moseley would not have gone to the room without the bailiff. He was in the custody of the bailiff both times that he got a drink. He had been admonished by the court not to leave the rest of the jury except with the bailiff, and when the bailiff went with him he did not feel that there was any impropriety in taking a drink in the presence of the bailiff. He had not been admonished by the court not to take a drink. Even if an opportunity had been afforded him he would not have discussed the case nor permitted anyone to discuss it in his presence.

Moseley and another juror voted for manslaughter; eight of the jurors stood for murder in the first degree, and two for murder in the second degree. There was a hung jury and a mistrial of the case.

The prosecuting attorney filed his information on his official oath before the judge of the Lawrence circuit court, accusing the petitioners Poindexter, Going, Moseley, and Freer of contempt of court, which, among other things, alleged that, "after the jury in the Benningfield Case had been impaneled, and had been put in charge of a bailiff to be kept together, and had been instructed to permit no one to talk to them, and not to talk to anyone themselves with reference to the case, and to prevent all improper influences being brought upon them, J. B. Freer, as the bailiff in charge of said jury, took one J. W. Moseley, a member of said jury, to the private room of said Poindexter and Going, attorneys of record for the defendant, where the said Moseley was given whisky to drink in an attempt to improperly influence and corrupt the said J. W. Moseley, and to have him return a verdict for defendant in the cause; that Moseley, as the juror, did unlawfully and corruptly and contemptuously go to the room of the said Poindexter and Going, the said attorneys, and there partake of whisky, in violation of the court's orders and his duty as a juror in said cause; that the said Freer, in violation of the court's instruc-a court of the power of dealing with it as a contempt of court. Re Tyler, 64 Cal. 434, 1 Pac. 884; Bradley v. State, 111 Ga. 168, 50 L.R.A. 691, 78 Am. St. Rep. 157, 36 S. E. 630; Nichols v. Superior Ct. Judge, 130 Mich. 187, 89 N. W. 691; Gandy v. State, 13 Neb. 445, 14 N. W. 143.

On this subject, Judge Seymour D. Thompson, in an article in 5 Crim. L. Mag. says (p. 155): "The power of the courts in this regard being founded in the principle of self-preservation, it does not at all go to deprive them of it that the law has provided some other mode for punishing the offender. It is quite immaterial that the offense is indictable. Courts are not obliged to trust the preservation of their dignity and authority to such weak agencies as information, indictment, and trial by jury; it may be before some other tribunal, where the success of the prosecution and the conviction of the offender may depend upon the zeal of a prosecuting witness, of the state's attorney, or upon circumstances purely accidental. Besides, the exigencies may not admit of so tardy a remedy."

And in Kirk v. United States, 112 C. C. A. 531, 192 Fed. 273, it was said in this connection: "There is every reason why the court should have the power to deal with such attempts at their very inception, so as to prevent the evil, and should not be confined to the remedy by indictment to punish such acts after the evil has been accomplished."

But in State v. Blackwell, 10 S. C. 35, it was held summary proceedings to punish as for contempt are inappropriate where the acts constituting the alleged contempt are made an offense by statute with a prescribed penalty, but that indictment is the proper remedy.

Accordingly it was held in the above case that one on trial under an indictment could not be punished by rule to show cause as for contempt for furnishing liquor to some of the jurors during the trial of his case, where such acts were made an offense by statute. The court said: "There being a formal remedy in the case, summary proceedings to punish, as for contempt, were inappropriate. Certainly no one can be punished twice for the same offense; and if the defendant should suffer penalties imposed at the discretion of the court, as for contempt, and subsequently be indicted, it would happen that either the summary proceeding must be a bar to the indictment, or the defendant must suffer accumulated penalties. In either case the object of the statute would be defeated. It would be defeated, in the one case, in the respect that it intended to substitute a certain and formal remedy for one deficient in form and the requisite safeguards. It would, in the other case, be defeated in the respect that it intended to subject the punishment imposed to a certain measure, while the punishment resulting from a judgment in contempt is not subject to such standard of measurement."

In the recent case Re Moore, 79 S. C. 399, 60 S. E. 947, the court recognized the rule announced in State v. Blackwell, as the law in that jurisdiction, but held that the statute was not broad enough to cover the offense charged against the defendants, and that therefore the court could rightfully punish for contempt.

tions, corruptly and contemptuously took the said juror Moseley to the room of the said Going and Poindexter for the purpose of having him given whisky, and otherwise to act improperly as a juror in the said cause; that each of the defendants corruptly and contemptuously violated the instructions and orders of the court given to said Freer as bailiff and to the jury of which the said Moseley was a member, which instructions were given in the presence and with the knowledge of said defendants Poindexter and Going and Freer and Moseley; that the said room referred to as the room of Poindexter and Going was a room in the Rhea Hotel in the town of Walnut Ridge, Arkansas."

Upon this information the judge made the following order: "It is therefore ordered that the clerk of this court issue a citation against the said Freer, Moseley, Poindexter, and Going, commanding them to appear and show cause on the 28th day of March, 1913, in this court why they should not be dealt with for said contempt." The citation by order of the court was entered upon the record.

The citation was served upon Moseley on the 27th of March, and upon Freer on March 28th, but was not served upon Poindexter or Going until after the return day, but was served upon each of them on March 29th. On the 2d of April, at the same term of court, the information was read by the prosecuting attorney, and the petitioners demurred there to generally for the reason that it did not state a cause of action for contempt, and, specifically, for the reason that it was not verified by oath, and not supported by affidavit. The demurrer was overruled. The evidence was heard, developing the facts substantially as above set forth, and the court entered up a fine of $50 against each of the petitioners, and adjudged that they be imprisoned in the county jail for five days. The petitioners and appellants filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they have duly prosecuted their appeal to this court. They, also, have brought up the record for review by certiorari.

The purported information failed to state facts sufficient to constitute any contempt upon the part of J. W. Moseley.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As we said in Ex parte Winn, — Ark. —, 150 S. W. 399: "No question is raised here . . . as to the form in which a review by this court is sought. Therefore we pretermitt any discussion of that question.

as the case may be treated as being either here on appeal or on writ of certiorari."

The information under the official oath of the prosecuting attorney and the citation directed by the judge to be issued by the clerk, setting forth the information showing the grounds upon which the petitioners were cited to appear and show cause why they should not be dealt with for contempt, were sufficient to give the court jurisdiction. The information made by the prosecuting attorney under his official oath was sufficient, even though not specially verified by him, to meet the requirements of the law, as an accusation setting forth the offense with which the petitioners were charged.

The citation alone, embodying the information which the court ordered to be entered upon its record, was sufficient to meet the requirements of the law, as announced by this court in Carl Lee v. State, 102 Ark. 122, 143 S. W. 909, to give the accused petitioners information of the offense with which they were charged.

The citation was duly served upon the petitioners Moseley and Freer before the return day thereof, and, although the appellants Poindexter and Going were not served before the return day, they were served before the cause was heard. All the petitioners appeared and made no objection to the service. They, therefore, cannot now complain that they were not duly served with process.

It is unnecessary to determine as to whether the information and citation stated facts sufficient to constitute a contempt of court; for the whole case was developed on evidence taken before the court, and the question now is as to whether or not the evidence was sufficient to warrant the court in finding the petitioners guilty of contempt.

Treating the testimony bearing upon the case of each petitioner separately, we are of the opinion that there was no evidence to warrant the court in adjudging Poindexter guilty of contempt. There was no testimony to warrant the inference that he was instrumental in inviting the bailiff and the juror to the room he occupied, for the purpose of furnishing liquor to influence the juror in rendering his verdict. His generosity and courtesy in sharing his room, in an emergency, with associate counsel, made him the innocent victim of the unfortunate circumstances, which afterwards developed and over which he had no control, that doubtless caused the trial judge to conclude that he was concerned, or at least acquiesced, in the improper conduct of the other petitioners.

Poindexter did not know that Going had a bottle of liquor, when he consented to 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

share the room with him. He did not know that Going had invited anyone to go to his room for the purpose of drinking liquor, much less the bailiff and the juror. When the bailiff and the juror knocked at the door of Poindexter's room and were invited to come in, he did not know before their entrance who it was that knocked, nor what their purpose was. The liquor did not belong to him. It was brought to the room without his knowledge. He did not ask them to take a drink, but simply continued making his toilet, as he was doing at the time they entered the room. Instead of inviting the bailiff and the juror to take a drink of liquor, he states that he protested, saying: "You ought not to come here; you are going to get us all into trouble." Poindexter had never taken a drink of liquor in his life, and did not approve of the use of it by others. He had nothing to do whatever with the episode, and should not be censured and held for contempt, merely because he failed to exclude the bailiff and the juror from his room; nor should he be held for contempt because he failed to report the matter to the circuit judge.

The court, from the questions propounded to Poindexter, seems to have considered that it was the duty of Poindexter to have called the matter to his attention as soon as it occurred; but we do not agree with the court, and are of the opinion that Poindexter gives a perfectly reasonable and plausible explanation of why he did not do so, which should have been accepted by the court.

Poindexter testified that had he known, when the door was closed and the knocking was heard at the door, that it was the bailiff and one of the jurors, he would not have said "Come in," and "he would not have stayed in the room, if he had had time to consider the matter; but it was one of those things that comes so suddenly that a person does not have time to make up his mind as to what is best to do." Freer was not a friend of Poindexter, and while the latter fully appreciated the fact that it was improper for Freer and the juror to be in his room under the circumstances, yet he did not feel called upon to give publicity to the matter, because he was in no way responsible for the unfortunate and embarrassing situation, and doubtless felt that if he had reported the matter to the court it might have prejudiced the juror against him, and in some way have jeopardized the interest of his client.

In our opinion the testimony thoroughly exonerates Poindexter from any contemptuous conduct, and the court erred in not so holding.

The cases of Going, Freer, and Moseley

are different from Poindexter's. The testimony of the bailiff, Freer, and the juror Moseley, shows that on the evening after the arrival of Going they met him at the head of the stairs in the hotel, and he invited them to his room to take a drink of whisky. Going testified that he wouldn't invite a juror to his room and would not give him a drink with a view of influencing him, and that he "did not know by what means Freer or Moseley knew that there was whisky in his room, unless one of them spoke to him, and he, not knowing that the bailiff or juror was connected with the court, replied that he had some whisky." Going does not deny that he extended to Freer and Moseley an invitation to take a drink of whisky in his room. He only says that he did not know that the one was the bailiff and the other a juror. He says at that time they were strangers to him. So the testimony shows that he met these men, whom he did not know personally, and of whose official character he was not then advised, and invited them to his room to take a drink of whisky, without first taking the precaution to inquire whether either one had any connection with the trial then in progress. Yet he knew the crowded condition of the hotel, and must have known that the jury in charge of the bailiff was being entertained there. On the second occasion, when the juror and the bailiff went to his room on their own motion to get a drink of whisky, he did know of their relation to the trial, yet he did not admonish them that it would be improper, on account of the connection they all had with the trial, and because of the court's instructions, for them, with or without his invitation, to drink of his liquor in his own room. In explanation of his conduct on this occasion, he says: "I would not knowingly permit a juror to come to my room; but when you have got a man's life on your hands, and a juror comes to your room, the question of what you would do or wouldn't do is a proposition that no man can say until they go through that very experience."

Now, when Senator Going left the Senate to go to the dry town of Walnut Ridge to serve as lawyer in the defense of a client who was on trial for murder, he equipped himself with what he termed a "vial" of liquor, and, being a vial, it was presumably for his own use. But on the evening after his arrival we find him prepared from that "little bottle of medicine" "to give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish and wine to those that be of heavy hearts." Both the Bailiff and the juror Moseley seem to have been in that condition. For the bailiff, after he and the juror were invited, though protesting that the juror "shouldn't go," that it was "shaky" for him to do so, nevertheless permitted him to go, and went with him and took a drink himself from Going's vial. The juror who "never refused a drink" when asked to take one, and who took it when he found it, whether asked or not said that he "felt bad, he was tired and worn out," "was not used to being penned up like cattle," and "had to have a drink," and was going after it whether the bailiff went with him or not. It should be here remarked that Going's vial contained enough liquor, as shown by his own testimony, to furnish a drink "to several persons" on two occasions, besides the bailiff and juror.

So here we have the spectacle of one of the leading lawyers for the defense in his private room, giving liquor to one of the jurors and also to the bailiff having the jury in charge. The bailiff was shown to be in sympathy with the prosecution, and it was believed that the juror Moseley at that time was also unfavorable to the defendant. But there was no verdict, and after the mistrial it was found that juror Moseley was one of two who voted for a verdict of manslaughter, while eight were for murder in the first degree, and two for murder in the second degree. The defendant, on a second trial, was convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to twenty years in the penitentiary.

It occurs to us that the maxim, Ignorantia legis neminem excusat, applies with peculiar force to one who, at the time of his alleged offense, was not only a lawyer, but also one of our lawmakers. He should be held to know the law, and also the proprieties of professional conduct, and the rules of court that must obtain in the orderly administration of the law. So far as the bailiff and the juror are concerned, they were under the positive orders of the court "to stay as nearly as you can separated from the crowds around the hotel," and "to let your conduct be free from any sort of criticism." Their conduct, therefore, can only be explained upon the theory that their appetite got control over their judgment, under the insidious influence of the bewitching announcement by Going that the whisky they were invited to drink was "sixteen or twenty years old," and when they took one drink they found it "mighty fine stuff," and "had to have" another.

Courts were created for the purpose of protecting life and property, and preserving all the sacred rights vouchsafed by the Constitution and statutes. The happiness and well-being of society and the perpetuity of our institutions depend upon the integrity, independence, conservatism, and courage of the courts in upholding the majesty of the law. The jury through all the ages since

Magna Charta has been retained as an essential part of the judicial system. It is impossible to keep the fountains of justice clean and pure, unless the jury is free from contaminating influences. Strong drink, therefore, should be neither for judges nor jurors, "lest they drink, and forget the law, and pervert righteous judgment."

What shall the penalty be? The parties have disclaimed any intentional wrongdoing, and we have reached the conclusion that such was the case. Nevertheless, the conduct under review was well calculated in the eyes of the public to bring the law and the tribunal charged with its enforcement in that jurisdiction into contempt. Hence the trial court was correct in calling petitioners Going, Freer, and Moseley to account, and in rebuking and punishing them for contempt. But as they sought in every way to purge themselves of intentional disrespect for the court, and testified that nothing was said concerning the merits of the case, we are of the opinion that justice will be done, and the dignity and authority of the court vindicated when the fine imposed is paid, without imposing the jail sentence, of which petitioners should be relieved.

It is so ordered, and the judgment otherwise affirmed.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment dismissing an action for divorce upon settlement of the parties without providing for payment of the attorneys' fees. Affirmed.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

On January 20, 1912, Mrs. Grace Macy Keefer filed in Fulton superior court her petition against D. H. Keefer and others, alleging in substance as follows: On April 11, 1906, she was married to D. H. Keefer in the city of New York. They came almost immediately to the city of Atlanta, where the defendant had previously resided. They lived together as husband and wife until a few months since, with the exception that on several occasions the plaintiff was compelled to live separate from him on account of his cruel and inhuman treatment of her, and also with the exception that the defendant several times absented himself from her without cause or reason. After her separation from him, she went back to live with him on the faith of his promise to treat her with kindness and consideration, and at all times she has been a devoted and faithful wife to him. In July, 1909, he left the plaintiff and took up his residence in the city of New York; and he now claims to be a citizen of the state of New York, though he maintains an office in the city of Atlanta and claims to be a member of the bar of that place. There is no issue of the marriage. The plaintiff has two children by a former marriage. The husband and wife are now living in a bona fide state of separation, and no action for divorce is pending in the state of Georgia. She alleges upon information and belief that since the separation the defendant has been guilty of various acts of adultery. She also alleges upon information and belief that he owns a large amount of real and personal property, of the probable value of $80,000, and has a large income. He owns certain real estate in Fulton county, of the aggregate value of at least $30,000, and also a number of shares in certain named corporations. Plaintiff owns certain property (a description of which is omitted from the record), and other than this she has no property which will produce an income, except certain shares of stock, from which she receives $335 a year. She is dependent upon the defendant for maintenance and support, and a reasonable sum for that purpose would be $250 per month. In order to maintain this action, it will be necessary to employ counsel in New York and to take numerous depositions, and a reasonable allowance for these expenses and for the employment of counsel will be $2,000. The plaintiff is fearful that the defendant may transfer his personal property and convey his real estate, in which event she will be completely at his mercy and without adequate means to compel him to provide for her support and maintenance. She prayed for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of all the property of the defendant to be found within the jurisdiction of the court; that the defendant be enjoined from transferring or encumbering such property; that the corporations named, in which he holds stock, be enjoined from transferring any of it; that she have judgment against the defendant for $250 per month, and for $2,000 for counsel fees and expenses incident to this litigation, and that the judgment be satisfied out of the property coming into the hands of the receiver, unless the defendant shall submit himself to the jurisdiction of the court, in which event a general judgment is also prayed against him, and for general relief and process.

A temporary receiver was appointed. On April 19th thereafter the defendant presented his petition to the court, alleging that he and his wife, the plaintiff in the cause, had adjusted their differences and were living together as man and wife; that since such adjustment, and after the renewed cohabitation, the plaintiff had repeatedly directed her counsel to dismiss the case, but such counsel declined to do so. The defendant prayed that an order should be passed calling upon counsel to show cause why the case should not be dismissed and the receiver discharged. An order was granted accordingly. Counsel for the plaintiff filed a response to the rule, alleging in substance as follows: During the latter part of October, 1911, the plaintiff employed them to advise and counsel with her in regard to the differences then existing between her and her husband. At that time the plaintiff and the defendant were living in a state of separation, and the defendant was residing in New York. The plaintiff decided that it was best to obtain an absolute divorce from her husband, and accordingly employed certain named lawyers of the New York bar to co-operate with these respondents in carrying out her wishes. As the defendant was at the time a resident of the state of New York, and the marriage had been performed in that state, its courts had jurisdiction of the suit for divorce, which was accordingly there filed. The plaintiff and her two children were living in Atlanta, and the property of the defendant was located in Fulton county. In order to procure temporary and permanent alimony it was necessary that the petition should be filed in the superior court of Fulton county. Accordingly these respondents, as attorneys for the plaintiff, prepared and filed such a petition, and upon it an order was passed placing the property in the hands of a receiver. They have faithfully performed all services required of them by the plaintiff, and have advised and counseled her in regard to the suit for divorce pending in New York; but they have received no compensation for their services, nor has she offered to pay them therefor. On February 6, 1912, the plaintiff wrote from New York to her counsel, directing them to dismiss her petition, but declined to state to them at whose cost the proceeding should be dismissed, and refused to make any provision for their compensation. Two thousand dollars is a reasonable amount to be allowed to them as plaintiff's attorneys. The report of the receiver shows that he has abundant property of the defendant in his possession with which to pay all court costs and counsel fees. They prayed that they be made parties plaintiff in the action; that they be allowed $2,000 as counsel fees, to be recovered out of the property in the hands of the receiver; that the receiver's fees and expenses and all court costs be paid out of the property in his hands; and that the prayer of the petition filed by the defendant be denied.

Upon the hearing of the petition for dismissal of the action and the response thereto, the presiding judge passed this order: "It having been admitted in open court that Mrs. Grace Macy Keefer has, situated in Fulton county, this state, property of the value of $20,000, and other valuable property not situated in the state of Georgia, the value of which is not stated, it is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged that the petition to dismiss said cause be and the same is hereby granted, and said case is hereby dismissed." To this order the counsel of the plaintiff excepted. The judge also entered judgment against the plaintiff for the court costs and receiver's fee.

Messrs. Rosser & Brandon for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The argument in this case has taken a wide range. It has included, among other things, a discussion of the marital right of the husband as to the wife's property, under the common law, its effect in leaving her practically helpless to bring a divorce suit against her husband or defend one brought by him, unless "suit money" were allowed her, the consequent treating of her attorneys' fees in such cases as in the nature of necessities, where the attorney in good faith and on probable cause prosecuted or defended a wife's divorce suit with her husband, the recognition of that theory in this state (Sprayberry v. Merk, 30 Ga. 81, 76 Am. Dec. 637, decided in 1860, distinguished from a case involving other facts in Glenn v. Hill, 50 Ga. 94, decided in 1873), the question of the effect of the adoption of the Code, which first became of force in 1863, and contained express provisions in regard to allowing temporary alimony and attorneys' fees pendente lite, and of the enactment of what is commonly called the married woman's act of 1866, preserving her separate property to her. We do not deem it necessary to follow counsel over the entire field covered by their arguments. The case before us is not a suit by the attorneys for the wife against either her or her husband, after the termination of the alimony suit between them; and it would be ranging into the by-paths of obiter dictum to determine what might be ruled in such an action. Here the wife sued her husband for permanent alimony, and prayed for the allowance of temporary alimony and attorneys' fees, under the statute; and incidentally a receiver was prayed. The parties settled their differences and desired to dismiss the case. The wife's attorneys objected, so far as it affected the allowance of attorneys' fees, and prayed to be made parties, and to have fees awarded to them in that case.

Upon an application for the allowance of temporary alimony, including counsel fees, pending suit for divorce, or permanent alimony, such allowance is not a matter of arbitrary right, under our statutes, but a matter to be determined by the use of a sound discretion applied to the facts of the case, the causes of the separation, and the circumstances of the parties. Civ. Code, §§ 2976, 2977, 2979; Parks v. Parks, 126 Ga. 437, 55 S. E. 176. In the opinion in the Parks Case the expression was used that the allowance of both alimony and counsel fees, or the allowance of one and the disallowance of the other, is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the judge, after examination into the causes of the separation and the circumstances of the parties. This did not mean that the two things were wholly distinct, with the right to apply for one in the client and the other in the attorney, but that, upon such an application by the wife, the judge might allow a sum for her support and also for counsel fees, one or both, or neither, if the evidence so authorized. This is made evident by considering that opinion in the light of the facts involved, and in connection with other decisions of this court and the language of the statute itself. Civ. Code § 2976; Sweat v. Sweat, 123 Ga. 801, 51 S. E. 716; Hughes v. Hughes, 133 Ga. 187, 65 S. E. 404. It has been said that the application for temporary alimony, including attorneys' fees, should be made and determined pendente lite, but that a judgment for such fees based upon a verdict therefor was not a nullity. Van Dyke v. Van Dyke, 125 Ga. 492, 54 S. E. 537. In Weaver v. Weaver, 33 Ga. 172, on the hearing of an application therefor, an order was passed directing a husband to pay into court a certain amount to compensate counsel who represented his wife, and also an amount for the maintenance of the wife. After the case had been prepared, but before trial, it was dismissed. It was held that this operated to rescind the order as to the alimony proper allowed to the wife, but not as to the fees of counsel. It was said: "We see no reason for compelling counsel to resort to an independent action when his fees have been already adjudged." In view of this ruling, it was held in Roberts v. Roberts, 115 Ga. 259, 90 Am. St. Rep. 108, 41 S. E. 616, that when an application was made for the grant of alimony and attorneys' fees, counsel for the applicant had such a pecuniary interest in the result that, under our statute, a judge related to him within the fourth degree was disqualified from presiding. What was said in the opinion must be considered in connection with the question before the court.

We are aware that there is some conflict of authority as to whether a court may refuse to dismiss a divorce case without the payment of attorneys' fees to the wife's attorney, or whether an order for such fees may be granted before or in connection with the dismissal. It is unnecessary to discuss the basis of such decisions, or the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

English practice of taxing attorneys' fees as costs. We think the decisions which rule that counsel for the wife cannot prolong such a suit against the wishes of their client are the sounder and more applicable to the statutory procedure in this state for obtaining temporary alimony, including counsel fees, as well as more in accord with public policy. There is no law authorizing attorneys, pending a suit for divorce or permanent alimony, to make application for the allowance of temporary alimony. Such allowance is not a matter of course, but a matter to be determined upon a consideration of the facts. After a wife has condoned the misconduct alleged against the husband, and the two have resumed their former relations, and when they desire to stop the legal controversy between them, it would be against sound public policy to say that they could not do so, but must continue their case involuntarily, and display the family skeleton and parade their forgiven grievances, so as to aid the judge to determine whether, in his discretion, he would have granted alimony, and would still award counsel fees.

This public policy in favor of permitting a settlement of matrimonial differences has been declared in other states. In Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826, the court was discussing a contract by a married woman made with her solicitor, in advance of a decree for divorce, to pay to him one-half of what should be awarded to her as alimony. Champlin, J., said: "Public policy is interested in maintaining the family relation. The interests of society require that those relations shall not be lightly severed, and that families shall not be broken up for inadequate causes or from unworthy motives; and where differences have arisen which threaten disruption, public welfare and the good of society demand a reconciliation, if practicable or possible. Contracts like the one in question tend directly to prevent such reconciliation, and, if legal and valid, tend directly to bring around alienation of husband and wife, by offering a strong inducement, amounting to a premium, to induce and advise the dissolution of the marriage ties as a method of obtaining relief from real or fancied grievances which otherwise would pass unnoticed." In Hillman v. Hillman, 42 Wash. 595, 114 Am. St. Rep. 135, 85 Pac. 61, it was held that a wife could enter into a stipulation for the dismissal of her action for divorce and a pendente lite application for temporary alimony without the consent of her attorneys, and the court could not allow them to intervene in the action, and thereupon enter a judgment in their favor for their fees and for costs advanced by them. Fullerton, J., said: "It is the policy of the law to encourage husband and wife to compromise and settle between themselves their domestic troubles, and to discourage actions for divorce. Actions for divorce, therefore, which both parties desire dismissed, should not be kept alive merely to settle the claims of counsel for attorneys' fees." In Reynolds v. Reynolds, 67 Cal. 176, 7 Pac. 480, it was held that if, pending an action for divorce, the parties thereto admit a condonation and ask that the action be dismissed, the court should order a dismissal, and could not thereafter enter judgment against the husband for the counsel fees of the wife. Myrick, J., tersely said: "When the husband and wife forgave and were forgiven, and abandoned their criminalities and recriminations, the attorneys had but to gather up their briefs and retire." See also Petersen v. Petersen, 76 Neb. 282, 124 Am. St. Rep. 812, 107 N. W. 391; Stover v. Stover, 7 Idaho, 185, 61 Pac. 462; Carden v. Carden, — Tenn. —, 37 S. W. 1022; McCulloch v. Murphy, 45 Ill. 256, 258.

It may be further mentioned that a failure to pay alimony is enforceable by attachment, and if counsel fees awarded in such an application may be enforced in the same way, we might have the spectacle of a forgiving wife being unwillingly compelled to proceed to obtain a judgment and then enforce it by putting her repentant husband in jail for nonpayment of her attorneys' fees. The exact point as to public policy has not been decided in Georgia. In Chastain v. Lumpkin & Wright, 134 Ga. 219, 67 S. E. 818, after a petition by a wife for divorce and for permanent and temporary alimony had been filed, but before it had been served, the parties "resumed their relations to each other as husband and wife," and the plaintiff notified her counsel and the sheriff to proceed no further in the case. It was held that her counsel could not thereafter press the case, over her protest, by having service perfected and obtaining judgment for fees. Had the attorneys in the present case, after service had been perfected, such a lien as gave them a right to prosecute the suit of the wife in spite of her desire to dismiss it? We think not. By Civil Code, § 3364, subs. 2 (the only clause here relevant), an attorney is given a lien upon "all suits, judgments, and decrees for money;" and it is declared that no person shall be at liberty to satisfy such suit, judgment, or decree until the lien of the attorney for his fees is fully satisfied, and further that attorneys shall have the same right and power over such suits, judgments, or decrees, to enforce their liens, "as their clients had or may have for the amount due them thereon." While the language is somewhat broad, we think it was not intended to cover an application for alimony and counsel fees. It refers to suits "for money," and again to "the amounts due" the clients. Applications for alimony are in several respects quite dissimilar from the ordinary suits for money. An order or judgment for the payment of alimony may be enforced by imprisonment, though the Constitution prohibits imprisonment for debt. Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 216; Lewis v. Lewis, 80 Ga. 706, 12 Am. St. Rep. 281, 6 S. E. 918. A decree granting alimony is not a debt "founded on a contract," within the meaning of a statute providing for relief from such debts by a discharge in insolvency. Noyes v. Hubbard, 64 Vt. 302, 15 L.R.A. 394, 33 Am. St. Rep. 928, 23 Atl. 727. Alimony has been held not to be assignable in advance of its allowance. Jordan v. Westerman, 62 Mich. 170, 4 Am. St. Rep. 836, 28 N. W. 826, supra. Its basis is a duty on the part of the husband, rather than an indebtedness. These illustrations will serve to show that such an action (at least before a judgment fixing a sum as an allowance) is not a suit "for money," or one for an "amount due" a client, within the meaning of the statute regulating attorneys' liens. Certainly the legislature never contemplated that an attorney could insist on continuing to prosecute a wife's suit for divorce after she had condoned the alleged offense, and resumed cohabitation with her husband, and no longer desired a divorce.

The same reason of public policy applies to the cessation of a suit for alimony based on the fact that the husband and wife were living separate at the time of its commencement. The mere addition of a prayer for a receiver to hold the property of the husband to be found within the jurisdiction, as a means of securing payment of such amount of alimony as might be awarded, and the appointment of a temporary receiver, would not change the nature of the action. The situation of the attorneys in this case is not so unfortunate as it might seem at a casual glance. It appears that their client and her husband are both amply solvent, and the ruling here made only goes to the extent of holding that the attorneys cannot intervene in this suit,—or obtain a judgment for fees therein, or prevent its dismissal.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

DAVID SAUL KLAFTER, Appt.,
v.
STATE BOARD OF EXAMINERS OF ARCHITECTS.

(259 Ill. 15, 102 N. E. 193.)

License — architect — revocation — trial.

1. The action of a judicial tribunal is not necessary to the revocation of the license of an architect.

Constitutional law — departments of government — judicial power — revocation of license.

2. The revocation of the license of an architect for cause by a state board is not an exercise of judicial power.

Legislature — delegation of power — discretion of state board.

3. There is no delegation of power in conferring upon a state board authority to revoke the license of an architect for gross incompetency or recklessness in the construction of a building.

Statute — revocation of license — uncertainty.

4. A statute authorizing the revocation of an architect's license for gross incompetency or recklessness in the construction of buildings is not void for uncertainty.

License — revocation — sufficiency of charge.

5. If a charge against an architect, under a statute permitting revocation of his license for gross incompetency or recklessness in the construction of buildings, is not sufficiently specific to permit him to prepare properly his defense, it is the duty of the board of examiners, upon his request, to require the charge to be made more specific.

(June 18, 1913.)

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Superior Court for Cook County dismissing a bill filed to enjoin defendants from proceeding with complainant's trial upon charges for the revocation of his license as an architect. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. LeBosky & Plumb and W. A. Bowles for appellant.

Mr. Henry R. Baldwin, with Messrs. P. J. Lucey, Attorney General, and Charles E. Pope, for appellee.

Note.—Except KLAFTER v. STATE EXAMINERS, no case has been found relating to revocation of architect's license. For regulation of architects, see the note to People ex rel. Laist v. Lower, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1203.

Generally as to revocation of license from public, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, License, §§ 17 and 18.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a bill filed by appellant in the superior court of Cook county, praying for an injunction restraining the state board of examiners of architects from proceeding with his trial upon a citation issued by said board and served upon him, requiring him to appear in open public trial on certain charges on January 24, 1913. An answer was filed, and after a hearing the chancellor dismissed the bill for want of equity, at complainant's costs. The appeal has been brought direct to this court, on the ground that constitutional questions are involved.

The bill alleged that appellant had been engaged in the practice of architecture as a profession in Illinois under a license issued to him in 1907 by said board of examiners and yearly renewals thereof; that § 10 of the act providing for the licensing of architects and regulating the practice of architecture as a profession, in force July 1, 1897, as amended, is void, especially that part which provides that "any license so granted may be revoked by unanimous vote of the state board of examiners of architects for gross incompetency or recklessness in the construction of buildings, or for dishonest practices on the part of the holder thereof," etc. Hurd's Stat. 1911, p. 87.

Counsel contend that appellant's right, as a licensed architect, to practise his profession is inherent, protected by the Constitutions of this state and of the United States, and that he cannot be deprived of this right, except by judicial proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction; that the state board of examiners of architects under said act is not a judicial body. They further argue that the above provision of § 10 of the act is void for uncertainty. Practically every argument urged by counsel on these questions has been passed on, adversely to their contentions by this court, in People v. Apfelbaum, 251 Ill. 18, 95 N. E. 995, where this court held constitutional a provision of the medical practice act authorizing the state board of health to refuse or to revoke licenses to practise medicine. Counsel, however, state that they do not seek to have that opinion overruled, but think it can be fairly distinguished, both on the law and the facts, from the case now under consideration. We do not agree with them on either of these points.

It is conceded that this court, in People ex rel. Laist v. Lower, 251 Ill. 527, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1203, 96 N. E. 346, has held this statute is not in violation of the state or Federal Constitution as to due process of law, in requiring an examination and license before one can practise architecture in this state; but it is argued that the authority to require an examination to obtain a license is entirely different from depriving one of that right after he has been duly licensed; that the latter act is a penalty; and that one cannot be deprived of his right to follow his profession, after he has been once duly licensed, other than by a judgment of forfeiture by a judicial tribunal. The right of the state to provide for the general welfare of its people by prescribing such regulations as will secure or tend to secure them against the consequences of ignorance and incapacity, and to that end to exact in many pursuits and professions a certain degree of skill and learning, is upheld by the great weight of authority as an exercise of the police power of the state. Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; People v. Evans, 247 Ill. 547, 93 N. E. 388.

This court held in People v. Apfelbaum, supra, that there was no distinction between granting a license and revoking one already granted; that each was the exercise of the police power; that the object in both cases was to exclude an incompetent or unworthy person from the practice of his profession. See also to the same effect, State ex rel. Chapman v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387, 26 N. W. 123; Meffert v. State Bd. of Medical Registration (Meffert v. Packer) 66 Kan. 710, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 811, 72 Pac. 247, affirmed in 195 U. S. 625, 49 L. ed. 350, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 790. A license is not revoked as a punishment, but in the exercise of the state's discretion, under its police power, as to whether the person holding the license is properly qualified to continue in his profession. Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 42 L. ed. 1002, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573.

Appellant's argument that due process of law in revoking a license must necessarily consist of judicial proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be sustained. This court said in People v. Apfelbaum, supra, on page 27: "Due process of law does not necessarily imply judicial proceedings. Orderly proceedings according to established rules which do not violate fundamental right must be observed, but there is no vested right in any particular remedy or form of proceeding. A general law, administered in its regular course according to the form of procedure suitable and proper to the nature of the case, conformable to the fundamental rules of right and affecting all persons alike, is due process." The authorities in other jurisdictions are in accord with this holding. "Due process is not necessarily judicial process." Reetz v. Michigan, 188 U. S. 505, 47 L. ed. 563, 23 Sup. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ct. Rep. 390. "Any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power, in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves these principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law." Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292. "Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 506. "Due process of law" is equivalent to "the law of the land." The purpose of the constitutional requirement as to due process of law is to protect every person in his personal and property rights against the arbitrary action of any person or authority.

A revocation by the state board of examiners of architects of appellant's license would not be the exercise by that body of judicial power. The authority to ascertain facts and apply the law to the facts when ascertained often devolves upon other departments of government than the judiciary. Judgment and discretion as required often of every public official. It would be difficult to draw the precise line separating the judicial from other departments of government. France v. State, 57 Ohio St. 1, 47 N. E. 1041. No one, so far as we are aware, has ever attempted it. Official duties are, in general, classed under three heads: Executive, legislative, and judicial. Such classification is not exact, and the duties of many officers cannot be exclusively arranged under any of these three heads. 2 Cooley, Torts, 3d ed. 762. Judicial power does not apply to cases where judgment is exercised as incident to the execution of ministerial power. Owners of Lands v. People, 113 Ill. 296. The granting or revocation of a license by a state board similar to the one here in question was held by this court in People v. Apfelbaum, supra, not to be the exercise of judicial power, as that term is understood in reference to the distribution of the powers of government. See, to the same effect, among many other authorities: People ex rel. Sheppard v. Illinois State Dental Examiners, 110 Ill. 180; State ex rel. Chapman v. State Medical Examiners, 34 Minn. 387, 26 N. W. 123; Kettles v. People, 221 Ill. 221, 77 N. E. 472; Douglas v. People, 225 Ill. 536, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1116, 116 Am. St. Rep. 162, 80 N. E. 341; Aurora v. Schoeberlein, 230 Ill. 496, 82 N. E. 860; People ex rel. Miller v.

The further argument is made that the statute is void for uncertainty, in that it does not define what is meant by "gross incompetency or recklessness in the construction of buildings," the portion of the statute on which the charge against appellant was founded. It is most earnestly insisted that such a charge is so uncertain as to be void, as it does not advise him so that he can prepare for his defense. This argument finds support in certain decisions of the California and Kentucky courts. The weight of authority, however, in other jurisdictions is in favor of the validity of statutes with wording similar to the one here in question. See review of authorities in note to Hewitt v. State Medical Examiners, 7 Ann. Cas. 750. The argument on this point seems to be based partially on the ground that the legislature cannot delegate power to the state board of examiners of architects. We do not think the power to legislate is conferred by this act upon that board. "The true distinction is between the delegation of power to make the law, which involves a discretion as to what the law shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law." Sutherland, Stat. Const. § 68; People ex rel. Lockwood & S. Co. v. Grand Trunk Western R. Co. 232 Ill. 292, 83 N. E. 839; State v. Briggs, 45 Or. 366, 77 Pac. 750, 78 Pac. 361, 2 Ann. Cas. 424, and note; Spiegler v. Chicago, 216 Ill. 114, 74 N. E. 718. This court, in People v. Apfelbaum, supra, construed a statute practically as general in its wording as not void for uncertainty. This court has held that under the city civil service law it was not required, in advance, to specify in written rules every case which would be deemed cause for removal. Joyce v. Chicago, 216 Ill. 466, 75 N. E. 184; Kammann v. Chicago, 222 Ill. 63, 78 N. E. 16. In People ex rel. Sheppard v. Illinois State Dental Examiners, 110 Ill. 180, we held that the meaning of the word "reputable" was not so uncertain as to make the law void; that whether a dental college was reputable was a question of fact to be decided by the board. In People use of State Bd. of Health v. McCoy, 125 Ill. 289, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

17 N. E. 786, in construing a statute regulating the practice of medicine, it was held that the words, "unprofessional or dishonorable conduct," must be construed to mean some act or conduct that would, in the common judgment, be deemed unprofessional or dishonorable. Manifestly the court assumed that those words were not so general as to make the statute void for uncertainty. In Block v. Chicago, 239 Ill. 251, page 263, 130 Am. St. Rep. 219, 87 N. E. 1011, it was argued that an ordinance which provided that the chief of police could prohibit the exhibition of any obscene or immoral picture fixed no standard by which the chief of police could act. The court said (p. 263): "Manifestly it would be impossible to specify in an ordinance every picture or particular variety of picture which would be considered immoral or obscene, and no definition could be formulated which would afford a better standard than the words of the ordinance." The same reasoning applies to the words "gross incompetency or recklessness in the construction of buildings." These words clearly imply that the license shall not be revoked for trivial causes. What actions or conduct of an architect will bring him within the meaning of these words must be left to the sound discretion of the state board. It must be some act or conduct that in the common judgment would be considered grossly incompetent or reckless. It is a practical impossibility to set out in a statute, in detail, every act which would justify the revocation of a license. The requirements of the statute can only be stated in general terms, and a reasonable discretion reposed in the officials charged with its enforcement. The statute in question is not void for uncertainty.

The action of the board in revoking a license must not be arbitrary. It must be for cause only, and based upon evidence submitted. People use of State Bd. of Health v. McCoy, supra; People v. Apfelbaum, 251 Ill. 18, 95 N. E. 995. The statute here requires twenty days' notice to the holder of the license before it is revoked, as to the character of the charge and the time and place of meeting of the board, and he is also entitled to subpoena witnesses and be heard in person or by counsel. If the charge against the holder of a license, on a hearing such as this, is not sufficiently specific to permit him to prepare properly his defense, it is the duty of the board of examiners, on request of the holder of the license or his counsel, to require the charge to be made more specific. If the discretionary power of the board is exercised with manifest injustice, the courts will interfere when it is clearly shown that the discretion has been abused. Illinois State Dental Examiners v. People, 123 Ill. 227, 13 N. E. 201; People ex rel. Raster v. Healy, 230 Ill. 280, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 603, 82 N. E. 599.

Appellant further contends that § 10 is unconstitutional, in that it gives the state board discretion as to whether a new license shall be issued to one whose license has been revoked. That question is not involved in this case, as appellant has no grievance in this respect. Even if, in this particular, the provision could be regarded as unconstitutional, we would not hold the entire act for that reason void. Williams v. People, 121 Ill. 84, 11 N. E. 881; Kettles v. People, 221 Ill. 221, 77 N. E. 472; Brand v. Brand, 252 Ill. 134, 96 N. E. 918. We therefore do not find it necessary to discuss that question.

No reasons have been suggested, and none have occurred to us, which require us to hold that any of the provisions of the statute questioned in this proceeding are in violation of either the state or Federal Constitution. The decree of the Superior Court will therefore be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

ELVINGTON P. SPINNEY, Exr., etc., of Charles Oscar Littlefield,

v.

LAURA J. EATON et al.

(— Me. —, 87 Atl. 378.)

Will — demonstrative legacy — shares of stock.

Where a man, having the bulk of his property invested in stock of a certain corporation, gives by will a certain number of shares of the stock to each of his sisters and then divides the remainder of his property between his wife and son, the gift to the sisters will be construed as demonstrative legacies, so that in case he transforms the stock into bonds of the corporation they will not lapse; at least, where holding the legacies to be specific would result in diminishing the interest of the son, which the testator had carefully guarded.

Note. — As to whether a bequest of stocks or bonds is general, demonstrative, or specific, see note to Re Snyder, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49. And see also the later case of Gardner v. McNeal, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 553.

The effect of a change in the subject-matter or substitution of other property as an ademption of a specific legacy or devise is treated in the note to Gardner v. McNeal, supra.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for York County for the determination by the full court of questions arising in a suit for the construction of the will of Charles Oscar Littlefield, deceased. Decree construing will.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. P. Spinney for plaintiff.

Hanson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity brought by the executor to obtain a judicial construction of the will of Charles Oscar Littlefield, who died September 29, 1911, leaving a widow, a son, and three sisters. The will is dated March 10, 1911.

At the date of the will the testator was the owner of 1,830 shares of the preferred stock of the J. L. Prescott Company, a corporation having a place of business at Passaic, New Jersey, each of the par value of $100.

The questions submitted for determination arise under the first three paragraphs of the will and the codicil, which are as follows:

"First: I give and bequeath to my sister, Laura J. Eaton of said Wells, wife of Joseph D. Eaton, 50 shares of my preferred stock in the J. L. Prescott Company, a corporation duly created by law and having its place of business at Passaic, New Jersey, and nothing more.

"Second: I give and bequeath to my sister, Alice Littlefield Gray, of said Wells, wife of Edward Gray, 50 shares of my preferred stock in the said J. L. Prescott Company, and nothing more.

"Third: I give, devise, and bequeath to my sister, Julia F. Littlefield, of said Wells, 100 shares of my preferred stock in the said J. L. Prescott Company, and also a home on my homestead farm in said Wells as long as she remains single and unmarried, and if she never marries, said home on my homestead farm to continue during her natural life."

The codicil, which was dated March 15, 1911, provides that, "whereas by my said will I gave and bequeathed to my sister, Julia F. Littlefield, in paragraph 'third' of my said will, 100 shares of my preferred stock in the J. L. Prescott Company, and whereas since the date of my said will and the date of this codicil, to wit, on the 13th day of March, I have in my lifetime transferred to my said sister, Julia F. Littlefield, 100 shares of my preferred stock in the said J. L. Prescott Company, as witnessed by certificate of stock No. 4, dated March 13, 1911; and whereas I desire to make a bequest to my niece, Elva L. Gray, of said Wells, out of the property given my wife and son by paragraph 'seventh' of my said will, now I do hereby make, publish, and declare this my codicil to my last will and testament, to be annexed to and taken and allowed as a part thereof.

"First: I do revoke the bequest, made in paragraph 'third' of my said will, of said 100 shares of my preferred stock in said J. L. Prescott Company to my sister, Julia F. Littlefield, for the reason above stated, but the remaining part of said paragraph 'third' of my said will, relating to the home for my said sister, I leave and give to her as stated therein.

"Second: I give and bequeath to my niece, Elva L. Gray, above named, $1,000."

On July 1, 1911, the testator exchanged his 1,730 shares of preferred stock in the J. L. Prescott Company for 173 first mortgage bonds of the same company, the denomination and value of each bond being $1,000, and bearing date July 1, 1911. On the same day Julia F. Littlefield exchanged her 100 shares of preferred stock for 10 bonds of the same issue.

Six questions are propounded to the court, three of which are upon the character of the bequests in paragraphs first and second, relating to the fifty shares to each of the sisters named therein, viz.: (1) Are the legacies specific? (2) General, without any attempt at a definite description? (3) Demonstrative, payable out of a specific fund primarily, or out of the general estate if the fund does not exist and no such assets belong to said estate? (4) Have the two legacies been adeemed or lost? Questions 5 and 6 ask for direction as to payment, and interest to be allowed if the legatees are entitled to payment in money under said paragraphs.

The answer determining the character of the legacies involves not merely a technical question depending for its solution solely upon the precise language of the bequest, but a substantial inquiry respecting the intention of the testator as shown by the terms of the particular legacy, examined in connection with all the other provisions of the will. Stilphen's Appeal, 100 Me. 146, 60 Atl. 888, 4 Ann. Cas. 158.

After bequeathing the 200 shares of preferred stock by paragraphs 1, 2, and 3, the testator says in paragraph "fifth," All the rest, residue, and remainder of my shares of the preferred stock in the said J. L. Prescott Company which have not been disposed of by this will, I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Olive M. Littlefield, and my son, Roland Smith Littlefield, in the following shares, amounts, and proportions, to wit: one third thereof to my said wife, and two thirds thereof to my said son."

This paragraph was not changed by or referred to in the codicil. Paragraph 7 of the will reads: "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, of every name and nature, wherever found or situate, not already disposed of, I give, devise, and bequeath in equal shares and amounts to my said wife and son, to them and their assigns forever."

Under the last-named clause the inventory shows about $12,000 to be distributed.

What, then, was the intention of the testator? His intention must control the disposition of his property, and it is the duty of the court to construe the will so as to carry out the general purposes of the testator. Demeritt v. Young, 72 N. H. 202, 55 Atl. 1047.

We think the testator intended to do what the language of paragraphs 1 and 2 plainly indicates, viz., to give to each of his married sisters 50 shares of preferred stock from the 1,830 shares owned by him.

"A specific legacy is a bequest of a specified part of the testator's estate which is so distinguished. A general or demonstrative legacy is not adeemed by the sale or change of the fund; but generally a specific legacy is revoked by a sale or change of form of the thing bequeathed. Courts are averse to construing legacies to be specific, and will not unless it be clear that the testator so intended."

"A legacy is general when it is so given as not to amount to a bequest of a particular thing, or money of the testator, as distinguished from all others of the same kind.

"If made payable primarily out of a specified fund, it is called demonstrative."

Smith's Appeal, 103 Pa. 559.

A demonstrative legacy is a bequest of a certain sum of money, stock, or the like, payable out of a particular fund or security, and partakes of the nature of a general legacy by bequeathing a specified amount, and also of the nature of a specific legacy by pointing out the fund from which the payment is to be made; but differs from a specific legacy in this particular: that, if the fund pointed out for the payment of the legacy fails, resort may be had to the general assets of the estate. Crawford v. McCarthy, 159 N. Y. 514, 54 N. E. 277, citing Willard, Eq. Jur. 502, 503; 2 Bouvier's Law Dict. Rawle's ed. 161, and authorities there cited; Stilphen's Appeal, supra.

In this case the bequests under consideration are in the nature of a general legacy, and the fund out of which the payment is to be made is pointed out. We think, therefore, they are demonstrative legacies.

Have the legacies been adeemed? A careful reading of the will and codicil leads to but one conclusion as to this question. The testator evidently desired to place the stock of his unmarried sister where she would have control of the same from that moment, and further desired to give his niece $1,000. These purposes were stated as the reasons for making the codicil. There is no expression of desire or intent to change paragraphs 1 and 2, or in any manner to affect their force, and there is no ground for an inference of such intent. On the contrary, if the change of securities worked an ademption of the two legacies, whether so intended by the testator or not, then his entire will would be affected, his general purpose frustrated, and the interest of the son, so carefully guarded in the will, would be lessened substantially. Under such construction the provision for distribution of the stock, one third to the wife and two thirds to the son, would be changed to an equal division between them because of such ademption, a result never intended by the testator.

It is apparent that at the date of the codicil the testator had not considered the subject of exchange of stock for bonds, and the exchange taking place three months and fifteen days thereafter affords ample reason for the conclusion that such change was made because the corporation had of its own motion changed the form of its securities, and the testator, in common with other stockholders, assented to the change. The stock was exchanged, not sold, and the security it represented is substantially the same as at the date of the will. It has not lost its identity. It represents the same property, is of the same value substantially, and the bonds in a varied form constitute the same fund.

In Ford v. Ford, 23 N. H. 212, a testator, having made a specific bequest of all notes of hand which were then payable to him, and then holding four notes signed by two persons, afterwards, before his death, released one of the signers, and took new notes for the debt from the other signer, secured by a mortgage. Held, that there was no ademption of the legacy. See also Gardner v. Gardner, 72 N. H. 257, 56 Atl. 316, and cases cited.

We are therefore of the opinion, and so advise the executor, that there has been no ademption of the legacies mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2, and that under the will of the testator, Laura J. Eaton and Alice Littlefield Gray are each entitled to $5,000, the admitted value of the original preferred stock severally bequeathed to them, payable in bonds of the J. L. Prescott Company, together with the interest thereon after September 29, 1911.

Bill sustained. Decree in accordance with this opinion.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

ANNIE J. McCANN, Appt.,

v.

SUPREME CONCLAVE, IMPROVED ORDER HEPTASOPHS.

(119 Md. 655, 87 Atl. 383.)

Insurance — mutual benefit — acquiescence in refusal to receive dues — effect.

1. The beneficiary of a mutual benefit certificate cannot insist upon an estoppel against the order because of refusal to accept the dues of a member who is ill, if, upon the representative of the lodge stating that he had information that the member is not fit to be such and should be expelled, and that unless he is permitted to lapse out by nonpayment of dues, he will take the matter before the order and secure the expulsion, he acquiesces in the suggestion without further attempt to pay dues.

Same — insanity of member — effect on nonpayment of dues.

2. That a member of a mutual benefit society is insane does not relieve him of the consequences of neglect to pay dues if there is no provision to that effect in the rules of the order.

Same — sick benefits — application in payment of dues.

3. A local branch of a mutual benefit insurance company which has provided for sick benefits for which the general order has assumed no responsibility has no authority to apply an amount due a member for such benefits in payment of an assessment against him, so as to prevent his Note. — Effect of incapacitating illness or insanity on failure to pay insurance premium when due.

The early cases upon the question here considered are gathered in the note appended to Hipp v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 319.

In accord with the cases in the earlier note it has been held in a subsequent case that the insanity of a member of a mutual benefit association at the time dues and assessments are payable will not excuse their nonpayment, or operate so as to keep his insurance certificate in force during the continuance of his disability. Scheiber v. Protected Home Circle, 146 Ill. App. 574. The court said: "Insanity does not relieve the insured from any obligation imposed by the terms of his insurance certificate, with the sole exception of personal attendance in compliance with requisite conditions, that may be done by another for him."

And in Brotherhood of R. Trainmen v. Dee, 101 Tex. 597, 111 S. W. 396, it was held that the fact that a member of a mutual benefit association was sick and unconscious at the time an assessment was due would not prevent a forfeiture because of its nonpayment.

certificate from lapsing for nonpayment of dues, where the rules of the order require his dues to be apportioned between the death benefit fund and the general fund of the order.

(February 15, 1913.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Baltimore City Court in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a benefit certificate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. Parker Baker and George E. Robinson, for appellant:

The alleged suspension of McCann for nonpayment of December, 1910 (monthly), payment was void.

Langnecker v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 111 Wis. 279, 55 L.R.A. 188, 87 Am. St. Rep. 860, 87 N. W. 293; Supreme Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Zuhlke, 30 Ill. App. 98.

It is not necessary to appeal or apply for reinstatement from a void suspension or expulsion.

After one refusal to accept the premium, the insured is not bound to make formal tenders of subsequent premiums on each pay day.

Messrs. Olin Bryan, Albert C. Tolson, and John C. Tolson, for appellee:

There was no legal tender in December, 1910, of McCann's dues and assessments.

If there was a legal tender of the December assessment Joseph A. McCann, Jr., was suspended, ipso facto, on midnight of January 31, 1911, for nonpayment of the January assessment, and was therefore under suspension at time of his death, in February, 1911.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the widow of Joseph A. McCann, Jr., of Baltimore city, on a benefit certificate issued to him on the 25th of May, 1908, by the Supreme Conclave, Improved Order Heptasophs, of Baltimore city. This certificate, which is set out in the declaration, after reciting that it "is issued to Bro. Joseph A. McCann, Jr., a member of Eutaw Conclave, No. 276, Improved Order Heptasophs, located at Baltimore, Maryland, upon evidence received from said conclave that he is a first-rate contributor to the benefit fund of this order, and upon the express condition that the statements made by him in his application for membership in said conclave, and the statements certified by him to the medical examiner, both of which are filed in the supreme secretary's office, be made a part of this contract, and, upon condition that the said member complies with, is bound by, and subject to all and every provision of the laws, rules, and regulations now governing said conclave and fund," etc., then provides: "These conditions being complied with, the Supreme Conclave, Improved Order Heptasophs, hereby promises and binds itself to pay out of its benefit fund to wife Annie J. McCann within sixty days from receipt of satisfactory proof of death, the sum of $1,000 not more than the amount of one assessment in accordance with and under the provisions of the laws governing said fund, upon satisfactory evidence of the death of said member, and upon the surrender of this certificate, provided that said member is in good standing in this order at the time of his death. If death occurs within one year from date of admission, only 50 per centum of said sum shall be paid, if within two years only 60 per centum of said sum shall be paid, if within three years only 80 per centum of said sum shall be paid, provided death was not caused by suicide." The narr. further alleges: "That the said Joseph A. McCann, Jr., faithfully complied with and performed all and singular the agreements, obligations, and undertakings of the said benefit certificate on his part to be kept and performed, and was a member in good standing in the said body corporate at the time of his death;" that he died on the 2d day of February, 1911, and that his death was not caused by suicide; that he complied with all the provisions of the constitution and laws of the order up to the time of his death, "except so far as compliance therewith was prevented by the defendant;" that after his death the plaintiff, his widow, "duly made application to the defendant, as required by the laws of said order, for blanks upon which to make and furnish to the defendant satisfactory proofs of" his death, but that said defendant, "by its supreme secretary, refused to furnish to the said plaintiff such blanks, claiming that the said Joseph A. McCann, Jr., was not in good standing at the time of his death," whereas the said McCann "was entitled to be on the books of the said order, and, in contemplation of law, was in good standing in said order at the time of his death."

The defendant pleaded "that it was never indebted as alleged," and "that it did not promise as alleged," and for a third plea alleged that the said Joseph A. McCann, Jr., did at one time hold a benefit certificate, which was issued to him on the 25th of May, 1908, "but that he (the said Joseph A. McCann), having failed to comply with the constitution and laws of the said defendant as embraced in § 357, law 15, of the general laws of the defendant society, which said section reads as follows: 'Section 357. Any member failing to pay his regular monthly or extra payment within the time prescribed for the payment thereof shall thereby suspend himself ipso facto from all the rights and benefits of the order, as well as the rights and benefits of his beneficiaries, and such suspension shall be complete without any notice or action on the part of this conclave or any officer thereof, or of any officer of the Supreme Conclave; and such person shall continue under suspension until he is reinstated by the payment of all arrearages and compliance with all the other requirements for reinstatement, as provided by the laws of the order;'—was ipso facto suspended from membership in Eutaw Conclave No. 276, one of the subordinate conclaves of the defendant society, and from the defendant society, and that he was never thereafter reinstated to membership in said defendant society, and therefore there is no liability to the plaintiff on account of said alleged membership in said defendant society, as said McCann was not a member of said defendant society at the time of his alleged death." For a fourth plea the defendant alleged, in substance, that § 248 of the general laws of the defendant provides that "each member of the order shall pay to the financier of his conclave, without notice, twelve regular payments in each calendar year, each of which shall be due on the first day and payable on or before the last day of each calendar month, and in addition to such regular monthly payments such extra payments as may from time to time be required and laid," and that the said Joseph A. McCann, Jr., failed to pay the December payment for 1910 on or before the last day of the said month, and by reason thereof he was at the expiration of said last day of said month "ipso facto suspended from all the rights and benefits of the order;" that he was never reinstated in accordance with the laws of said order, and that his suspension "continued to exist from the 1st day of January, 1911;" and that at the time of his death he was not in good standing in the "defendant society," and his beneficiary is not entitled to any "benefit or benefits on account of" said benefit certificate.

In reply to these pleas the plaintiff alleged that the defendant refused to receive from the said Joseph A. McCann, Jr., the regular monthly and extra payments within the time prescribed for the payment thereof, and notified him that it would not receive any further payments from him on account of same; that the said Joseph A. McCann, Jr., was not therefore lawfully suspended from the defendant society; and that the defendant, by its said refusal to receive said payment from the said Joseph A. McCann, Jr., waived the provisions of § 357 of its general laws. The defendant traversed these replications and joined issue on the first replication, alleging that McCann had complied with all the laws of the defendant and was a member thereof at the time of his death, and the case was tried upon issue joined on the first and second pleas, on the first replication, and on the rejoinders. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony the court below granted an instruction that under the pleadings the plaintiff had offered no evidence legally sufficient to entitle her to recover, and from the judgment in favor of the defendant she appealed.

It appears from the evidence that the deceased became a member of the Eutaw Conclave and of the defendant on May 25, 1908; that some months thereafter he was confined to the Baltimore city jail at the instance of the plaintiff and remained there until he was removed to the Springfield Hospital, where he died about eight or nine months later. She says in her testimony: "Before I had him locked up, I noticed he acted queerly; he would come downstairs without any underwear, just a little shirt on;" that she would speak to him about it, and he would not be conscious that there was anything wrong with him, and she had him locked up because she did not want him to expose himself to the children; she did not know what was wrong with him; he was sent to the city jail, and after he had been there about four or five months they sent her word that his mind was bad, and after they found his mind was bad (at the jail) they took him to Springfield Hospital, which is a hospital in Carroll county for the insane, maintained by the state of Maryland; and that he died there about eight months thereafter, in February, 1911.

John M. Kennedy, a brother-in-law of the deceased, testified that he was a member of Eutaw Conclave No. 276; that he attended the meetings regularly and generally paid McCann's dues and assessments for him when due, and that they were paid up to November 30, 1910, but that those due after that time were not paid; that the plaintiff gave him the money to pay McCann's assessment due in December; that he attended a meeting of the conclave in December, and that as he approached the desk of the financial officer of the conclave, Albert H. Hock, the officer authorized to collect dues and assessments, to pay McCann's dues for December, 1910, "before he had time to make his business known" Hock said to him, "I want to see you; that man Joseph A. McCann, Jr., you have out there in the hospital is not fit to be a member of this conclave;" that Hock had a letter making certain charges against McCann and told witness the contents thereof; that he asked Hock to give him the letter, which he refused to do, stating that it was the property of the Supreme Conclave, and that he then said to witness, "This man will get no more benefits from this conclave, and the Supreme body will not pay him any insurance even if he dies; we have been informed that he will not live long; that he is an epileptic; he was born crazy and was an imbecile;" that witness replied that he did not think there was anything wrong with his mind until he was incarcerated, and that the officer replied, "Oh, that boy at twelve years old who would attempt an assault upon his mother is certainly an imbecile;" that he "attempted to reason the matter out with" Hock and told him that the plaintiff had given him the money to pay McCann's dues, etc., but that he replied, "We will take no more; . . . that he would not get up in the conclave and have him expelled, but he would let him lapse out and ignore him entirely, and not take any more money from him." On cross-examination this witness further stated that McCann's monthly payment was $1.23; that the Eutaw Conclave had paid McCann thirteen sick benefits for the first year; that the first benefit was $2.50 and others were $5 each, making a total of $62.50; and that his wife received the same. In reply to the question, "Did or not Hock tell you that you had introduced a man into the conclave who was suffering from epileptic attacks and who was a cocaine fiend, and that it was the safer and better plan for them simply to drop the matter rather than have it come up before the conclave, as he was going to prefer charges against him, and did you [meaning witness] not consent to that action with Hock in Eutaw Conclave in December, 1910?" the witness replied, "He told me some of those things, but I never made any consent to anything." Witness further stated that Hock read to him the letter referred to, in which it was stated that McCann was a cocaine fiend; that he had been confined in the penitentiary twice; that he was an imbecile; that he was born crazy; and that he had attempted an assault upon his mother, and said for these reasons he ought to be expelled and driven out of the lodge, and told witness if he protested against such action he would take the matter up in the conclave and have him expelled, and that he (witness) said: "Well, I will communicate with his wife and make known to her the circumstances." Witness states that he did report the matter to the plaintiff, and that they concluded "that they would await developments as to whether they (the lodge) were going to recognize him any further as a member;" that the plaintiff never received any more assessment cards, and that they were convinced by that fact that the conclave intended to dismiss him; that in the conversation referred to witness told Hock that he would report the matter to the plaintiff and see what action she would take; that he never made any further effort to pay McCann's December dues or January dues, never took the matter up again with the financial officer, and never made any demand for sick benefits.

It does not appear from the record that any action was ever taken by the Eutaw Conclave or by the Supreme Conclave with reference to suspending or expelling McCann, but, as we have seen, § 357 of the general laws of the defendant provides that "any member failing to pay his regular monthly or extra payment within the time prescribed for the payment thereof shall thereby suspend himself ipso facto from all rights and benefits, as well as the rights and benefits of his beneficiaries;" and it is conceded in this case that McCann's dues for December, 1910, and for January, 1911, were never paid at all.

The appellant contends, however, that the defendant was estopped from relying upon § 357 by the refusal of the financial officer of the Eutaw Conclave to receive, when tendered to him, McCann's dues for December, 1910, and that McCann and those acting for him, by such refusal, were relieved from any obligation to make a further offer of payment of his December dues or those payable after that date, and counsel for the appellant rely upon the cases of Schlosser v. Grand Lodge, B. R. T. 94 Md. 362, 50 Atl. 1048; Dague v. Grand Lodge, B. R. T. 111 Md. 95, 73 Atl. 735; and Camp No. 6, P. O. S. A. v. Arrington, 107 Md. 319, 68 Atl. 548. In those cases the court held that where the failure to pay was not due to the neglect of the plaintiff or the person to whom the certificate was issued, but to the conduct of the defendant or its agent, it could not be relied upon as a defense; and in the case of Camp No. 6, P. O. S. A. v. Arrington, supra, Chief Judge Boyd said: "If the appellee is finally restored to the rights of a member, as they existed prior to his expulsion, the appellant could not escape liability on the ground that his dues had not been paid, if it refused to receive them. It cannot be supposed that a respectable order would assume such a position; but, if it be attempted on that ground alone, no court of justice would permit it, as it would be a manifest fraud." But it is quite apparent, we think, that those cases have no application to the facts of this case.

It is declared in the printed and published copy of the constitution and laws of the defendant that the object of the order is "to unite fraternally all white male persons of sound health and good moral character, who are socially acceptable, between eighteen and fifty years of age," and "to create and maintain, by stated and fixed contributions, a benefit and special fund, from which, on satisfactory evidence of the death of a member who has complied with all the lawful requirements of the order, a special sum shall be paid to his beneficiary or beneficiaries as designated in conformity with the laws of the order."

Section 241 of the law provides: "A person to be eligible to membership in the Improved Order of Heptasophs shall be a white male, between the ages of eighteen and fifty years, of sound health, of good moral character, competent to earn a livelihood for himself and family, and a believer in a Supreme Being."

The letter which Hock, the financier, read to Kennedy belonged to the defendant, and if the defendant or the financial officer (financier) of Eutaw Conclave, the agent of the defendant for the collection of the monthly payments, discovered that McCann had been improperly admitted as a member of the order, and that his admission had been secured or procured by false or fraudulent representations, it was his manifest duty not to accept from him any further payments on account of his membership until the matter could be reported to, investigated, and acted upon by the Eutaw Conclave, or the defendant, in accordance with the laws of the defendant. Hock, therefore, told McCann's brother-in-law, when he offered to pay McCann's dues for December, 1910, what he had learned, and that in his judgment McCann was not a proper person to be a member of said conclave and should be expelled; that the better course to pursue was not to take any more money from him and "let him lapse out," but that if he (Kennedy) protested against that course he would take the matter up in the conclave and have him expelled, and then Kennedy said to him that he would report the matter to McCann's wife (the plaintiff) to see what action she would take. Hock was never afterwards approached about the matter by either the plaintiff or her brother, and no further effort was ever made by either of them to pay McCann's December or subsequent dues to the defendant or to the Eutaw Conclave. Under such circumstances, if the plaintiff did not assent to the course proposed by the financier of Eutaw Conclave, she should have protested and insisted upon paying McCann's monthly payments in order that the defendant or the Eutaw Conclave might have had the opportunity to take such action as would have relieved the defendant of an obligation that the officer claimed was improperly and unlawfully imposed upon it. On the other hand, if the plaintiff acquiesced in the course suggested by the financier, she cannot now complain of the consequences of her own election. To permit her now to protest against the course advised by the officer of Eutaw Conclave and adopted by her would result in a great wrong to the defendant and to those who would be required to contribute to the fund out of which her claim would be paid.

The facts of the case are not disputed. McCann failed to pay the monthly payments due in December, 1910, and January, 1911, and thereby, under the laws of the order, "suspended himself from all the rights and benefits of the order, as well as the rights" of his beneficiary.

The fact that McCann was sick or insane does not relieve the plaintiff of the consequences of his neglect. The laws of the defendant do not make exceptions of such cases, and his beneficiary is bound by 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the terms of his contract. Yoe v. Benjamin C. Howard Mut. Benev. Assn. 63 Md. 86; Hawkshaw v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. (C. C.) 29 Fed. 773. In Yoe's Case the court said: "The member failing in his lifetime to make payment, and the thirty days having expired before his death, and no one being authorized to make it after his death, to hold the association liable, notwithstanding no payment of the assessment has been made, would be to disregard the mutuality of obligation of members, as well as do violence to the terms and plain intent of the article of the association which we have quoted. . . . And the fact that he was part of the time sick and wholly unable to attend to business constitutes no sufficient legal excuse for the default whereby this consequence was produced."

It is also urged by the appellant that, as there was some evidence to show that in December, 1910, there was a further amount due McCann on account of sick benefits, it should, as far as necessary, have been applied by the Eutaw Conclave to the payment of his monthly payments due in December, 1910, and January, 1911. But § 307 of the laws of the order declares that "93 per centum of each regular monthly payment levied and called shall be paid into the benefit fund, and shall not be appropriated for any other purpose than the payment of death benefits, or placed in the special fund. The balance, being 7 per centum of each monthly payment, shall be paid into the general fund, as provided in the Supreme Conclave constitution," and § 395 provides: "Conclaves may, in their discretion, provide for the payment of sick benefits. The Supreme Conclave assumes no responsibility for sick-benefit regulations adopted by any subordinate conclave." These funds are therefore distinct, and the Eutaw Conclave was not authorized to apply any part of the sick-benefit fund to the payment of amounts due the "benefit fund."

In the case of Hansen v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. 140 Ill. 301, 29 N. E. 1121, where the subordinate lodges were authorized to provide for sick benefits, the court held, quoting from the syllabus: "That under these laws the sickness of a member, and his right to weekly benefits, did not relieve him from his obligation to pay assessments by the Supreme Grand Lodge, and that his sick benefits could not be applied to their payment; such application being confined to the dues and fines of the subordinate lodge." See also Hawkshaw v. Supreme Lodge, K. H. supra.

It follows from what we have said that there was no error in the ruling of the court below withdrawing the case from the jury, and the judgment appealed from must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

ANNIE R. BOHAKER
v.

TRAVELERS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

(215 Mass. 32, 102 N. E. 342.)

Insurance — accident — person found dead.

1. The court cannot say as matter of law that a fever patient who, upon his attendant's return to the room after a moment's absence therefrom, was found to have fallen to the ground from a window from which the screen had been torn, and killed himself, did not die by accident or committed suicide, so that no recovery can be had on a policy insuring him against bodily injury caused by accidental means except suicide.

Same — delirious patient — accident — approximate cause.

2. That a person is delirious from fever when he falls from a window to his death does not prevent the death from being effected directly or independently of all other causes, through external, violent, and accidental means, within the meaning of a policy insuring against death so caused.

Evidence — death — fall from window — suicide.

3. That a person delirious from fever fell from a window to his death does not establish suicide as matter of law, since the presumption against self-destruction is sufficient to sustain a finding that the fall was accidental, and not intentional.

(May 24, 1913.)

Note. — Liability under accident policy for death during delirium.

Generally as effect of words "sane or insane" or other words relating to mental condition in suicide clause in life insurance policy, see Cady v. Fidelity & C. Co. 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 260.

As to liability under accident policy for death by drowning, including instances where the drowning was brought about by fainting and unconsciousness, see note to Clark v. Iowa State Travelling Men's Asso. 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 631.

As to death from suicide as one caused through external, violent, and accidental means, including cases where the insured was insane when he took his life, see note to Tuttle v. Iowa State Travelling Men's Asso. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 223.

The authority upon the question of the liability under accident policies for death occurring during delirium is meager.

The facts in Cady v. Fidelity & C. Co. 134 Wis. 322, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 260, 113 N. W. 967, are similar to those involved in BOHAKER v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO. In the case referred to, which was an action on an accident policy excluding liability in case of death by suicide, sane or insane, it was held that suicide, sane or insane, involved an executed purpose to take one's own life; and that if the insured, during the absence of his nurse, jumped into a shaft, from the fifth floor of a building, while in a fit of delirium, without any intention of taking his life, and was killed, his death did not occur by suicide within the meaning of the policy.

And it was held that the court did not err in failing to direct a verdict for the defendant, or in refusing to set aside a verdict in favor of the insured, on the ground that the evidence would not reasonably admit of any other inference than that the 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) insured intentionally threw himself into the shaft, where there was evidence that he was in a hospital and had been delirious at times the day before his death, and that he was much depressed on that day, and that, after his nurse had left the room for a moment, he got up, ran up two flights of stairs to a part of the building he had never been in before, and upon seeing that he was pursued by a nurse he increased his speed and threw himself over a railing into a shaft and was killed; since it was held that from such evidence there was room for belief that he was not conscious of the nature of his act. Ibid.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Melick, 27 L.R.A. 629, 12 C. C. A. 544, 27 U. S. App. 547, 65 Fed. 178, it was held that a pistol wound causing tetanus with great bodily pain and delirium or fever might be found to be the proximate cause of death, where a person, insured against accidents, excluding suicide, sane or insane, and intentional injuries, cut his throat in a period of delirium or state of frenzy which was uncontrollable.

In Carr v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 100 Mo. App. 602, 75 S. W. 180, it was held that under a policy exempting the insurer from liability for injuries "resulting directly or indirectly in whole or in part . . . from any disease, or bodily infirmity," the insured's injury was the direct, or at least indirect, result of his sickness, where the evidence showed that he was confined in a hospital by a high fever, which rendered him delirious to such an extent that he had to be restrained by force at times, and that during the temporary absence of his nurse he left his bed, and upon the nurse's return she saw him falling from a window, and the insured, upon gaining consciousness, was unable to state the circumstances as to how or what caused him to get out of the window. EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought to recover on a policy of accident insurance which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walter I. Badger and William Harold Hitchcock, for defendant:

Plaintiff in order to recover must show that the injuries were "effected directly and independently of all other causes, through accidental means."

Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. ed. 308, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1360; Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Asso. 156 Mass. 351, 17 L.R.A. 753, 30 N. E. 1013; National Masonic Acci. Asso. v. Shryock, 20 C. C. A. 3, 36 U. S. App. 658, 73 Fed. 774.

If the agreed facts leave it open to conjecture whether those injuries were so effected or not, she cannot recover. The court may draw reasonable inferences, but it cannot guess as between two or more equally probable inferences.

Boston, 118 Mass. 234, 19 Am. Rep. 446; Williams v. Citizens' Electric Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 437, 68 N. E. 840.

The insured's death was not effected through accidental means.

The insured's death was not effected, directly and independently of all other causes, through means within the scope of the policy.

Mr. Alonzo E. Yont, for plaintiff:

The insured was found underneath the window, suffering from injuries evidently produced by a fall, which injuries were sufficient to produce his death. The plaintiff has here sustained the burden of proof, and the burden is on the defendant to show that the death was caused by some means not coming within the terms of the policy.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of contract to recover upon a policy of accident insurance for the death of the insured, John M. Babson. The circumstances under which the insured lost his life were these: He was delirious by reason of severe typhoid fever, in a room with a single window, which was covered by a screen, and its sill was 28 inches above the floor. Along the outside of the building, slightly below the window, was a balcony 5 feet wide with a protecting railing about 30 feet above the rough and stony ground beneath. He was left alone momentarily on an August evening by his attendant, who on returning found the room vacant, and the screen, which had been whole and in position when he left the room, torn from the window. On immediate investigation, the insured was found on the ground under the room unconscious, with severe injuries, which, according to physicians, probably would have caused his death, even if he had not been suffering from typhoid fever. The policy insured "against bodily injuries, effected directly and independently of all other causes, through external, violent, and accidental means (suicide, whether sane or insane, is not covered), as specified in" a schedule annexed.

The case was tried without a jury before a judge, who found for the plaintiff after refusing to rule as requested by the defendant: (1) That the plaintiff was not entitled to recover as matter of law; (2) that the death of the insured was not effected, directly and independently of all other causes, through external, violent, and accidental means; and (3) that the death of the insured was the result of suicide, sane or insane, and hence not covered by the policy.

1. The defendant's first request was denied rightly. "Accidental means" is used in the contract of insurance in its common significance of happening unexpectedly, without intention or design. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755. The cause of injuries was not wholly conjectural as matter of law. It is plain that the immediate cause was the fall. This manifested itself in evidence which was violent and external. There was basis for the inference that it was accidental, as we have defined that word. It may have been that the deceased, in the heat of his fever and the warm season, in an effort to reach fresh air, went to the balcony just outside his window, and there without premeditation or purpose or delirium, but only through weakness, lost his balance and went over the low railing, and received mortal harm. Cases where it has been necessary for a plaintiff to show negligence of some person as the cause, and where it has been said that the cause was conjectural, are clearly distinguishable. Accident is a far more comprehensive term than negligence. Noyes v. Commercial Travelers' Eastern Acci. Asso. 190 Mass. 171, 76 N. E. 665; Wicks v. Dowell, [1905] 2 K. B. 225, 2 Ann. Cas. 732.

2. It would have been error to rule as matter of law that the insured's death was not effected "directly and independently of all other causes" through accidental means. The point of difficulty in this connection is whether the disease did not contribute to the injuries, or at least was it not a cause co-operating with the fall in inducing the result. But the disease may have been found to have been simply a condition, and not a moving cause of the fatal injuries. A sick man may be the subject of an accident, which but for his sickness would not have befallen him. One may meet his death by falling into imminent danger in a faint or in an attack of epilepsy. But such an event commonly has been held to be the result of accident, rather than of disease.

In Manufacturers' Acci. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 22 L.R.A. 620, at page 625, 7 C. C. A. 581, 16 U. S. App. 290, 58 Fed. 945, it was said by Taft, J., at 590: "If the deceased suffered death by drowning, no matter what was the cause of his falling into the water, whether disease or a slipping, the drowning in such case would be the proximate and sole cause of the disability or death, unless it appeared that death would have been the result, even had there been no water at hand to fall into. The disease would be but the condition; the drowning would be the moving, sole, and proximate cause." To the same effect in substance are Winspear v. Accident Ins. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 42, 50 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 292, 43 L. T. N. S. 459, 29 Week. Rep. 116, 45 J. P. 110; Lawrence v. Accidental Ins. Co. L. R. 7 Q. B. Div. 216, 50 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 522, 45 L. T. N. S. 29, 29 Week. Rep. 802, 45 J. P. 781; Ludwig v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. 113 Minn. 510, 130 N. W. 5; Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. v. Muir, 61 C. C. A. 456, 126 Fed. 928. The language of this contract, to the effect that the "accidental means" must have operated "independently of all other causes" to produce the death, does not change the general rule of law, that the proximate and not a remote cause is the one to which the law looks. Many instances are found where two equally dominant causes co-operate or concur in producing a result. The very numerous cases arising out of joint or simultaneous torts are illustrations. Two or more causes, each proximate in character and only one of which is accidental, may co-operate in producing an injury. In such cases the limiting language of the policy would apply.

The present policy does not stipulate that there shall be no recovery, if any other circumstance than the accident, directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, proximately or remotely, contribute to the injury, as do some insurance contracts which have come before the courts. The policy in the case 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) at bar does not go so far as to require the court to search beyond the active, efficient, procuring cause to a cause of a cause. When one single predominant agency is disclosed, directly producing as a natural and probable result the injury, which is accidental, and which operates independently of other like causes, then the effectual means required by the policy have been found. This contract does not require a further and nicer analysis to ascertain whether in the chain of causation another source less demonstrative, and more attenuated in its effect or more ulterior in its origin, may be found which may more indirectly have a causal connection with injury. Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acci. Asso. 156 Mass. 351, 17 L.R.A. 753, 30 N. E. 1013; Daniels v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 183 Mass. 393, 62 L.R.A. 751, 67 N. E. 424. See Newton v. Worcester, 174 Mass. 181, 187, 54 N. E. 521.

The single operating, proximate cause, therefore, might have been found to be the fall, and not the fever. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. ed. 740, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 685; Scheffer v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 249, 26 L. ed. 1070; Isitt v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 504, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 191, 60 L. T. N. S. 297, 37 Week. Rep. 477; Continental Casualty Co. v. Lloyd, 165 Ind. 52, 59, 73 N. E. 824; Modern Woodman Acci. Asso. v. Shryock, 54 Neb. 250, 39 L.R.A. 826, 74 N. W. 607; Fetter v. Fidelity & C. Co. 174 Mo. 256, 61 L.R.A. 459, 97 Am. St. Rep. 560, 73 S. W. 592. This having been found as a fact, and there being some supporting evidence, the finding of the trial judge will not be disturbed.

3. The defendant urges strongly that the death of the insured was the result of suicide, sane or insane, and hence there could be no recovery. But while that might have been found as a fact, it could not have been ruled as matter of law. Suicide is a crime, and involves a high degree of moral turpitude. Com. v. Mink, 123 Mass. 422, 25 Am. Rep. 109. It cannot be assumed without clear proof. The presumption is that one does not commit suicide. Such a presumption, being one of fact, stands until overthrown by evidence. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. McConkey, 127 U. S. 661, 32 L. ed. 308, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1360. If it be assumed in favor of the defendant that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove that death was not due to suicide, the presumption against self-destruction, in the absence of compelling circumstances, sustains this burden. Even though the insured was suffering from delirium, as it is agreed that he was, the facts do not require the inference that he jumped to the ground. It was open to the trial judge to find that it was through weakness or otherwise, and not through conscious adaptation of means to an end by a mind unbalanced by fever, that he fell to the earth.

Exceptions overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

KATHERINE MCLEOD

v.

SARAH RAWSON.

(215 Mass. 257, 102 N. E. 429.)

Negligence — defective premises — attendant on householder — liability of wife.

1. A nurse called by a physician to attend a sick householder cannot hold the latter's wife liable for injuries caused by a defective condition of the premises.

Same — absence of light — breach of contract — liability.

2. A woman who promises a nurse attending her sick husband, that a light will be kept burning during the night, may be liable in damages in case of injury to the nurse through the absence of the light.

(June 17, 1913.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Court after directing a verdict for defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — MCLEOD v. RAWSON seems to be a case of first impression upon the point as to the liability, by reason merely of the relation of the parties, of one not the householder or the owner of the house, but a member of the household, for personal injuries sustained by another person therein. The case most nearly in point which has been found is Hoar v. Merritt, 62 Mich. 386, 29 N. W. 15, in which a painter employed upon a house built by a man upon land owned by his wife had been injured by the giving way of a scaffold, and it was held that under no view of the facts could the wife be made liable, she having been merely the owner of the land, and having had nothing to do with the building, which was carried on and paid for by her husband.

In Toomey v. Sanborn, 146 Mass. 28, 14 N. E. 921, however, where the defendant, while personally supervising repairs which were being made upon a house owned by his

Messrs. Dana B. Gove, Frederick J. Daggett, and Francis P. Garland, for plaintiff:

The question of the defendant's negligence was for the jury.

Messrs. Guy A. Ham and Walter F. Frederick, for defendant:

The defendant, under the circumstances in this case, owed the plaintiff no duty other than one of refraining from any wilful act that would result in an injury to the plaintiff.

Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644.

Even assuming that the plaintiff was a licensee as to the defendant, the plaintiff, under the authorities, took the premises as she found them.

De Courcy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was incumbent on the plaintiff to show that her injury was due to some undischarged duty that the defendant owed to her. The house in which the accident occurred was not owned or controlled by the defendant, but by Warren W. Rawson, her husband, since deceased; and the plaintiff was called to the premises by his physician. There was no invitation, express or implied, extended to her by the defendant, and no relation existed between them that wife, and occupied by a tenant with whom he and his wife boarded and lived, had directed a plank to be removed from the floor of a passageway affording a back entrance to the house, thus creating a dangerous hole, which was left unguarded and into which a servant of the city fell and was injured, while rightfully using the passageway with due care for the purpose of removing ashes and garbage from the house,—it was held that the trial court rightly refused to rule that on the whole evidence the injured person was not entitled to recover against the defendant.

Generally, as to the liability of the owner of a private residence for injury to a person invited therein, see note to Clark v. Fehlhaber, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 442.

imposed upon the defendant a duty of keeping the premises reasonably safe for the plaintiff. The cases cited, such as those involving the duty of a landlord to his tenants and persons on his premises in the tenant's right, and those of a shopkeeper to customers who visit him on business, are not in point. Gordon v. Cummings, 152 Mass. 513, 9 L.R.A. 640, 23 Am. St. Rep. 846, 25 N. E. 978; Toland v. Paine Furniture Co. 179 Mass. 501, 61 N. E. 52; Wills v. Taylor, 193 Mass. 113, 78 N. E. 774; McGowan v. Monahan, 199 Mass. 296, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 928, 127 Am. St. Rep. 501, 85 N. E. 105; Marston v. Reynolds, 211 Mass. 590, 98 N. E. 601.

But although the defendant was under no obligation founded merely on the relation of the parties, to maintain a light that would enable the plaintiff to move about the upper hall in safety, yet if she promised the plaintiff to do so, and was negligent in the manner of performing that undertaking, she thereby became liable to the plaintiff, if the latter, while relying on the promise, was injured by the defendant's misfeasance. Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 7 Am. Rep. 548; Riley v. Lissner, 160 Mass. 330, 35 N. E. 1130; Buldra v. Henin, 212 Mass. 275, 98 N. E. 863; Wilkinson v. Coverdale, 1 Esp. 75; Hyde v. Moffat, 16 Vt. 271; Gregor v. Cady, 82 Me. 131, 17 Am. St. Rep. 466, 19 Atl. 108.

The case is here on a report. On the testimony of the plaintiff, the jury could find that on the night before the accident, during a conversation with the defendant with reference to the electric light at the foot of the back stairs, the plaintiff said, among other things: "You must not put out that light; you must leave that light burning at night always, while I am taking care of Mr. Rawson. . . . I have to be up and down these stairs, and I am absolutely dependent upon that light going into the little room, or I may fall down these stairs,—the two passages are so near together;" that Mrs. Rawson replied, "All right then, I will leave it burning." They could further find that, soon after the accident, the defendant said: "You fell down those stairs, and I am so sorry I put out that light. What did I put out that light for?"

It was necessary for the plaintiff to use the hall during the night in going to and from the bathroom; and opposite the door of the bathroom, and only 3 feet from the opening of the back stairs, was the door of the anteroom, which was connected with the room of the patient. The plaintiff testified that she depended absolutely upon the reflection of the light at the foot of the back stairs to show her the entrance from the hall to the anteroom, and that the rest of the hall was pitch dark, and that such was the condition as to light when the defendant conversed with her at 11 o'clock, before retiring. On these facts it was for the jury to decide whether the defendant had undertaken to keep burning the electric light referred to, whether she was negligent in extinguishing it, and whether that was the cause of the plaintiff's injury.

The question whether the plaintiff herself was in the exercise of due care is not free from difficulty, but we are of opinion that this also was for the jury. It could be found that she was justified in entering the anteroom from the hall instead of from Mr. Rawson's room, because it was important in his critical condition not to arouse him. And we cannot say as matter of law that she was careless in relying on the light in question to indicate the location of the stairway, especially after the assurance given by the defendant, who apparently was in charge of the premises during her husband's illness. She had safely relied on this light several times during the night, the last time being less than an hour before the accident, and although its reflection was not distinct until she reached the door leading from the hall to the anteroom, she well might assume that as it was left burning by the defendant when retiring for the night, no one would be likely to extinguish it before daylight. In brief, it was for them to determine whether her conduct, as they found it to be on the evidence, measured up to the standard of reasonable prudence under the circumstances in which she was placed. Faxon v. Butler, 206 Mass. 500, 138 Am. St. Rep. 405, 92 N. E. 707, 19 Ann. Cas. 666.

In accordance with the report, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for $3,000. So ordered.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for St. Louis County denying a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto or a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

Charitable institutions are not liable for injuries sustained through the negligence of servants, on the ground that the relation of benefactor and beneficiary exists and therefore an implied agreement that the corporation be held harmless, yet such corporation may be held liable to patients if there has been negligence in the original selection of its servants, which is a branch of a nondelegable duty.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant is a corporation organized in the year 1883, under the provisions of title 3, chapter 34, Gen. Stat. 1878, now §§ 3102 et seq., Rev. Laws 1905. The articles of association declare that the general purpose of the corporation "is to establish and maintain at Duluth, Minnesota, a hospital which shall be free to persons needing care and medical or surgical treatment, and who are indigent and have no means with which to pay for such care and treatment, and also to furnish care at reasonable rates to such as desire it and are able to pay for the same; the association is purely eleemosynary, no member thereof to receive any pecuniary profit from his or her membership, and all sums received by the association from any source to be applied to the purposes of the association."

Subsequent to the organization of the association, buildings were acquired and equipped for hospital purposes, and the association entered upon and has since continued the discharge of the powers and duties conferred by its incorporation. It has accumulated property of considerable value, principally from donations made to it by charitably disposed persons. It receives and cares for indigent patients, and others who are able to pay for the accommodations given them; the great majority of its patients, being of ability to pay, are charged for services rendered. Its expenses are paid out of receipts from patients and donations received. There was installed in one of its buildings a laundry department, equipped with necessary machinery and utensils, including an ironing mangle. This mangle was of the ordinary type of such devices for ironing household linen, and was supplied with the usual heated rollers. The rollers were not guarded as required by § 1813, Rev. Laws 1905, though it appears that it was practicable to so guard the same. Plaintiff was in the employ of defendant as housekeeper, with general supervision and charge of the household affairs of the hospital. On October 21, 1910, while plaintiff was engaged in ironing some window curtains, in doing which she operated the mangle, one of her hands was caught between the heated rollers thereof, and burned to such an extent as to necessitate the amputation of the greater part thereof. She thereafter brought this action to recover for such injury, charging in her complaint that the same was caused by reason of the negligent failure of defendant to guard the mangle rollers as required by law, and negligence in failing to keep and maintain the mangle in a safe and suitable condition for use. She had a verdict in the court below, and defendant appealed from an order denying its alternative motion for judgment or a new trial.

It is contended that plaintiff failed to show a right of action against defendant, for the reasons: (1) That at the time plaintiff was injured she was engaged in work outside of and beyond the scope of her employment, and was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to operate the mangle; and (2) that, since defendant is a charitable corporation, it is not liable in damages for the negligence charged. Our examination of the record leads to the conclusion that the evidence fully justified the jury in finding that plaintiff was at the time of her injury within the general scope of her employment, and that she was not guilty of contributory negligence. The facts bring the case within the rule of Carlin v. Kennedy, 97 Minn. 141, 106 N. W. 340. We therefore pass that branch of the case, and come directly to the question whether defendant is responsible to its servants and employees for injuries resulting from its negligence. This is the principal and controlling issue in the case. And in considering the question it may be conceded for the purposes of the case that defendant is a charitable corporation, within the doctrine of many of the courts under which such associations are held immune from liability from their negligence. It conducts its affairs without profit to its members, and cares for without charge all indigent persons applying for treatment at the hospital. The fact that a fixed charge is made to those who are able to pay does not necessarily deprive the corporation of its eleemosynary character. Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 555, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42.

We have made no attempt to discover the origin of the rule of nonliability applied by many of the courts to such associations, nor to trace the development of the law upon the subject. The rule probably originated in a purpose to foster and encourage such associations, for the benefit of the poor, and at a time when they were purely and wholly charitable, and supported exclusively by donations from the philanthropist and charitably disposed person. Associations of that character are necessarily purely charitable, performing a public function in caring for and extending aid, treatment, and comfort to the indigent and poor. It was undoubtedly thought wise to treat them as agencies of the government, and to extend them immunity from the charge of negligence, precisely as though created and operated by the government. As to associations established and operated by the state, it has often been held that no liability for negligence exists in favor either of patients, employees, or strangers. Maia v. Eastern State Hospital, 97 Va. 507, 47 L.R.A. 577, 34 S. E. 617; Benton v. City Hospital, 140 Mass. 13, 54 Am. Rep. 436, 1 N. E. 836; Downes v. Harper Hospital, 101 Mich. 555, 25 L.R.A. 602, 45 Am. St. Rep. 427, 60 N. W. 42; Farrigan v. Pevear, 193 Mass. 147, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 481, 118 Am. St. Rep. 484, 78 N. E. 855, 8 Ann. Cas. 1109. The courts are not, however, in harmony upon the general question of liability. In the following cases recovery was allowed against private charitable associations: Bruce v. Central M. E. Church, 147 Mich. 230, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 74, 110 N. W. 951, 11 Ann. Cas. 150; Hordern v. Salvation Army, 199 N. Y. 233, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 62, 139 Am. St. Rep. 889, 92 N. E. 626; Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 73 N. H. 556, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496, 64 Atl. 190, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 621.

The rule exonerating the private association is founded upon various theories, namely, that the rule of respondet superior has no application; that the funds of the association are in the nature of trust funds, and cannot be diverted from the purposes of the trust; that the payment of damages for personal injuries would constitute such a diversion, and be unlawful. The trust-fund theory, and the inapplicability of the rule of respondet superior, in actions for injuries to employees, has been repudiated by some of the later decisions (Kellogg v.

Church Charity Foundation, 128 App. Div. 214, 112 N. Y. Supp. 566; Basabo v. Salvation Army, — R. I. —, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1144, 85 Atl. 120), but is adhered to in those states holding the rule of nonliability. And while the general rule of immunity, in cases where the negligence of servants and employees is the basis of the action, wholly disconnected with any claim of negligence on the part of the association itself, and where the association appears to have exercised reasonable care in their selection, is upheld by many courts, there is a sharp conflict in the later decisions when injury to servants or employees has been caused by the negligent failure of the association to perform some absolute or nondelegable duty imposed by general law upon all masters for the protection of their servants. In such cases the weight of reason, in the absence of some express statutory exemption, sustains the rule of liability. In Bruce v. Central M. E. Church, 147 Mich. 230, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 74, 110 N. W. 951, 11 Ann. Cas. 150; Hewett v. Woman's Hospital Aid Asso. 73 N. H. 556, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496, 64 Atl. 190, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 621, and Hordern v. Salvation Army, 199 N. Y. 233, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 62, 139 Am. St. Rep. 889, 92 N. E. 626, the question is fully and ably discussed and the rule of liability affirmed. A large number of authorities will be found cited in the note to the above decision in 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 62, and 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 481. But, passing these general observations, we come directly to the question before us.

In this action plaintiff was in the employ of defendant as housekeeper, and she was injured while in the line of her employment by reason of the failure of defendant to supply the mangle with a guard as required by law. It was undoubtedly the common-law duty of defendant to guard this dangerous part of the machine, at least to exercise reasonable care to maintain it in reasonably safe and suitable condition for use. The duty to guard was made absolute by § 1813, Rev. Laws 1905, wherein all dangerous parts of machinery, including ironing mangles, are expressly required, so far as practicable, to be guarded, to the end that those engaged in their operation may be protected from injury. The statutory duty applies equally to all persons or corporations operating such machinery, is absolute and nondelegable, and a failure to perform the same is evidence of negligence, for which recovery may be had. To say that a charitable association is exempt from the rule finds no basis save the dictum of the courts, and results in placing such associations above the law. We have no difficulty in the case at bar, one of master and servant, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) in applying the rule of the Michigan, New York, New Hampshire, and other courts, where the association has been held liable for the nonperformance of its absolute duties when injury to the servant results therefrom. Under nearly all the authorities liability exists for the negligence of employees in cases where there appears to have been a failure to exercise reasonable care in their selection. Note in 4 Ann. Cas. 103. The requirement of reasonable care in the selection of servants is a personal nondelegable duty of the master, and if liability exists for a failure of its performance, then equally a liability should exist for the negligent failure to perform any of the other absolute duties imposed upon the master, either statutory or at common law. In fact, it seems clear, under the modern trend of judicial opinion, that a failure to discharge any nondelegable duty creates, in the absence of express statutory exemption, a liability on the part of associations of this kind. In this view nearly all the courts could well unite, though the reasoning of some of them, based upon the trust-fund theory, would probably lead to an adherence to the rule of nonliability in all cases.

We adopt the view of liability stated, and hold that, since plaintiff's injury was the result of a failure of defendant to comply with the statutory obligation to guard the mangle in question, the verdict must be sustained.

In reaching this conclusion we are not to be understood as underestimating, or failing to appreciate to its fullest extent, the blessings bestowed upon the destitute, and the poverty-burdened applicant for help. Our view is that the duty created by law for the protection of servants is absolute, and no employer should be exempt therefrom, except by action of the legislature. No public good can come from permitting one charitable corporation, by the failure of a duty imposed by law, to maim and disfigure its servants and employees, when, depending upon the nature of the injury, their future welfare must of necessity be looked after by some other charitable association, public or private, or by already overburdened or poverty-stricken relatives and friends. No such situation should be brought about by an arbitrary rule of immunity from liability, applicable only to one class of persons, unless deemed by the legislature necessary to the existence and life of charitable associations. Nor are we to be understood as holding that the trust funds of the defendant may be applied to the payment of this verdict. The question is not involved. Defendant is not supported exclusively from such funds; on the contrary, its maintenance would seem from the evidence to come principally from patients who pay for services rendered them.

Order affirmed.

MARY LOU ARMSTRONG, Appt.,
v.
HARRIETT ARMSTRONG WALTON et al.

(— Miss. —, 62 So. 173.)

Will — signature — name at beginning.

Under a statute requiring a will to be signed by the testator, or some other person in his presence and by his express direction, a blank will on a mutual benefit certificate, intended to pass the right to the proceeds, is sufficiently signed by placing the testator's name in the blank at the beginning of the instrument, without placing the signature at the end of it, if the intention was to execute the will thereby.

(June 2, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Chancery Court for Monroe County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to set aside an alleged will which consisted of filling a form on the back of a mutual benefit certificate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note.— Wills: writing name in body of will as a signature thereto.

This note is intended to include only cases which have been decided since the note covering the same question attached to Meads v. Earle, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 63.

In Re Phelan, — N. J. —, 87 Atl. 625, the court said that a last will need not be expressed in any particular formula. It must be signed, but the signature may be at the beginning, middle, or end, or on the side. If a testator writes his name in, on, or under the testament, with the intention to make that name his signature, even if expressed in the third person, and the witnesses see him write, and it is duly executed in other respects, the testament is valid. And so it was held that, under a statute which requires that all testaments shall be signed by the testator, which signature shall be made, or the making thereof acknowledged, by him, and the writing declared to be his last will in the presence of two witnesses,—the name in the attestation clause of an holographic will which read as follows, "signed, sealed, published, and declared by the said Cornelius or Corniel F. Phelan to be his last will and testament in the presence of, as witnesses," was sufficient as the signature of the will; the clause having been written in the presence of the attesting witnesses, and, there being extrinsic evi-

The paper was an incomplete will, or a futile attempt to execute a will.

The name of a testator at the commencement of a holograph will is an equivocal act, and unless it appear affirmatively from something on the face of the paper that it was intended as his signature, it is not a sufficient signing under the statute.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal was a controversy between the widow of a deceased member of the Masonic Benefit Association, claiming to be his designated beneficiary, and his children by a former marriage, over the proceeds of an insurance certificate. John Armstrong, at the date of his death, May 3, 1911, was a dence of an intention that it should be testator's signature. The court stated that the name written in the caption of the same will as follows, "I, Cornelius or Corniel F. Phelan, . . . do make, publish, and declare this my last will and testament," was insufficient as a signature, as it was not written in the presence of witnesses nor acknowledged before them to be his signature. The court stated that the words composing his name were merely designatio personæ, and said that the same would be true as to the name in the attestation clause, were it not for the extrinsic evidence of a contrary intent.

And also in Murguiondo v. Nowlan — Va. —, 78 S. E. 600, the signature of testatrix to an attested holographic will, written upon the margin of the will, was held to be such a signature as is contemplated by a statute providing that wills be signed "in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature," where the testatrix signed in the presence of the attesting witnesses as and for her signature, and at the same time declared the instrument to be her last will and testament.

As to when a will is deemed to have been signed or subscribed at the end, see notes to Sears v. Sears, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 353; Mader v. Apple, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 515; and Re Stinson, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1173.

member in good standing of the Masonic Benefit Association. The certificate of insurance, dated May 27, 1905, was made payable to him upon his death, and was for $500. The amount of this insurance was afterwards, by properly adopted order of the association, increased to $700. On December 3, 1906, John Armstrong designated his wife, Mary L. Armstrong, appellant herein, as his beneficiary in the insurance certificate. The instrument by which this designation is made is called a will. It is claimed that it was not sufficiently executed by John Armstrong, by reason of his signature not being placed on the line at the end thereof. The following is the benefit certificate and the so-called will:

No. 4,522.

Masonic Benefit Association
(Organized 1880)

of the Deum servamus, nostras
M. W. Stringer viduas et orphanos sus-
Grand Lodge tinebimus.
Office of the Treasurer.

Will pay to Bro. John Armstrong, of Sesostria Lodge No. 14, at Aberdeen, Mississippi, who is a member of the Masonic Benefit Association.

This certificate witnesseth: That the Masonic Benefit Association of the M. W. Stringer Grand Lodge of F. & A. M., of Mississippi, will pay to John Armstrong, upon his death, five hundred dollars ($500), provided he is in good financial standing with the Masonic Benefit Association, and in good standing with his local lodge at the time of his death.

Any failure to comply strictly with the laws and regulations of the Masonic Benefit Association, as prescribed by the aforesaid Grand Lodge, causes forfeiture in the membership represented by this certificate.

No suit shall be maintained on this claim unless instituted within one year after the member's death.

Proof of death must be filed in the M. B. A. within thirty days after the death of member.

Given under my hand and official seal at Edwards, Mississippi, this 27th day of May, 1905.

[Signed] E. E. Perkins,
[Seal.] Sec'y & Treas.

I, John Armstrong, of Aberdeen, Mississippi, age forty-nine years, being of sound and disposing mind, give and bequeath the money due to me by virtue of the certificate upon which this, my last will, is indorsed, unto my wife, Mary L. Armstrong.

In witness whereof, I, this the 3d day of December, 1906, sign, publish, and declare this instrument as my will, so far as the money is concerned which is due me after 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

my death from the Masonic Benefit Association. I appoint Mary L. Armstrong as my executor.

State of Mississippi, Monroe County.

The said John Armstrong, on the 3d day of December, 1906, signed the foregoing instrument, and published and declared the same in our presence, and in the presence of each other, as his last will, and we, at his request, and in his presence, and in the presence of each other, on said date, have hereunto written our names as subscribing witnesses thereof.

[Signed] F. N. B. Ward, W. M.

The form of the certificate and the will is on one page. There is only a line dividing the instruments. From the appearance of the form, it seems that the certificate and the will, when executed, were intended to be considered and read together and as one.

The will contains the statement that it is indorsed upon the certificate. It is shown therein that its only purpose is to dispose of the money to be due to the member on the certificate, from the association, at the time of his death. The form of the certificate indicates that it should be made payable to the member "upon his death . . . provided he is in good financial standing." The form excludes the idea that it was meant to have the certificate made payable, upon its original issuance, to some other person than the member. It appears to be the plan of the association that the certificate should be made payable to the member to whom it is issued, and that the member should afterwards designate his beneficiary in the instrument called a will, which follows immediately the certificate and together occupies the face of the sheet which is known as the benefit certificate.

We have carefully examined the rules and regulations of the Masonic Benefit Association. These are called the constitution and by-laws. The only provision we find relative to the issuance of the benefit certificate and the designation of the beneficiary is the form of the policy, and thereunder the form of the instrument, which is stated to be a will. Therefore, with the exception of prescribing a form for the certificate and for the designation of the beneficiary, there is nothing in the rules and regulations of the association to control the manner in which the beneficiary shall be named.

It will be noted that John Armstrong's name is not written on the line at the end of the instrument which he denominates his will, and in which he gives the proceeds of the benefit certificate to his wife. It is shown by the testimony that he was a colored man, unable to read or write; that he went to F. N. B. Ward, one of the attesting witness to the will, and who was the worshipful master of the local lodge of the association, and requested him to make out his will, and make it payable to his wife, Mary Lou Armstrong. Thereupon Ward filled out all the blanks in the instrument in the presence of John Armstrong and his son, R. E. Ward, who was senior deacon. The two Wards then signed the attestation to the will. F. N. B. Ward wrote down the name of Armstrong in two places, at the beginning of the will, and in the certificate of attestation. This was done because he was requested by Armstrong to fill out his will, and that meant the writing of all necessary words to make out and complete the execution of the will. The paper was then handed to Armstrong, who delivered it to his wife; and upon his death it was found in her bedroom, framed and hanging on the wall. F. N. B. Ward testified that he signed John Armstrong's name to the will.

It appears to be settled that the right of a member of a benefit society in the amount agreed to be paid in the certificate at his death is simply the power to appoint a beneficiary, and that the rules and regulations of such society, such as may be contained in the constitution or charter and by-laws, are the foundation and source of such power. 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. § 237. But we find no requirement in the rules and regulations of the Masonic Benefit Association, relative to the execution of the power to name the beneficiary, except the form of the will set out in the constitution and used in this case. This formality was intended to be complied with by the member, John Armstrong. We understand that the designation of a beneficiary may be made by will. This seems to be the plan of this association.

Has the instrument purporting to be a will been sufficiently executed? It is contended by appellees that it was necessary for the paper to have been signed at the end thereof. The statute of this state (§ 5078 of the Code of 1906) provides that a will must be signed by the testator, or some other person in his presence and by his express direction, and if the will is not wholly written and subscribed by the testator, then it shall be attested by two or more credible witnesses in the presence of the testator or the testatrix.

Now, as to the place of signature: We find in American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 2d ed. vol. 30, p. 582, the following: "Under the English statute of frauds, a will was held to be sufficiently 'signed' if the testator wrote his name at the beginning or in the body of the will with intent thus to sign the instrument; and this rule has been followed in those jurisdictions wherein the statute is silent as to the place of signature, with the modification, in some instances, that the intent to sign must appear upon the face of the will." In 40 Cyc. 1104, is the following: "Where the statute relating to signing requires no more than the statute of frauds,—merely that the will shall be in writing, and be signed,—it is immaterial where the testator's signature was placed, if it was placed there with the intention of authenticating the instrument." It is stated to be the general rule applicable to the signature to writings of various kinds, that "it is now almost universally held that, if the name of the party to be charged is written by himself or his representative anywhere in the body of the instrument, with intent thereby to authenticate it and render himself bound, it is a good signature." Lampkin v. State, 105 Ala. 1, 16 So. 575; Re Camp, 134 Cal. 233, 66 Pac. 227; Cunningham v. Hawkins, 163 Mich. 317, 128 N. W. 223.

In the case of Armstrong v. Armstrong, 29 Ala. 538, wherein it was held that the writing of the name of the testator at the beginning of the will was sufficient, Rice, Ch. J., said in delivering the opinion of the court: "It is not essential that the testator should write his own name. The British statute, as well as our own, allows a will to be signed for him by another; and his name, when written by another for him, in his presence, and by his direction, will have the same effect as if it had been written by himself. Although his name is not written by himself nor subscribed to the will, yet, if it be written in the beginning of the will, by another, in his presence and under his direction, and if it be acknowledged by him to the attesting witnesses at the time he calls on them to attest and subscribe it, it will be as effectual as if with his own pen he had written it."

It seems that a distinction has been made between the meaning of the words "sign" and "subscribe." In the case of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Denton, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 284, 68 S. W. 336, the court, in holding a signature in the body of an instrument good, called attention to the fact that the statute requiring such signature provided that such instrument should be "signed" and not that it be "subscribed." It will be noticed that the statute in Mississippi prescribes that the will shall be signed by the testator, or some other person at his direction, where it is not wholly written by him, and that, when it is wholly written by him, it shall also be subscribed by him.

We do not find any decision of this court wherein the question of the location of a signature to a will has been passed on. In reference to the location of the signature of the witness attesting the will, it has been decided in the case of Fatheree v. Lawrence, 33 Miss. 585, that the purpose of attestation is to identify the instrument signed and published by the testator, and that no particular form of words is necessary to constitute an attestation. In the case of Murray v. Murphy, 39 Miss. 214, it is decided that it is immaterial as to what particular part of a will is located the name of the attesting witness. It is settled under the laws of this state that a signature to a will may be made for a testator by another party writing his name (Watson v. Pipes, 32 Miss. 451), and a testator may be assisted in signing his will by having his hand steadied by another party, and can also sign by his mark (Sheehan v. Kearney, 82 Miss. 688, 35 L.R.A. 102, 21 So. 41).

We find from the testimony in this case that John Armstrong had the purpose definitely in mind to make his will so that his wife could be designated as the beneficiary in his insurance certificate. He went to an officer of the local lodge, the person who had full information on the subject and knew how to write the paper in the proper manner and in conformity with the prescribed form of the association; and he directed that his will be made out, and that the insurance should be given to his wife. The officer wrote out the instrument as directed. In compliance with our statute, it was written in the presence of the testator, and at his express direction. Such express direction followed and was obedient to the request by Armstrong contained in the words, "Fill out my will to my wife."

Armstrong could neither read nor write. This was known to Ward, and Ward intended to write every word necessary in the blank form in the will, including the signature of Armstrong. He knew that this was contained in the request made of him to fill out the will. Armstrong gave him all necessary information to enable him to prepare the paper. It is hardly possible that Armstrong knew the meaning of all the formal words used in making the bequest. It was sufficient for him to know that he was designating his wife as beneficiary in the will. He depended upon the man, the officer of the association, who had superior knowledge, and who had special capacity to do what he desired. The will was properly attested by the witnesses, when it was then handed back to Armstrong. All the parties, the testator and the witnesses, understood that it was a completed and executed instrument, and it was so afterwards dealt with. Armstrong delivered it to his wife, the beneficiary. She had it in her possession and before her in her room, so that it could be easily seen by all. No one afterwards questioned the sufficiency of the execution of the paper. In fact, the record discloses that it was duly proved by the testimony of the subscribing witnesses, and admitted to probate in accordance with the provisions of the statute. The execution further complied with the provisions of the statute, by the attestation by two witnesses in the presence of the testator.

The Mississippi statute does not state where the signature of a testator to a will shall be located. It does not say that the will shall be signed or subscribed at the end thereof. As the statute is silent as to the place of signature, and merely provides that the will shall be in writing and signed, we believe the rule that it is immaterial where the signature of the testator should be placed on the instrument should be followed in this state. It seems clear that it was the intent of the testator to make and execute this instrument as his will, for the purpose of designating his wife as the beneficiary in his insurance certificate. We therefore decide that the instrument is sufficiently executed, and is a valid will under the law.

We have not entered into any statement or discussion of the pleadings in this case, as we have not deemed it necessary to do so. The Masonic Benefit Association, by an interpleader, admitted its indebtedness under said insurance certificate, in the sum of $700. It is contended by the appellees that the will was not sufficiently executed, and therefore invalid, and that the amount due under the benefit certificate descended to the heirs at law of John Armstrong, who are the appellant, his widow, and the appellees, his children by former marriage. The chancellor decided this issue in favor of the appellees, holding that the will was not the true and last will of John Armstrong. We conclude that the court erred in doing this.

The case is therefore reversed, and judgment entered here in favor of the appellant, and dismissing the original bill of the appellees.

LUCY E. COUCH, Resp't.,
v.

KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(— Mo. — , 158 S. W. 347.)

Damages — destruction of meadow.
The measure of damages for destruction of a meadow by fire is the cost of reseeding it plus the rental value of the property during the time its owner is deprived of crops therefrom by reason of the fire.

(June 28, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Vernon County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the destruction of plaintiff's meadow by fire set out by defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Brown, P. J.:

Plaintiff recovered a judgment for $193.50 for 22 acres of meadow and 27 rods of fence which defendant destroyed by permitting fire to be communicated from its engines to said meadow. The evidence quite clearly proves the quantity and value of the meadow and fence destroyed, and that the defendant's agents caused the fire by permitting sparks to escape from its engines. The roots of the meadow were destroyed so that it became necessary to reseed same. There was some evidence tending to prove that a reseeded meadow would not yield a full crop of hay the first season after such reseeding. The only issue urged here for reversal of the judgment is the instructions of the trial court which authorized a recovery for the expense of reseeding the meadow and the rental value of the land during the time plaintiff was or will be deprived of crops of hay therefrom by reason of the fire. The appellant contends that the real measure of plaintiff's damages is the depreciation in the value of her land (the injury to the inheritance) caused by burning her meadow.

Messrs. Cyrus Crane and H. C. Clark, for appellant:

Where grass roots are destroyed, the injury is to the inheritance; the measure of damages being the difference in the value of the land before and after the fire.

Messrs. Scott & Bowker for respondent.

Brown, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal was submitted to the Kansas City court of appeals, which affirmed the judgment of the trial court through an able opinion by Broadbudd, Judge. 141 Mo. App. 256, 124 S. W. 1077. The case was, however, transferred to this court because the opinion filed therein conflicts with several opinions of the St. Louis court of appeals prescribing a different rule for ascertaining damages of this character.

The decision of the Kansas City court of appeals affirming the judgment is well sustained by its own prior rulings. Adam v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 139 Mo. App. 204, 122 S. W. 1136; Doty v. Quincy, O. & K. C. R. Co. 136 Mo. App. 254, 116 S. W. 1126; Knight Bros. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 122 Mo. App. 38, 98 S. W. 81; and Mattis v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 138 Mo. App. 61, 119 S. W. 998. While, on the other hand, the views of appellant are ably supported by the St. Louis court of appeals. Wiggins v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 119 Mo. App. 492, 95 S. W. 311; Wiggins v. St. Louis, M. & S. E. R. Co. 129 Mo. App. 369, 108 S. W. 574; and Carter v. Wabash R. Co. 128 Mo. App. 57, 106 S. W. 611. So it becomes our duty to finally determine what shall be the rule throughout the state for measuring damages caused by the burning of meadows.

Something could be said in favor of each method of ascertaining such damages. The appellant insists that the method adopted by the trial court, and sanctioned by the Kansas City court of appeals, for ascertaining damages in this class of cases, is too much a matter of conjecture or speculation.

It is a cardinal rule that when damages are awarded against anyone such damages must be actual and real,—not conjectural or speculative. This, however, is only an abstract rule of law; a general guide to be followed so long as it promotes justice, and to be put aside when it leads in the opposite direction. It would be difficult, indeed, to find a rule of law upon which the courts have not found it necessary to ingraft some modification or exception. It is a settled rule of law that, in actions for personal injuries, recoveries may be had for loss of time and physical pain which a plaintiff will suffer after the trial and judgment. Sotabier v. St. Louis Transit Co. 203 Mo. 702, 102 S. W. 651. Such future suffering is usually proven by expert medical testimony, which, experience has taught us, is not infallible, but sometimes amounts only to conjecture or speculation. Other incidents of the allowance of speculative or uncertain damages could be cited if necessary. Smith v. Sedalia, 244 Mo. 107, 149 S. W. 597.

It is true no one can examine a meadow in October, or even in March, and determine how much hay it will yield the following season. A drought (and in some cases a flood) may destroy it entirely. This does not signify that because a meadow, like most any other crop, is uncertain, it has no standard of value, and that one who negligently destroys same cannot be made to respond in damages.

Men are willing to rent meadows or buy the product thereof before any hay is in sight, the same as they are willing to buy young pigs and assume the risk of such animals growing to a size when they will be suitable for food. Therefore the fact that people are willing to and do rent meadows when there is no matured hay thereon gives them a rental value, though their real value is only prospective or speculative.

The rule for measuring the damages adopted by the trial court in this case should not be condemned because it possesses some elements of uncertainty.

The rule announced by the St. Louis court of appeals for ascertaining the value of meadows may, and no doubt usually does, promote justice; but we consider it more cumbersome and more likely to cause a miscarriage of justice than the other rule.

To ascertain the damage to the inheritance by the burning of a meadow, it is necessary to find out what the land was worth with the meadow, and then ascertain what its value is after the meadow is destroyed. A meadow may possess several elements of value to the owner thereof. Just how many, we do not judicially know; but we do take judicial notice that meadows are sometimes valuable to prevent the soil from washing and also to give the soil a rest from grain crops. Therefore farmers incur an expense in growing meadows which they would not incur for the hay crop alone.

The value of farm land can be ascertained with a fair degree of certainty, provided there are any such lands for sale in the locality where it becomes judicially necessary to find out their value; but the number of persons in a given locality who possess a correct knowledge of the value of lands is insignificant compared with those who know the value of meadows or the rental value of meadows, for the simple reason that nearly every farmer has some meadow and knows the market value of the product thereof. Why investigate the value of the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

land when only the value of a natural product thereof—something that can soon be reproduced—is in issue? Placing in evidence the value of the land upon which a meadow grew tends, to some extent, to inject a collateral issue into the case and thereby befog the minds of the triers of fact. State v. Reed, — Mo. —, 157 S. W. 316.

The rule announced by the Kansas City court of appeals for measuring the value of meadows recommends itself to us, because under that rule the evidence of the value or lack of value of such property is more readily obtainable, and we believe it is more likely to produce actual justice than the rule announced by the St. Louis court of appeals.

The appellant complains that the plaintiff was not restricted by the instructions to such damages as she would sustain by the loss of one hay crop through the burning of her meadow. No error was committed on that point. Some of the meadow was burned in the fall and some of it in March. There was evidence tending to prove that it was usually impossible to secure a full crop of hay the first season after reseeding a meadow. The defendant introduced no evidence.

There is nothing in this record which indicates that the verdict was excessive.

The judgment is affirmed.

Subrogation — defalcation by officer — right of surety.

The principal case, in holding that a which it paid the certificates to return the amount paid, because the certificates were void.

(May 7, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of District Court for Silver Bow County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover an amount received by defendant from the county upon fictitious jurors' certificates held by it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walsh, Nolan & Scallion, for appellant:

The county could have recovered from the bank every dollar paid to it upon the certificates.

3 Randolph, Com. Paper, 1486; Hathaway v. Delaware County, 185 N. Y. 368, 13 L.R.A.

surety on the bond of the county clerk, who was compelled to reimburse the county for money paid out on fictitious jurors' certificates which the clerk had issued, was not entitled to subrogation to the right of the county to compel a bona fide holder to which it paid the certificates to return the amount paid, because the certificates were void, finds support in National Surety Co. v. Arosin, 117 C. C. A. 313, 198 Fed. 605, where it was held that the surety on the bond of a county auditor which paid to the county the amount which it had paid upon non-negotiable tax refunding certificates issued by the deputy auditor in favor of fictitious payees and sold by him to a bank was not entitled to be subrogated to the right of the county to maintain an action for money had and received against the bank, to recover the amount so paid, where there was nothing in the transaction to excite the suspicion of the bank.

This is a later appeal in National Surety Co. v. State Sav. Bank, to which the former note was attached, where it was held that the surety was entitled to subrogation on the theory that the bank was grossly negligence in failing to inquire as to the genuineness of the certificates and indorsement; but at a subsequent trial it appeared, for the first time, that no negligence could be charged to the bank in failing to make such inquiry.

And the right of subrogation was also denied in American Bonding Co. v. Welts, 113 C. C. A. 598, 193 Fed. 978, where a bonding company which was surety upon the bond of a county auditor who became a defaulter and embezzler to the county's loss sought to be subrogated to the county's rights and remedies against the treasurer and county commissioner, on the alleged ground that the loss was occasioned by their negligence. By the statute under which the bond was given the obligation assumed by the bonding company for the faithful and honest acts of the auditor was not only for the benefit and protection of the county, but also for that of all others who might be injured by the breach of the conditions of the bond, and among such ones were the treasurer and commissioners; and the court held that to permit the bonding company to be subrogated to the county's rights against them would be to permit the surety to recoup a loss out of those for whose benefit in part the surety company assumed the obligation, which, the court said, would be to put the doctrine of subro-gation to a case wholly foreign to its nature.

But where a deputy sheriff failed to account to the state and county for taxes collected by him, a surety, upon payment of his defalcation, was held in Hill v. Fleming, 128 Ky. 201, 107 S. W. 764, 16 Ann. Cas. 840, to be subrogated to the rights of the state and county, and of the sheriff, against a fund impressed with a trust in favor of the county or state. In this case the deputy sheriff deposited the taxes collected and drew a check on that account in payment of personal indebtedness, signing the check with his name followed by the words "deputy sheriff;" and it was held that the surety company was entitled to pursue and reclaim the proceeds of this check. The court stated that the check itself gave payee notice of the drawer's official position, and it further notified him that the funds upon which the check was drawn were deposited to the drawer's credit as deputy sheriff, and it therefore considered that it was the payee's duty to make inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the funds transferred by the check belonged to the drawer individually or to the state and county. Failing to do this, the amount of the check was received and impressed with a trust in favor of the state and county.

And the surety on a bond of the county treasurer, which pays the amount of such treasurer's defalcation, is subrogated to every right that the county has to bring suit against the bank to recover the amounts of checks upon funds of the county, signed in the name of the county, which were paid upon the treasurer's personal indebtedness to the bank. Northern Trust Co. v. First Nat. Bank, — N. D. —, 140 N. W. 705. The court stated that there was no escaping the presumption that the bank, in receiving these checks, knew it was receiving the county's money unlawfully.

And also in Boaz v. Ferrell — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 200, where a tax collector commingled the tax money of the state and county and embezzled a part and paid the balance to the county, it was held that surety on the collector's bond to the state could, upon payment of the amount of the state's money embezzled, pursue the confused funds in the possession of the county, on the familiar principle that where the surety pays a debt of his principal the surety is entitled, on equitable principles, to all the securities and rights of the creditor.

The parties who actually got the money out of the treasury without any just right to it, are the ones who may be said to be primarily liable for the return of it, and the surety paying is unquestionably subrogated.

Holloway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Davies was the duly elected, qualified, and acting clerk of the district court of Silver Bow county. During a portion of that period W. P. Farrell was his chief deputy. The American Bonding Company of Baltimore was the surety on Davies' official bond. During the time Farrell was acting as deputy clerk he issued false and fictitious jurors' certificates, none of which bore the imprint of the official seal, and these certificates to the amount of $2,076 came into the possession of the State Savings Bank of Butte, and were by it presented to the county treasurer and paid. The fraudulent character of the certificates having been discovered, the county made demand upon the clerk of the district court and the bonding company, his surety, to repay the amounts which the county had paid out on such certificates, and, this demand having been refused, action was commenced by the county and prosecuted to favorable judgment, which judgment was affirmed on appeal by this court. Silver Bow County v. Davies, 40 Mont. 418, 107 Pac. 81. The bonding company having paid the judgment, which included the amount received by the State Savings Bank, took an assignment of any right of action which the county may have had against the bank, and thereupon commenced this action to recover from the bank the $2,076 which the bank had received from the county upon the fictitious certificates held by it. The complaint sets forth the foregoing facts somewhat more in detail, and concludes by alleging that the bank has not repaid or returned to the county or to the bonding company the $2,076 or any part thereof. To this complaint a demurrer was interposed and sustained, and plaintiff, electing to stand upon its complaint, suffered judgment to be entered against it and appealed. The only question presented for our determination is: Does the complaint state a cause of action in favor of the bonding company and against the bank?

The facts concerning Farrell's speculations and the character of the instruments which he issued will be found detailed at length in Re Farrell, 36 Mont. 254, 92 Pac. 785, and in Silver Bow County v. Davies, referred to in the statement above. Appellant insists that the certificates held by the bank were void, citing Re Farrell, above, and therefore the bank had no just claim against the county for their payment; that, having paid the bank the face value of the certificates, the county could have recovered back the money so paid in an action for money paid by mistake. To this extent appellant's contention may be conceded for the purposes of this appeal. It is further insisted that, since the county chose to proceed against the district clerk and the surety company, the surety on his official bond, to compel them to make good the county's loss, the surety company, upon paying the amount which the bank had received from the county, thereby became subrogated to the right which the county had to compel the bank to repay the amount which it had received. With this contention we do not agree. Furthermore, it must be conceded that, if the bank would have had a cause of action against the bonding company in case the county had refused to pay the fictitious certificates, then the bonding company cannot have a cause of action against the bank in this instance.

1. Assuming that the county of Silver Bow had a cause of action against the bank to recover back the money it paid out on the spurious certificates, it does not follow that by paying the county's loss the surety on the clerk's official bond became subrogated to the county's right. The doctrine of subrogation had its origin in the civil law. It has been adopted and invoked by courts of equity in order that justice may be done as nearly as possible. The application of the doctrine must therefore depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. When, therefore, this surety company seeks to be subrogated to the right which the county may have had against the State Savings Bank, it is necessary that something more be made to appear than that the bank could have been made to repay to the county the amount which it received upon the spurious certificates which it held. The surety company must show that as between it and the State Savings Bank, if either must suffer loss because of Farrell's peculations, in equity and good conscience the bank should be the one to lose. This is the rule recognized with practical unanimity. American Bonding Co. v. Welts, 113 C. C. A. 598, 193 Fed. 978; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co. (D. C.) 200 Fed. 443. Does this complaint show such a state of facts? We think not. There is not any charge of negligence or wrongdoing on the part of the bank in purchasing the certificates. So far as the complaint discloses, the bank acted in perfect good faith and was following a common custom in dealing in these certificates without their bearing the impress of the official seal. Some one must suffer now for Farrell's official misconduct. Shall it be the bank, which acted in good faith and parted with its money for the spurious certificates issued by Farrell, or shall it be the surety company, which for a compensation undertook to be responsible for Farrell's official delinquencies, not only to the state and to Silver Bow county, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) but to this bank as well? To such an inquiry a court of conscience can make but one answer. Upon the showing made in its complaint, the surety company has failed to show itself entitled to be subrogated to the right which the county may have had. Stewart v. Com. 104 Ky. 489, 47 S. W. 332. For this reason the complaint does not state a cause of action.

2. According to the allegations of this complaint, the State Savings Bank is in possession of and holds the legal title to the money which it secured from the county upon the fictitious certificates. At law this surety company would not have any right of action against the bank; but, to state a cause of action at all, it must allege such facts as will appeal to the conscience of a court of equity. If the equities of the respective parties are equally balanced, the position of the defendant, the possessor of the thing in controversy, is the better; in other words, the legal title added to its equity prevails over an equal equity which has no legal title to support it. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. §§ 727, 768; Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Clark, 203 U. S. 64, 51 L. ed. 91, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 19.

3. If the county had refused to pay the certificates held by the bank, would the bank have had a cause of action against the surety company for its loss? The surety company was responsible for Farrell's official misconduct (Rev. Codes, § 384) to any party injured thereby, and such party could maintain an action for his damages (§ 398). That it was Farrell's official misconduct which caused the county's loss has been judicially determined. Silver Bow County v. Davies, above; Ramsey County v. Sullivan, 89 Minn. 68, 93 N. W. 1056. If the county had refused to pay the certificates, the resulting loss to the bank would have been occasioned by the same acts of official misconduct (Stewart v. Com. above), and it is not any defense that, by omitting to stamp the impress of the seal upon the certificates, Farrell avoided punishment or set afloat securities which were invalid. Silver Bow County v. Davies, above. It would seem to follow, as of course, that the bank's right of action against the surety company under such circumstances would be absolute.

To sustain their contentions, counsel for appellant rely upon the decision in National Surety Co. v. State Sav. Bank, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 155, 84 C. C. A. 187, 156 Fed. 21, 13 Ann. Cas. 421. Bourne, the deputy auditor of Ramsey county, Minnesota, fraudulently issued spurious refunding orders on the county treasurer, procured the chairman of the board of county commissioners to authenticate them, indorsed the names of the fictitious payees, and then sold the orders to the State Savings Bank. The bank presented them for payment and received from the county their face value, with accrued interest. The fraud having been discovered, the county brought action against the auditor and the surety company, the surety on his official bond, and recovered. The surety company, having paid the county, commenced an action against the bank to recover the amount which the bank had collected from the county. A general demurrer to the bill was sustained. The surety company appealed to the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit. The majority of the court held that Bourne's personal, as distinguished from his official, misconduct would have been the proximate cause of the bank's loss had the county refused to pay the orders, and therefore the surety on the auditor's official bond could not be held responsible for such personal misconduct. But it was Bourne's official misconduct which called the spurious orders into existence. Ramsey County v. Sullivan, above. If he had issued them to real persons, but to persons not entitled to them, and such persons had negotiated them to the bank, there is not any question that the bonding company would have been liable to the bank for the injury sustained. Now by just what species of legal legerdemain Bourne's forgeries of the indorsements of fictitious payees, added to his wrongful act in issuing the spurious orders, could operate to relieve the surety company, is beyond our comprehension. It was further held that, since the orders were non-negotiable,—made so by statute for the very purpose of preventing misuse of them,—the bank was guilty of gross negligence in purchasing them without inquiry, and for that reason it could not have recovered from the surety company if the county had refused payment. But, as pointed out in the dissenting opinion of Judge Hook, there was not anything before the court to justify it in assuming the existence of such a state of facts. It was further decided that, since the bank had procured from the county upon these fictitious certificates money to which it was not entitled as against the county, the county might have recovered it back, and, since the county proceeded against the surety on the auditor's official bond and enforced payment, the surety company became thereby subrogated to the right which the county might have exercised, to proceed against the bank, and this, too, without any apparent consideration of the relative equities of the respective parties. Upon each of the questions decided Judge Hook dissented, and in our opinion his position upon each question is unassailable. It is also worthy of note that this case was remanded to the district court for further proceedings; that answer was filed, issues joined, the cause tried, and judgment rendered in favor of the bank on the merits. The surety company again appealed; but this time the same circuit court of appeals (two of the judges being different persons) affirmed the judgment (National Surety Co. v. Arosin, 117 C. C. A. 313, 198 Fed. 605), and held that the bank was not guilty of negligence in purchasing the orders, and that it was Bourne's official misconduct in manufacturing the orders which was the primary cause of the loss. Nothing is said upon the question of subrogation. In our opinion there is not any substantial difference in the facts disclosed upon the trial and those appearing upon the face of the bill in the first appeal, and that the decision upon the second appeal ought to be treated as overruling the decision of the majority upon the first appeal. But, whether it be so considered or not, we decline to follow the majority opinion upon the first appeal as unsound and as opposed to the decided weight of authority.

The complaint does not state a cause of action, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Scope.

This note does not include cases of fire and marine insurance policies which incidentally insure against loss by thieves, etc.

As to loss by theft during fire, see note to Farmers' & M. Ins. Co. v. Cuff, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 892.

As to insurance covering automobiles, including risks on account of theft, see note accompanying Harris v. American Casualty Co. 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 70.

It has been thought that it would be useful to collect all the cases dealing with insurance against burglary and theft, whether the questions involved related distinctively to this point of insurance, or depended upon principles and rules relating to insurance in general. Many of these principles and rules are treated in their relation to other kinds of insurance in notes referred to in the index to notes, under the title "Insurance."

I. Introduction.

With the enlarging of the scope of the insurance business and its branches, policies indemnifying against losses by burglary, theft, and larceny have become common. And such policies are upheld and given effect by all courts.

In the construction of such policies the general principle that contracts of insurance will be liberally construed in favor of the insured is applied. Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. v. State Bank, 80 C. C. A. 32, 150 Fed. 78; Casner v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. 161 Mo. App. 354, 91 S. W. 1001; Duschenes v. National Surety Co. 79 Misc. 232, 139 N. Y. Supp. 881.

II. Indemnity against theft or burglary as insurance.

In Re Solebury Mut. Protective Soc. 3 Del. Co. Rep. 139, it was held that the concern for which a charter was sought was an insurance company where the application set forth that its purpose was "the recovery of property that may be stolen from its members, and, in the event of a failure to recover such property, to pay to the loser such part of the value thereof as the company may hereafter determine and set forth in its by-laws. If a member may meet with loss for which the company is liable, and the property shall not be found and returned to the owner, a tax sufficient to raise the required amount shall be assessed equally upon the members."

And it has been held that a company formed to afford mutual indemnity and protection to its members in case of loss by accidents, death, and theft of horses, mules, jacks, and jennies used for private purposes carries on an insurance business, although one of its circulars states that it does not sell insurance or receive premiums, and there is no accumulated fund out of which to pay losses, but assessments are relied upon for this purpose and that of keeping up the organization, and no persons but members are entitled to share in the benefits. State v. Vigilant Ins. Co. 30 Kan. 585, 2 Pac. 840.

III. Power to issue burglary insurance.

Insurance against burglary is impliedly authorized under § 1695 of McClain's Code, 248, 15 Times L. R. 230; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ballard County Bank, 134 Ky. 354, 120 S. W. 301; First Nat. Bank v. Maryland Casualty Co. 162 Cal. 61, 121 Pac. 321, Ann. Cas. 1913 C, 1170.

Where the policy applies only to cases where entrance to a safe is made by tools or explosives, the limitation is one as to liability, and recovery cannot be had if the entry was effected by other means, even although there is no question of the fact of the burglary.

Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ballard County Bank, 134 Ky. 354, 120 S. W. 301; First Nat. Bank v. Maryland Casualty Co. 162 Cal. 61, 121 Pac. 321, Ann. Cas. 1913 C, authorizing companies to insure houses, buildings, and all other kinds of property against loss or damage by fire or other casualty. Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 131 Iowa, 456, 108 N. W. 1046. The court said: "As will be noticed the effect of the statute, as applied to this case, will be determined very largely on the scope of the meaning we may give to the words 'other casualty.' 'Casualty' and 'casualty insurance' are words of quite frequent use, yet it cannot be said that their definition has been very accurately settled by the courts. Strictly and literally 'casualty' is perhaps to be limited to injuries which arise solely from accident, without any element of conscious human design or intentional human agency; or, as it is sometimes expressed, inevitable accident,—something not to be foreseen or guarded against. (Standard Dictionary.) But in ordinary usage, 'casualty,' like 'accident,' is quite commonly applied to losses and injuries which happen suddenly, unexpectedly, not in the usual course of events, and without any design on the part of the person suffering from the injury. Nor does the fact that the conscious or intended act of some other person produces it take from such injury its character as an accident or casualty."

And it was held in this case that where the language employed in a statute authorizing insurance is ambiguous, the contemporaneous construction placed thereon by the executive and administrative authorities who are charged with the duty of applying and enforcing it should be given weight, and in holding that the statute in question authorized insurance against loss by burglary, the court took into account the fact that the state auditor had issued a certificate to the insurer under the authority of the statute, in which it was recited that the company was given authority to transact a burglary insurance business. Ibid.

It has been held that a corporation whose purpose is limited to the recovery of or payment for stolen property, without any avowed purpose for the punishment of the 1170; Brill v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 113 N. Y. Supp. 476.

Mr. Ernest Hall, for respondents:

The visible evidence required by the policy was the opening of the door, which was seen by the plaintiffs' clerks.

Tickner v. People, 6 Hun, 657; McCourt v. People, 64 N. Y. 583; People v. Bush, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 552; People v. Gartland, 30 App. Div. 534, 52 N. Y. Supp. 352.

When a policy is written and prepared by an insurer, and it had its choice of language in stating the contract, it must be held to the rule common in construing all contracts, that the terms thereof are to be perpetrators of the crime, is against public policy. Re Solebury Mut. Protective Soc. 3 Del. Co. Rep. 139. The court said: "The court would be placed in the attitude of incorporating a society, the object of which would be a return of stolen property to the owner, at the expense to the public of permitting a thief to escape punishment. It would be construed an invitation to the worst classes to prey upon the community which fostered a corporate organization with powers extending no farther than to recover property stolen from its members, or reimburse them for the loss, regardless of the apprehension and punishment of the thieves. Under the proposed charter, the company would not be authorized to assess its members to pay a reward for the arrest of a horse thief, nor to bear the expenses of his prosecution in the criminal courts. We do not believe the petitioners themselves intend to form such an easy-going corporation, or that they would be content with such a charter. The proposal does violence to our notions of the old-fashioned horse companies organized for the 'pursuit of horse thieves and other villains.'"

The power to issue a policy of burglary insurance cannot be challenged in an action on a premium note, where the company has adopted articles of incorporation expressly assumed to transact the business of burglary insurance, and has secured from the proper authority a finding that such business is authorized by statute, and that its organization is sufficient for such purpose. Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 131 Iowa, 456, 108 N. W. 1046.

IV. Right to do business in foreign states.

Where there is no legislation prohibiting a foreign insurance company from carrying on the business of a surety company and that of burglary insurance, it may by comity engage in these lines of insurance, restricted only by its charter provisions and such regulations or conditions as the legislature has enacted relating to construed strictly against the person whose language is used in expressing it.

It was held in this case that the duty of the commissioner to perform the ministerial duty of issuing the license might be enforced by a petition for mandamus. Ibid.

V. Making contract.

While the effect of the acceptance of a policy of burglary insurance is a question of law, the question whether one has or has not been accepted is a question of fact for the jury. Manson v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 128 App. Div. 577, 112 N. Y. Supp. 886, affirmed without opinion in 199 N. Y. 590, 93 N. E. 1124.

So the question of whether a policy of burglary insurance has been accepted by the plaintiffs is for the jury, where the defendant's agent testified in effect that the plaintiffs continually asserted that they had not made up their minds whether they would accept the policy, and the plaintiffs' evidence was that the defendant's agent was told by them that unless he heard from them after they had received a letter instructing them in regard to making proofs of loss, he could rest assured that the policy was all right, and it appeared that the policy had remained in the plaintiffs' possession for over two months and until a loss occurred. Ibid.

In Roberts v. Security Co. [1897] 1 Q. B. 111, 66 L. J. B. N. S. 119, 75 L. T. N. S. 531, 45 Week. Rep. 214, where, in pursuance of a proposal for burglary insurance, a policy was duly executed by sealing and the attaching of the signatures of the directors and secretary, and the policy expressly stated that the premium had been paid, it was held that a completed contract resulted, although the policy at the date a loss occurred remained in the insurer's possession and the premium had not been paid, and although the policy contained a provision that no insurance, by way of renewal or otherwise, should be held to be effected until the premium due should have been paid.

VI. Property covered.

It has been held that where a policy expressly insures the plaintiff's jewelry, including her rings and money, a recovery may be had in case the property is taken from a safe, although the policy contained a schedule for a statement of the amount of insurance carried on property contained in a safe, which the parties had left blank. Caser v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. 116 Mo. App. 354, 91 S. W. 1001.

VII. Conditions and warranties.

a. In general.

It was held in Springarn v. National Surety Co. 76 Misc. 248, 134 N. Y. Supp. 817, that a plea of due performance of the conditions of the policy in a complaint in an action based on a burglary policy could not be considered as a plea of non-violation of any of the prohibitory clauses of the policy.

It has been held that a policy of burglary insurance issued to a trucking company is rendered void by the insured's false warranty that the men in charge of

Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L.R.A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758, 20 N. E. 347.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover under a so-called burglary insurance policy for loss of goods stolen from plaintiffs. Concededly the policy extended insurance upon the goods in question against burglary under certain conditions; and it will only be necessary to give close consideration to two clauses for the purpose of determining whether those conditions have been complied with. The first of these sets forth that the indemnity was granted "for direct loss by burglary of any of the merchandise described in the schedule . . . occasioned by its felonious abstraction from the store, warehouse, office, loft, or rooms, . . . occupied by the assured in the manner set forth in the schedule, by any person or persons who have made forcible and violent entrance upon the premises, or exit therefrom, of which force and violence there shall be visible evidence." The second clause, found among the so-called "special agreements," provides: "The company shall not be liable (1) unless there are visible marks upon the premises of the actual force and violence used in making entry into the said premises or exit therefrom."

The facts leading up to and constituting the alleged burglary, for which, thus far, a recovery has been allowed, were as follows: At about 7:30 in the morning, two of plain-its conveyances were bonded by a fidelity company. Orr Trucking & Forwarding Co. v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 77 N. J. L. 749, 73 Atl. 541.

b. Other applications or losses.

It has been held that in an action on a burglary policy in which the insured warranted that he had never been refused burglary insurance, and had applied for none other than as stated, evidence is admissible on behalf of the insurer that the broker authorized by the insured to obtain insurance had, on the latter's account, previous to the issuing of the policy in question, applied for and had been refused similar insurance by other companies, although the insured personally had no knowledge of these facts. Wolowitch v. National Surety Co. 152 App. Div. 14, 136 N. Y. Supp. 793. The court said: "It may seem hard to hold an applicant as upon a warranty of a statement which, at the time he made it, was true, and of the falsity of which at the time of the issuance of the policy he had no knowledge. But want of knowledge does not relieve against a warranty. It imputes absolute verity at the time that the policy is issued. It is on the faith thereof that the company acts. In this particular branch of insurance, embracing really a moral risk, this warranty is especially a material one. The insurance broker was clearly the agent of the plaintiff for the purpose of obtaining insurance from any company he could. Acting for his principal, he was bound to disclose to defendant company the truth as he knew it as to this very material representation. I think that, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff may have known nothing of these rejections, as the company issued its policy relying upon the truth of the warranty, based upon the application to it, presented by the plaintiff's agent, he was bound. His agent was fully and duly authorized to obtain insurance. Therefore his acts and conduct in the prosecution of the precise agency which he was authorized to conduct, the obtaining of the policy at bar, were plaintiffs. It follows that the refusal to admit the evidence of prior rejections was error requiring reversal."

A claim by the insurer in an action on a burglary policy that the insured had made an incorrect statement in answer to the question whether any burglary or theft had been suffered by him is purely defensive, and the insured is not compelled to meet it at any earlier stage of the pleadings than the filing of his reply. Kandar v. Etna Indemnity Co. 30 Ohio C. C. 260.

c. Protection of property.

In Axe v. Fidelity & C. Co. 239 Pa. 569, 86 Atl. 1095, it was held that a provision in a policy of insurance against burglary of the occupants of the fourth floor of a building, which stipulated for the employment of a private watchman within the premises when not open for the transaction of business, required a watchman on the floor occupied by the assured; and it was held that the maintenance of a watchman in the building who had no direct access to the room where the insured property was situated was insufficient.

In Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. v. State Bank, 80 C. C. A. 32, 150 Fed. 78, it was held that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that there was no breach of the warranty in a burglary policy that the door of a safe was 5 inches thick, where there was testimony that the door, considered with certain rings, might properly enough be spoken of as a 5 inch door by one who was not an expert, although an expert would not reach such a conclusion.

d. Change in risk.

No change in "the conditions or circumstances of the risk" within the meaning of a burglary insurance policy results from the insured permitting workmen in his house for the purpose of painting and relaying floors, without first obtaining the insurer's written consent, where tried servtiffs' employees went to plaintiffs' warehouse or loft for the purpose of opening the same and preparing for the day's business. They unlocked and opened the outer door, and, after entering, closed the same, but did not lock it, and thus left it so that it could be opened by merely turning the knob. While they were engaged in their duties, two persons opened the door with pistols in their hands, and, after assaulting the employees, took and carried away a large amount of silks. It does not appear whether the wrongdoers closed the door behind them as they entered; but they did so close it when they left. The question, of course, is whether these wrongful acts constituted a burglary or offense which satisfied the requirements of the policy, and I shall consider them simply in connection with the two provisions which have been quoted.

Taking up the first one, I doubt whether the words "forcible and violent entrance upon the premises, or exit therefrom," were intended merely to define an element in the crime of burglary, as it has been defined by the common law and by various statutes, and whether, therefore, their meaning is to be measured by reference to the meaning of such words as "break" and "forcibly break," as these words have been construed in such definitions of this crime, and which construction demanded only a very small degree of force in entering premises. The clause, which we have before us, first enumerates direct loss by "burglary,"—a crime fully described by that single word,— ants remained in the house, and the insured or some member of his family slept there except on Saturday and Sunday nights, when they were in the country. Graf v. National Surety Co. 146 App. Div. 782, 131 N. Y. Supp. 548, reversing 70 Misc. 243, 126 N. Y. Supp. 616. The court said: "There can be, we think, but one answer to this proposition, and that is the negative. If it appeared that the plaintiff had wholly turned the house over to workmen, a different question might be presented; but that was not the case made by the evidence. The plaintiff's tried servants remained in the house, and plaintiff himself or some member of his family slept in the house except on Saturday and Sunday nights, when they were in the country. To apply the rule contended for by the defendant would amount to holding that in the case of burglary insurance upon a dwelling house, the policy would be avoided whenever any workman such as a plumber or gas fitter was called in to make repairs."

e. Keeping books.

It is a common provision of burglary policies that no recovery can be had thereon if the books and accounts of the insured are not so kept that the loss can be accurately determined therefrom.

The purpose of such a clause is to protect the insurer against an excessive claim; and it is not available to defeat a claim the amount of which is not in dispute. Leiman v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 111 N. Y. Supp. 536.

In determining whether "the books and accounts" kept are of the character required by a burglary insurance policy stipulating that it should be void if the books and accounts of the insured were not so kept that the actual loss might be determined therefrom, both the books of account and the invoices of the insured should be considered, and if the actual loss can be ascertained from these, the condition is satisfied. Schwarz v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 113 N. Y. Supp. 66.

So, where there is no question but that the accounts of the insured, together with certain invoices, constitute a compliance with the terms of a burglary policy requiring the keeping of books of account, the fact that the invoices mentioned were destroyed by fire after the burglary complained of will not preclude a recovery. Leiman v. Metropolitan Surety Co. supra. The court said: "It would be unreasonable so to hold. Suppose the burglars had stolen the books of account and invoices; could it be argued that the plaintiff could not recover upon his policy of burglary insurance? The law does not require that the insurance should be held to 'strict' compliance, but to such a compliance as is fair and reasonable under the circumstances."

But no recovery can be had under a burglary policy stipulating that the insurer should not be liable "if the books and accounts of the assured are not so kept that the actual loss may be accurately determined therefrom," where there is no evidence that the assured kept such books and accounts as this provision called for. Rosenberg v. People's Surety Co. 140 App. Div. 436, 125 N. Y. Supp. 257.

Or where it is impossible to determine from the insured's books the amount of a loss. Wolowitch v. National Surety Co. 152 App. Div. 14, 136 N. Y. Supp. 793; Pearlman v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 127 App. Div. 539, 111 N. Y. Supp. 882.

Where the complaint in an action on a burglary policy alleges that the plaintiff duly performed all the covenants and conditions on his part to be performed, he is not bound to reply to the insurer's answer alleging that the insured failed to keep books and accounts as required by the terms and conditions of the policy, since this is equivalent merely to a denial of the allegations of the complaint; but he is bound to reply to another answer setting up an avoidance by the fraud of the insured in exaggerating his claim by false answers. Eagle Waist Co. v. Ocean Acci. & G. Corp. 133 N. Y. Supp. 1031.

and it then adds that such burglary must have been committed in a certain way; namely, by a person who has made "forcible and violent" entrance upon the premises or exit therefrom. In thus specifying the particular manner in which the burglary must be committed, it seems to me that the language of the policy should receive its ordinary and common meaning, and that, in order to constitute burglary under this clause, there must be an entrance or an exit upon or from the premises, which is accompanied by such acts as would constitute force or violence in the ordinary acceptance of those words, rather than the somewhat technical force or breaking which would satisfy legal definitions. This view, however, is only of importance, if at all, as bearing upon the interpretation of the other clause to which attention has been called, because I shall assume, without consideration for the purposes of this discussion, that the wrongdoers did commit burglary, and that their entrance upon, and exit from, the premises, was accompanied by force and violence within the meaning of the policy, and that there was "visible evidence" thereof.

This brings us to the second provision, and which, as already stated, exempts the defendant from liability in the case of a burglary, "unless there are visible marks upon the premises of the actual force and violence used in making entry into said premises or exit therefrom." The language used in this clause emphasizes the idea al-

f. Warrant of arrest.

It has been held that the swearing out of a warrant is not a condition precedent under the provisions of a burglary policy stipulating that the assured shall, at the request of the insurer, swear out a warrant for the arrest of the offenders, since such action is obligatory only after request. Thomas Orr Trucking & Forwarding Co. v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 77 N. J. L. 749, 73 Atl. 541.

And it was held that where a plea of the defendant in an action on such policy averred a request and refusal, and concluded to the contrary, it precluded a reply which it was the insured's right to make, and that such plea, being informal, did not prevent his proving an excuse in avoidance of the provision. Ibid.

VIII. Manner of loss and proof thereof.

a. Absence of proof showing manner of loss.

As a rule, no recovery can be had upon policies indemnifying against loss by burglary, theft, or larceny where the evidence merely shows that property covered by the policy is missing.

Thus, the evidence in an action on a policy insuring against "direct loss by burglary, larceny, or theft," has been held insufficient to warrant a recovery where it showed only that on the morning of the date of the loss the plaintiff's wife placed a bag containing jewelry in a closet, locked the door, leaving the key therein, that she was absent until about 4:30 or 5 o'clock P. M.; that the plaintiff's servant was also out during the afternoon, and returned about half an hour before his wife; and that his wife went out again about 8 o'clock in the evening, and upon her return found the bag of jewelry missing, but there was nothing to show the manner in which the loss occurred. Schindler v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 58 Misc. 532, 109 N. Y. Supp. 723.

This case was followed in Gordon v. Aetna Indemnity Co. 116 N. Y. Supp. 558, where it was held that no recovery could be had under a policy insuring against burglary upon evidence that the owner placed a locket under a pillow in an upper bedroom in a house occupied by her family and two servants, and went downstairs and remained the entire day, and upon looking under the pillow at night, found it missing, and that the next morning the police, who were notified, searched the servants and their belongings, but were unable to find the property, and that it was still missing.

And a judgment for the plaintiff in an action on a burglary policy to recover for an earring claimed to have been stolen is not sustained by testimony that she was washing the earring when it slipped into the wash basin and disappeared through a hole which led into the drain pipe, that an employee of the apartment building was sent for, who opened the pipe in her presence, but was unable to find the earring, and that the next day plumbers were brought in, who opened the pipe on the floor below, but did not find the property, and one witness testified that there was a sieve in the pipe through which the earring could not fall, but also stated that it could not have gotten as far as the sieve, since such evidence merely shows the loss of the property, and not a larceny of it. Hart v. American Fidelity Co. 121 N. Y. Supp. 605.

And where a policy insuring against direct loss by "burglary, theft, or larceny" provided that the insured should produce direct and affirmative evidence that the loss of the property for which a claim was made was due to the commission of a burglary, theft, or larceny, and that its disappearance should not be deemed such evidence, no recovery can be had upon proof that the jewelry for which a recovery is sought was placed on the plaintiff's dresser in a hotel at night, that her husband left in the morning before she was awake, and that after she went to her room after breakfast she missed the jewelry, and had her apartment searched, but the property was not found. Duschenes v. National Surety Co. 79 Misc. 232, 139 N. Y. Supp. 881. The court said: "While the policy is to be construed liberally in favor of the ready suggested of real, rather than technical, force in breaking into the premises. When it speaks of the "actual force or violence" used in making entry into or exit from the premises, it employs words whose meaning is not easily satisfied by that somewhat theoretical force which has been held to meet the demands of legal definitions of burglary, but which rather requires substantial violence. Frequently, if not generally, the employment of such a degree of force and violence, in effecting an entry into premises, would leave traces upon the building which had been entered; and proceeding, perhaps on this theory, the clause exacts that that which might be a frequent occurrence shall be an indispensable basis of recovery, and formulates the requirement that there must be "visible marks upon the premises" of the force and violence which have been used, thus reaching and prescribing the condition which, in my opinion, stands as an effective bar to plaintiffs' recovery.

It is hardly claimed that there were left upon the building any visible marks, within the ordinary, common meaning of the words which have been quoted. It could not well be claimed that there were such. While, in a general sense, the entrance and exit of the wrongdoers were accompanied by force and violence, this force and violence were not manifested in the precise act of making an entry into, or departure from, the premises, but rather characterized what was done after the men had entered. All that it was necessary for them to do in entering the assured, I do not think that we can affirm this judgment without entirely disregarding this clause of the policy. No direct or affirmative evidence has been presented of any theft or larceny. We are asked to infer theft or larceny merely from the disappearance of the article from a place to which nobody but the plaintiff had lawful access. The purpose of the insurance was to provide only against loss by burglary, theft, or larceny, and the liability of the defendant was confined to reimbursement for such loss. In order to protect itself from claims under the policy for loss of the articles covered by the policy for reason of some other cause than burglary, theft, or larceny, the company has provided that the insured must produce not circumstantial but direct and affirmative evidence of the wrong. Parties may be mistaken in their recollection of where they placed a piece of jewelry, but they are not apt to be mistaken in recollection as to matters directly and affirmatively showing a felony, and the defendant could reasonably provide that there could be no recovery unless, in addition to the testimony of the disappearance of the jewelry, the insured should produce testimony of a direct and affirmative kind that there has been a felony."

In Thomas Orr Trucking & Forwarding Co. v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 77 N. J. L. 749, 73 Atl. 541, it was held that a motion for a nonsuit in an action on a burglary policy on the ground "that there was not sufficient evidence from which the jury could conclude that the loss happened in any manner covered by the policy" did not sufficiently bring the attention of the court to the contention of counsel that one of the cases claimed to have been lost was left unguarded on the sidewalk, in violation of the conditions of the contract.

b. Entries by the use of tools or explosives upon safes.

Another fact which must generally be established in an action for loss through the taking of property from safes is that the entry into the safe itself or the inner chest was accomplished by the use of tools or explosives thereon, since these policies ordinarily so limit the insurer's liability.

Thus, in Maryland Casualty Co. v. Ballard County Bank, 134 Ky. 354, 120 S. W. 301, it was held that a finding that an entry into the safe and inner chest was by tools directly applied thereto was not justified where the undisputed evidence was that access was had by taking employees to the bank at night, and compelling them at the point of a revolver to open the safe and inner chest, and the policy sued upon provided for liability only in case of entry to the safe or inner chest by the use of tools or explosives directly thereupon, or for loss by robbery from the part of the bank partitioned off when the regular working force was at work in the bank. The court said: "It is true that the word 'tool' has several meanings, and in one sense one person may be the tool of another. In this sense the cashier, in opening the safe and in opening the inner chest, was the tool of the robbers; but, when we read the whole policy, it is manifest that this is not the kind of tool that the policy contemplates. It is a burglary policy. The indemnity is for all loss by burglary of money, bullion, etc., by any person who shall have made entry into the safe by the use of tools or explosives directly thereon. Burglars' tools and explosives are evidently what the policy refers to. The insurance is in effect of the sufficiency of the safe against the tools and explosives of burglars. That it was not contemplated that the company should be liable where an officer of the bank was held up, as was done here, and no violence was done, is shown by the provision that the company is not to be liable for any robbery by hold-up unless the regular working force is at work in the bank. The insurance was not against all loss at the hands of burglars and robbers. The money was required to be put in the inner safe or chest, and the insurance company was not to be responsible unless there was a forcible entry by tools or explosives, not only into the safe, but also into the inner chest. Fairly construed, this policy does not cover a premises was to turn the knob and open the door, and when they left this was closed. There was no forcing of locks or doors, or any other act which left any mark upon the premises, unless the temporary and ordinary condition of an open door during business hours would constitute such mark, and this is not claimed. While it might be interesting to speculate on the exact nature of the signs of burglary which would satisfy the ordinary meaning of this clause, it is hardly useful to indulge in this speculation; but it is sufficient to say that in this case no such marks are found.

It is, however, urged that this requirement is of evidentiary facts which might be a protection against fraudulent claims, and that there is no necessity for such safe-loss by hold-up, where, after the money is put in the safe, and the working force of the bank has left, an officer of the bank is held up and required to open the bank and the safe."

So, where a policy undertakes to indemnify for loss from a burglar-proof safe containing an inner steel burglar-proof chest only when entry to the chest is effected by the use of tools or explosives, no recovery can be had where the evidence shows that entry to the inner steel chest was obtained by use of the combination, which had been secretly secured, although the outer safe was entered by the use of tools. First Nat. Bank v. Maryland Casualty Co. 162 Cal. 61, 121 Pac. 321, Ann. Cas. 1913 C 1170.

And evidence that there were some marks made with a file or some other instrument on the inside of the inner steel chest which would enable one to line up the dial on the inside of the chest does not show that an entry into the chest, accomplished through the working of the combination, was accomplished by the use of tools directly thereon, especially where it does not appear by whom such marks were made, or that they were used to obtain access to the chest. Ibid.

So, where a policy undertakes to indemnify against loss of money, etc., "in consequence of the felonious abstraction of the same by burglars from the safe or safes described in said schedule . . . after entry into such safe or safes by such burglars, effected by the use of tools or explosives directly thereupon," a complaint is sufficient which alleges that burglars broke into the building "and did then and there break into said safe by working the combination and lock on the outer door of said safe, and did then and there, by the use of tools and force, break into the money drawer on the inside of said safe, breaking the lock therefrom, and extracting said drawer from said safe," taking therefrom money, etc. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Sanders, 32 Ind. App. 448, 70 N. E. 167.

And a judgment for the insured is against the weight of evidence where the policy sued upon undertook to indemnify the plaintiff against the direct loss of property by its guard in the case of a claim whose merits are supported by ample testimony of another character; that the interpretation urged by appellant would prevent recovery in many meritorious cases; and therefore it should be rejected and some other one be adopted which will serve the insured. Doubtless the justice of the provision would be a subject for debate and disagreement between the parties to the contract. Quite possibly the interpretation which has been outlined might prevent recovery at times on bona fide losses. On the other hand, quite commonly an entrance into a building for burglarious purposes, which was accompanied by "actual force and violence," would not be made during business hours by opening an unlocked door, but would be felonious abstraction from a safe by persons who made a forcible or violent entrance into it by the use of tools or explosives directly thereupon and on the outside thereof, and further provided that the insured should not be liable for loss by burglary if there were no visible marks caused by the force and violence used in making an entrance or exit, and the evidence showed that the inner and outer doors of a safe which contained the money lost were properly locked on Saturday night, and that on Monday morning the handles on the outer and inner doors were turned and a false key was inserted in the lock of the inner door, and the money was gone, but there were no visible marks of force or violence except some scratches on the outside of the safe which the witness could not state were made in the forcible entrance of it, and, on the other hand, there was evidence showing that the combination was pasted on the front of the insured's desk. Brill v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 113 N. Y. Supp. 476.

And a finding for the insurer is properly directed in an action on a policy insuring against loss of property from safes which had been entered by the use of tools or explosives thereon, and also against damage done to the safes and furniture, caused by such an attempted entry, where there is nothing in the evidence to show that the person who broke into the bank intended to enter the vault or safe, and the only tool used was a hatchet to force a window, and there was nothing indicating that an attempt had been made to get into the vault, and no money or property was taken, although a fire had been set which burned a hole in the floor and destroyed the office furniture and fixtures, but was so far removed from the vault as to lead to the impression that it was not intended to be used to gain access to the vault. Mt. Eden Bank v. Ocean Acci. & G. Co. 29 Ky. L. Rep. 765, 96 S. W. 450.

The insurer in an action on a policy indemnifying only where the entry into the outer safe and the inside chest is obtained by the use of tools thereon is not estopped from claiming on appeal that the finding effected by methods which would leave marks upon the premises, which would be quite respectable evidence that a burglary had been committed within the indemnity of the policy. But these considerations on one side or the other are not before us in this case. If the parties to a contract adopt a provision which contravenes no principle of public policy, and contains no element of ambiguity, the courts have no right to relieve one of them from disadvantageous terms, which he has actually made, by a process of interpretation. It may be conceded that, if a policy of insurance is of doubtful tenor, the courts should employ that interpretation which is the more exacting against the insurer, who has prepared the contract. But if the contract is not of uncertain meaning, as has often been said, the courts may not make a new one under the guise of construction.

In this instance the insurer had a perfect right, if it saw fit, to require proof even of so-called evidentiary facts as an indispensable basis for recovery. The only inquiry can be whether the parties have assented to the incorporation in their agreement of a provision which clearly calls for such proofs of their alleged loss, which the plaintiffs have not furnished. We think they have. We believe that the requirement that the violence and force employed in effecting a burglarious entry into premises must produce "visible marks upon the premises" thus entered is plain beyond the need of argument, and that it means that that the inner chest was so entered is unsupported by the evidence because at the trial he did not object to evidence offered to show an entry into the "safe" or "safes," or ask for a nonsuit on the ground that the entry into the chest was the vital issue, or because no finding was asked for to distinguish between a safe and an inner chest, nor because the pleadings described the things burglarized as "safes." First Nat. Bank v. Maryland Casualty Co. 162 Cal. 61, 121 Pac. 321, Ann. Cas. 1913 C, 1170.

And the fact that the insurer questioned or disputed the method by which an entrance to the safe was effected, in an effort to show that even the entry into that was not effected by the use of tools, does not preclude it from insisting that even if entry into the safe itself was so effected, still, as it only assumed the risk of loss of money from the inner steel chest "after entry into such chest effected by the use of tools directly thereupon," it was not liable, as the entry into the chest was not so made. Ibid.

Where the object is first raised on appeal, an allegation that the "safes" of the insured were burglariously entered by the use of tools directly thereupon sufficiently alleges that the insured's "chest" was so entered, although the policy undertook to indemnify the insured for loss by burglary from the safe or safes described in the schedule, when entry into such safe or safes was by the use of tools or explosives directly thereupon, but stipulated that the insurer should not be liable for loss of property "from a burglar-proof safe containing an inner steel burglar-proof chest unless the same shall have been abstracted from the chest after entry also into the said chest, effected by the use of tools or explosives directly thereupon." Ibid.

versing [1898] 2 Q. B. 136, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 807, 46 Week. Rep. 557, 78 L. T. N. S. 813, 14 Times L. R. 435, where a policy undertook to insure against loss or damage by burglary and housebreaking "as hereinafter defined," and subsequently provided that the insured was to be protected against loss "by theft following upon actual forcible and violent entry upon the premises," it was held that the insurer was not liable for a loss which occurred by a thief turning the handle of the front door of the insured's store while his servant was temporarily absent, and entering and breaking open a locked show case, and taking property covered by the policy, since there was not an actual forcible and violent entry by the mere opening of the outer door, and the breaking open of the locked show case was not an entry upon the premises within the meaning of the policy.

In an action on a burglary policy in which it is claimed that the burglar entered by means of the transom over the door, evidence that other stores on the same street had been so entered at various times is irrelevant and inadmissible. Rosenberg v. People's Surety Co. 140 App. Div. 436, 125 N. Y. Supp. 257.

See also Rosenthal v. American Bonding Co. 143 App. Div. 362, 128 N. Y. Supp. 553, which affirmed 124 N. Y. Supp. 905, and which was reversed in ROSENTHAL v. AMERICAN BONDING CO.

d. Entering through collusion of insured's employee.

In Saqui v. Stearns [1910] W. N. 257, 27 Times L. R. 105, 55 Sol. Jo. 91, 103 L. T. N. S. 583, where a burglary policy provided that there should be no claim made for loss by theft, robbery, or misappropriation by members of the insured's household, business staff, or other inmates of his premises, it was held that no recovery could be had on account of goods stolen by thieves who gained admittance to the premises through the agency of a porter in the assured's employ, since the loss was held to be one the force and violence in "making entry" must create visible traces upon the premises themselves, which survive the act that produces them, and which, being seen, are evidence of a burglary; that it would be a distortion of the meaning of language to hold, as argued, that this provision is satisfied, under the circumstances of this case, by proof of acts performed by wrongdoers after entry, in assaulting occupants and carrying away the contents of a building which leave no marks "upon" the premises, and which are only visible to one who happens to be watching at the instant they are performed.

Various decisions have been called to our attention as authorities opposed to the construction which we feel obliged to adopt. They are decisions relating to life or accident-insurance policies; and, while it will not be desirable to review all of them, I shall briefly call attention to some of those most relied on by respondents, for the purpose of showing that they do not sustain their contention. Root v. London Guarantee & Acci. Co. 92 App. Div. 578, 86 N. Y. Supp. 1055, was an action to recover a death loss under an accident insurance policy excluding injuries "of which there was no physical mark on the body." The insured received injuries which produced no immediate outward signs upon the surface of his person, but subsequently he developed a pallor, emaciation, and physical decay; and it was held, as it seems to me very reasonably, that these visible, external signs of the accident satisfied the requirement of the by theft by a member of the assured's business staff.

IX. Notice and proofs of loss.

The provision of a burglary policy requiring proof of loss in writing, setting out the manner in which the loss occurred, and giving a detailed statement of the articles taken, is a material requirement, and where the pleadings put the making of such proof in issue, no recovery can be had in the absence of evidence that this provision was complied with. Reich v. Maryland Casualty Co. 54 Misc. 585, 104 N. Y. Supp. 984.

And the notices required by a burglary policy stipulating that the insured, upon the discovery of loss, shall give immediate notice thereof by letter and also by telegram to the company at the city where the policy was countersigned, and also immediate notice to the company's local authorized agent, and the nearest public police authorities, are distinct from the formal proofs of loss to be made out on the company's blanks, and where it is for the interest of the insurer to apprehend and punish the criminal, such provisions are valid, and render it incumbent upon the plaintiff in an action on the policy to prove compliance with them. Thomas Orr Trucking & Forwarding Co. v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 77 N. J. L. 749, 73 Atl. 541.

And under a policy insuring against "direct loss by burglary, larceny, or theft," and stipulating that upon the happening of a loss immediate notice shall be given the company or its agent and to the police, and that the insured shall forthwith present an itemized claim, and that the policy shall be void if the circumstances of the risk be materially changed without the written consent of the insurer, no recovery can be had where the evidence shows that certain property disappeared in the insured's absence while extensive alterations were being made, and that no notice of the changed conditions was given to the insurer, and no notice of the loss was given for over a month, when a meager proof of loss was filed and no information of the loss was given to the police for about three months. Katzenstein v. Fidelity & C. Co. 48 Misc. 496, 96 N. Y. Supp. 183.

Where a statute relating to foreign insurance companies prohibits the insertion of conditions requiring notice of loss forthwith or within less than five days after its occurrence, and stipulates that such conditions shall be void, provisions of a burglary policy stipulating for immediate notice of a burglary and for the furnishing of proofs forthwith are invalid, and the insured is bound only to use reasonable diligence in giving notice and furnishing proofs of loss. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Sanders, 32 Ind. App. 448, 70 N. E. 167.

In this case the following provisions were held to be conditions precedent, i. e., that the insured, upon the occurrence of a burglary, should give immediate notice to the insurer's agent or to the home office and to the police authorities; that in the event of a claim it should be made forthwith in writing, setting forth a particular account of the manner in which the burglary was committed, and the date the damage done to the property insured, the assured's interest in the property, and other concurrent or similar insurance. Ibid.

And it was also held that where the insured is required to give notice of a burglary and furnish proof of loss within a reasonable time after it occurs, his complaint should show that this was done, or an excuse for not so doing, and it was held that a complaint reciting the facts of the burglary, and averring that it occurred on a certain date, and "that afterwards" the insured gave notice of the loss, was insufficient where there was nothing in the pleading to indicate at what time between the occurrence of the burglary and the date of the bringing of the suit (about ten months afterward) the notice was given. Ibid.

And it was held that the statement that "afterwards the plaintiff duly notified the said defendant of said loss," even if it could be said to include both the notice of the burglary and the proof of loss, was no policy. Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L.R.A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758, 20 N. E. 347, was an action to recover a death loss under an accident policy of insurance, which provided for payment of a certain sum per week in case the insured was disabled from prosecuting his business, and also for the payment of a specified sum in case of death. The policy provided that the insurance should "not extend to any bodily injury of which there should be no external and visible sign upon the body of the insured." It was distinctly held, in upholding a recovery for death, that this proviso clearly had reference to a claim under the policy for a weekly indemnity, and therefore, of course, it had no application to the action at bar. Menneiley v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 148 N. Y. 596, 31 L.R.A. 686, 51 Am. St. Rep. 716, 43 N. E. 54, was a case involving facts largely similar to those in the one last referred to, and the policy contained a provision that it did not

"insure against death or disablement . . . from accidents that shall bear no external or visible marks." It will be noted that this requirement was not for external and visible marks on the body of the deceased; and the court, after stating that it was somewhat difficult to understand precisely what was intended by the clause, adopted the view that it should be construed as requiring some external or visible evidence that the death or injury was accidental; and, inasmuch as the facts appearing in that action amply satisfied this requirement, a recovery was upheld.

I think the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide event.

more than the conclusion of the pleader that the notice and proof made were such as the policy required, and was therefore insufficient. Ibid.

And it was further held that such complaint was insufficient on the ground that it failed to show that the insurer's refusal to pay was not after the contract was forfeited because of the insured's failure to give notice and file proofs within a reasonable time after the happening of the burglary. Ibid.

X. Necessity of showing plaintiff's interest in property lost.

No recovery can be had where the pleadings in an action on a burglary policy allege that the policy was issued to a third party, and was subsequently, with the consent of the insurer, transferred to the plaintiff, and that, on a certain date, property of the kind mentioned in the policy was stolen from the premises named therein, but no allegation is made that the goods stolen were the property of the plaintiff, or that he had possession of them or an insurable interest therein. Pearlman v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 127 App. Div. 539, 111 N. Y. Supp. 882.

XI. Insurer's right to replace property.

Under a policy undertaking to indemnify a bank against loss of money stolen from its safe, damage done to the safe, damage to premises, and loss of money violently taken from the bank in the daytime, in the aggregate sum of $3,000, although the insurer reserved the right to repair any damage to property, and replace any damaged article with one of like quality and value instead of paying for same in money, it cannot replace the damaged safe of the bank as part payment of its liability, where it appears that the safe was blown open and more than $3,000 was taken, and the bank made no claim for the damage done to the safe, but entered its claim for the loss of the money alone, since, by the terms of the contract, there was no provision made for apportioning the indemnity to the several subjects of the loss. Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co. v. State Bank, 80 C. C. A. 32, 150 Fed. 78.

XII. Amount of loss and recovery and proof thereof.

In an action on a policy issued to an express company, undertaking to indemnify it for the value of goods lost, the insurer cannot show the settlement made by the company with the one whose goods were stolen, since the benefit of such arrangement cannot accrue to the insurer. Monahan v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 114 N. Y. Supp. 862.

And where a burglary policy confines the insurer's liability to "the cash or market value of property at the time of the loss," it is error to admit in evidence a bill rendered to the insured for the loss of part of the property by the owner as proof of its value. Thomas Orr Trucking & Forwarding Co. v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 77 N. J. L. 749, 73 Atl. 541.

And where a burglary policy under an item marked "A" insured "$6,000 on gold and sterling silverware, watches, jewelry," etc., with a proviso that the liability "for the loss on jewelry and precious stones shall not exceed, under policies of this corporation, separately or together, the sum of $1,000 of the insurance attached specifically to item A," and by a special agreement it was further provided that the insurer should not be liable "for loss in excess of $250 on any one article unless otherwise indorsed on this policy," a recovery of only $250 can be had on account of the loss by the insured by burglary of a jeweled scarf pin worth $5,000, since, although it be assumed that the words "separately or together," in the clause limiting liability to $1,000, applies to "jewelry and precious stones," yet the loss for any one article is limited to $250 by the special agreement. Wormser v. General Acci. Assur. Corp. 94 App. Div. 213, 87 N. Y. Supp. 974.

It has been held that a clause in a policy insuring against loss by burglary, providing that "if the assured is the occupant of an apartment or flat house this insurance covers goods in a locked storeroom provided for the exclusive use of the assured by the landlord in the same house, to the extent of $50, and no more," does not limit the insured's right of recovery for goods packed and stored in the laundry assigned to him with his flat, and which was used for laundry purposes, and to some extent for cooking. Michaels v. Fidelity & C. Co. 128 Mo. App. 18, 105 S. W. 783.

Where the plaintiff's actual loss in an action on a burglary policy is not clearly shown, the amount of the loss is a question of fact for the jury; and it is erroneous to instruct that, if a finding was made for the plaintiff, it must be for a stated figure. Rosenberg v. People's Surety Co. 140 App. Div. 436, 125 N. Y. Supp. 257.

But a verdict of $100 in an action on a burglary policy cannot be justified on any ground where the uncontradicted evidence shows a loss of upward of $120 worth of certain goods, and a loss of other goods to a large amount. Ingersoll v. United Surety Co. 141 App. Div. 527, 126 N. Y. Supp. 391.

The amount of loss in an action on a policy of burglary insurance is properly proved by adding to the insured's last inventory all subsequent purchases, and from the result subtracting all the sales made and the actual inventory of the goods remaining after the burglary, and by subtracting the estimated profit in calculating the value. Ibid.

It is erroneous, however, to allow the plaintiff in an action on a burglary policy to read in evidence a carbon copy of a list of property claimed to have been taken, without producing or accounting for the original list of which the carbon purported to be a copy. Rosenberg v. People's Surety Co. supra.

In Manson v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 128 App. Div. 577, 112 N. Y. Supp. 886, affirmed without opinion in 199 N. Y. 590, 93 N. E. 1124, it was held that any error in permitting computation of the loss under a burglary policy from unverified figures on certain wrappers was cured where the plaintiff, without objection, showed on rebuttal that all the markings on the wrappers were absolutely correct.

Misc. 248, 134 N. Y. Supp. 817, it was held that an allegation in defendant's answer in an action on a burglary insurance policy that the insurer was relieved from liability by the insured's attempt to cheat and defraud by exaggerating his claim stated a valid defense.

XIII. Estoppel and waiver.

Generally as to estoppel and waiver, see Index to L.R.A. notes, "Insurance," §§ 130-144.

A company which has issued a burglary policy cannot escape liability in an action based thereon on the ground that the insured failed to disclose in his application that he had suffered a previous loss from a burglary at his warehouse, where the insurer's agent inquired only as to burglaries which had occurred at his residence, and stated that such losses were all that it was necessary for him to disclose. Kandar v. Etna Indemnity Co. 30 Ohio C. C. 280.

The insurer, by retaining the proofs of loss furnished under a burglary and larceny policy, and passing some of the claims for payment without objecting to the sufficiency of the proofs of loss, thereby waives their insufficiency. Monahan v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 114 N. Y. Supp. 862.

And in this case it was held that a provision requiring suit to be brought within a certain time was waived where the insurer had passed upon the claims and agreed to pay them.

And there is a waiver of defects in proofs of loss under a burglary policy where they are returned to the insured for correction, and, after receipt, are retained without objection, especially when the insurer denied liability on other grounds. Thomas Orr Trucking & Forwarding Co. v. Metropolitan Surety Co. 77 N. J. L. 749, 73 Atl. 541.

But an averment in an action on a burglary policy that "the defendant sent an adjuster to adjust the same, but said defendant refused to pay and indemnify the plaintiff for such loss," does not show a waiver of conditions requiring notice and proof of loss. Fidelity & Co. v. Sanders, 32 Ind. App. 448, 70 N. E. 167.

And a breach of warranty that the insured had never, prior to the issuance of the policy sued on, suffered loss by burglary, theft, or larceny, nor received indemnity therefor, is not waived because the insurer, after the insured had admitted the facts of the alleged loss, continued the examination, but did nothing to lead the insured to suppose that it did not intend to rely upon the breach, and the policy stipulated that the insured should submit himself to examination, and that the insurer should not be held to have waived any provision or condition by any act taken in connection with the investigation of any claim. Bacouby v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 61 Misc. 75, 113 N. Y. Supp. 20.

Where the plaintiff's pleadings in an action on a burglary policy allege a performance of all the conditions of the policy on their part, evidence to establish a waiver of the condition requiring proofs of loss is inadmissible. Reich v. Maryland Casualty Co. 54 Misc. 585, 104 N. Y. Supp. 984.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

BURNEY AXE, Appt.,
v.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY OF
NEW YORK.

(239 Pa. 569, 86 Atl. 1095.)

Insurance — against burglary — requirement of watchman on premises.

A provision in a policy of insurance against burglary of the occupant of the fourth floor of a building, which requires the employment of a private watchman within the premises when not open for the transaction of business, requires a watchman on the floor occupied by assured, and the maintenance of a watchman in the building who has no direct access to the room where the insured property is situated is not sufficient.

(March 17, 1913.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County, in defendant's favor notwithstanding a verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a burglary insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Julius C. Levi and David Mandel, Jr., for appellant:

The word "premises," as used in the contract sued upon, means, in its relation to the provision for a watchman, not the fourth floor of the building mentioned in the policy, but the building itself.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit on a burglary insurance policy issued by the defendant company to the plaintiff to insure him to the extent of $2,000 against direct loss by burglary of merchandise between April 29, 1910, and April 29, 1911, occasioned by its felonious abstraction from the premises occupied by him in the building known as 1023, 1025, and 1027 Race street, in the city of Philadelphia. The case was submitted to the jury and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff. On motion of counsel the court below entered judgment for the defendant non obstante veredicto. The plaintiff has taken this appeal.

The first clause of the policy provides that "in consideration of $50 premium, and of the statements in the schedule hereinafter contained, which statements the assured makes on the acceptance of this policy and warrants to be true," the company agrees to insure him against direct loss by burglary of merchandise occasioned by its abstraction "from the store or rooms actually occupied by the assured, and described in the said schedule (hereinafter called the premises)." Clause C of the "special agreements" provides that "the company shall not be liable . . . for loss or damage if the premises are occupied for any other purpose than that stated in the schedule." The "schedule" consists of a series of questions propounded by the company, with answers by the assured. Those material to the present issue are as follows: "(2) Location of building. 1023-25-27 Race street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. (3) The premises occupied by the assured are as follows: Fourth floor. (4) The business carried on by the assured in the said premises is: Manufacturing shirt waists and ladies' skirts. (5) No other business than that of the assured is carried on within the premises, except as follows: No exceptions. . . . (7) A private watchman is employed within the premises when not open for the transaction of business: Yes; Fox police lock. . . . (10) The service declared under each of the above heads (7, 8, 9) will be continued during the currency of this policy: Yes."

Clause 8 of the "general agreements" provides: "This policy shall be void of the conditions or circumstances of the risk are 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

materially changed without the written consent of the company, or if the assured attempts in any way to defraud the company, or if the policy is assigned without the written consent of the company."

The facts are undisputed. The plaintiff is a manufacturer of shirt waists and ladies' skirts, and carries on the business on the fourth floor of the six-story building used for various purposes, at 1023, 1025, and 1027 Race street, in the city of Philadelphia. The owner of the building employed a watchman to take care of this and another building at 1012 Race street. The watchman had been made assistant engineer the week before the burglary, and the chief engineer did whatever watching was done on the premises during the whole week in which the burglary occurred. The plaintiff did not employ any watchman, and had no personal knowledge of the temporary arrangement made by the owner of the building for the services of a watchman during the week the burglary was committed. The engineer undertook to perform the duties of watchman while taking steps to get another watchman. On the night of the burglary he examined the premises and saw that all the doors were locked and that the bottom step of the fire escape was pulled up. He did not go into the plaintiff's rooms, as the watchman never had keys to enter them. The plaintiff's rooms were entered by the door leading out therefrom to the fire escape between midnight on May 12, 1910, and 5 o'clock of the morning of May 13, 1910, and merchandise to the value of more than $2,300 was taken therefrom. This action was brought to recover the loss sustained by the burglary.

The defendant relied on a breach of the warranties contained in the policy to prevent a recovery for the loss. The learned court submitted to the jury to determine whether the plaintiff had complied with the conditions of the policy requiring him to employ a private watchman on the premises. The engineer who acted as watchman testified that on the night of the burglary he left the building about midnight and did not return until 5 in the morning, and that his absence was due to the fact that it was necessary for him to work during part of the day because he had to be with the new engineer, and that he went away to get some rest during the hours indicated.

The defense interposed by the defendant, and sustained by the learned court below was that (a) there had been a breach of warranty on the part of the plaintiff in not employing a private watchman on his premises as required by the policy; and (b) that at the time the burglary was committed the watchman was not present, either within the rooms of the fourth floor or within the building. In reply to this position the plaintiff, appellant here, contends that the word "premises," as used in the policy, means, in its relation to the provision for a watchman, not the fourth floor of the building, but the building itself; that the word "employed," as used in the policy, that a private watchman shall be employed, does not mean that the watchman shall be present during the entire time; and that the word "watchman," as used in the policy, does not mean one person personally present at the premises at all times, but means a person engaged in guarding the premises with the care usually exercised in fulfilling the duty of one looking after the premises. These are the questions which have been argued by counsel, and are now for consideration. The view we take of the case does not require us to discuss the second and third propositions suggested by counsel for the appellant.

We are of the opinion that the word "premises" means the fourth floor of the building, and not the building itself, and that the policy required a watchman to be kept within the premises when not open for the transaction of business.

The language of the policy defines the word "premises" so clearly and distinctly that there is no doubt or uncertainty as to the meaning with which the parties used it in the contract. The plaintiff occupied the fourth floor of the building; the other five floors being occupied by other tenants. The policy indemnifies the assured for "direct loss by burglary of merchandise . . . occasioned by its felonious abstraction from the store or rooms actually occupied by the assured, and described in the said schedule (hereinafter called the premises)." In the schedule the third statement is: "The premises occupied by the assured are as follows: Fourth floor." The second statement in the schedule: "Location of building: 1023-25-27 Race street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania." This clearly distinguishes the "building" from the "premises," as used in the policy. As further showing that the word "premises" meant the fourth floor of the building, and not the building itself, the fifth statement is: "No other business than that of the assured is carried on within the premises except as follows: No exceptions." There were many tenants occupying other parts of the building, but there was no other tenant occupying or carrying on business on any part of the fourth floor. The parties, therefore, have definitely settled by their own agreement the construction of the word "premises," and have applied it to "the store or rooms actually occupied by the assured," which is the fourth floor of the building on Race street. There is nothing in the case that will warrant any other construction. There being no ambiguity as to the meaning of the word as used in the policy, there is no occasion for applying any rules of construction in ascertaining its meaning.

Was there a private watchman employed within the premises when not open for the transaction of business at the time the agreement was entered into, or subsequently during the currency of the policy, as required by the contract? The policy stipulated that a private watchman "is employed within the premises when not open for the transaction of business," and that such service should "be continued during the currency of this policy." It will be observed that there were both an affirmative and a promissory warranty. If the word "premises" means the fourth floor of the building, and not the building itself, neither of these stipulations was complied with by the assured. We have already stated the undisputed facts from which it appears that, while the owner of the building employed a watchman for it and another building some distance away, there was no watchman employed within the fourth floor of the building. In fact, the watchman employed by the owner did not have keys to the doors entering the fourth floor, and hence did not have access to the premises occupied by the assured. There is no ground for the contention that the watchman provided by the owner of the building was a compliance with the provision in the contract that "a private watchman is employed within the premises." This provision was manifestly material to the risk. The evident purpose was that the assured should have a watchman whose services should be performed within the rooms on the fourth floor of the building occupied by him in his manufacturing business. Whether a watchman for the whole building was sufficient for the purpose of protecting every part of it or not is wholly immaterial. It is sufficient to say that the parties have clearly and distinctly stipulated that, as a part of the consideration for the contract between them, a watchman should be employed "within the premises" which the assured occupied in carrying on his business. What the language means is not open to conjecture. There is no ambiguity about it, and, unless the court undertakes to construe it in direct opposition to its plain and unequivocal meaning, we must hold the policy required a private watchman to be employed within the fourth floor of the building. That was not done, and the plaintiff cannot recover.

The judgment is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

CONSTANTINE J. McGUIRE, Appt.,
v.
MARGARET E. HUGHES, Resp't.

(207 N. Y. 516, 101 N. E. 460.)

Physician — request for services — liability for payment.

No promise is implied on the part of a woman to pay a physician for professional services rendered to her daughter, who was living with her husband, and not dependent on the mother for support, from the fact that the services were rendered upon the mother's request or importunity.

(March 11, 1913.)

Note. — Liability of one who solicits the services of a physician or surgeon for another.

The function of this note being to collect the decisions as to whether, and under what circumstances, the summoning of a physician or surgeon to attend another will render the person acting in the matter personally liable for the services rendered, it has been necessary to exclude therefrom certain cases which, although kindred in respect of many of the circumstances involved, present distinctive questions. Among these are decisions as to the personal liability of a physician who has called another in consultation (e. g., Fitzgerald v. Hanson, 16 Mont. 474, 41 Pac. 230); or to assist in performing an operation (e. g., Gilday v. Hennen, 79 Misc. 252, 139 N. Y. Supp. 934); cases where the question is as to whether one who has sent a telegram or letter requesting that an injured person, who is being cared for, be shown every attention, thereby renders himself liable for such person's expenses (e. g., White v. Mastin, 38 Ala. 147; Hall v. Allen, 46 Colo. 355, 104 Pac. 489; and Brosius v. Barker, 154 Mo. App. 657, 136 S. W. 18); and cases (of which Dale v. Donaldson Lumber Co. 48 Ark. 188, 3 Am. St. Rep. 224, 2 S. W. 703, may be cited as an example) in which the liability of the person soliciting the services of the physician does not rest upon the existence of an implied contract on his part to compensate the physician, but upon his implied warranty of authority to pledge the credit of another which he does not, in fact, possess. Nor does it include decisions as to the effect of acquiescence in the attendance of a physician who was not summoned by the party sought to be charged, to render him liable for the services rendered. It is perhaps scarcely necessary to add that cases where it has been sought to hold the head of a family liable for services rendered to a member of his household, not upon his solicitation, or in which liability has been based upon the existence of a duty to provide medical attendance, do not fall within the scope of the present note. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of the Appellate Term which in turn affirmed the judgment of the New York City Court dismissing a complaint filed to recover compensation for services rendered as a physician at defendant's request. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McGuire, Delany, Niper, & Connolly, for appellant:

The contract by which liability could be incurred might be either express or implied, and could be made in any way, by word or act, indicative of such intention.

Generally.

In Starrett v. Miley, 79 Ill. App. 658, it was said that there is a well-defined exception to the general rule that when services are performed on request, and no agreement is made in respect to them, the law raises an implied promise to pay so much as the person performing the service reasonably deserves to have; such exception being to the effect that when one summons a physician to care for another rendered, by sudden injury, unable to act for himself, as to whom he stands in no relationship which creates any obligation to furnish proper medical attention, and no express undertaking is entered into, then, from the mere summoning of the physician and requesting him to care for the injured person, the law does not presume any implied promise by the one so acting, to pay for the services of the physician summoned.

And see also, to the same effect, Meisenbach v. Southern Co. 45 Mo. App. 232; and Edson v. Hammond, 142 App. Div. 693, 127 N. Y. Supp. 359.

Whether the contract was made is for a jury.

A mere request upon a physician by a person that he perform services for a patient whom such person is under no obligation to support does not give rise to an obligation on the part of that person to pay the physician for such services.

Veitch v. Russell, 3 Q. B. 928, 3 Gale & D. 198, Car. & M. 362, 12 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 13; Boyd v. Sappington, 4 Watts, 247; Crane v. Boudouine, 55 N. Y. 256; Voorhees v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 129 App. Div. 780, 114 N. Y. Supp. 242, affirmed in 198 N. Y. 558, 92 N. E. 1105; Van Gaas-

The rule is somewhat differently stated and the exception broadened in MacGuire v. Hughes, 126 App. Div. 637, 111 N. Y. Supp. 153. The court, alluding to some of the cases which hold that a contract to compensate a physician for attendance upon a third person cannot be implied from a request for his attendance, said: "The principle established in these cases, which is a simple restatement of the common law, is that a simple request to perform services for another to whom there exists no obligation of any kind to furnish the services does not create an implied obligation to pay for such services by the person making the request, and that a promise to pay cannot be implied from a simple request that the services be rendered; and I apprehend that this principle is not peculiar to the relation of a physician and his patients, but extends to all cases where services, personal in their character, are rendered by one person to another."

When a person requests a physician to perform services for a patient, the law does not raise an implied promise to pay the reasonable value of the services so rendered, unless the relation of the person making the request to the patient is such as raises a legal obligation on his part to call in a physician and pay for his services. Jesserich v. Walruff, 51 Mo. App. 270; Weinsberg v. St. Louis Cordage Co. 135 Mo. App. 553, 116 S. W. 461.

One who merely summons a surgeon does not thereby render himself liable for the value of his services. Kearnes v. Caldwell, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 449.

As remarked in Boyd v. Sappington, 4 Watts, 247, a different principle would be very pernicious, as few would be willing to run the risk of calling in the aid of a physician where the patient was a stranger, or of doubtful ability to pay.

"Every person who may go for the regular attending physician when needed by his patient, or who, from considerations of friendship or humanity, may request him not to discontinue his attendance, does not render himself responsible for the services of the physician. Whether he does or not 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

depends upon the attendant circumstances." Curry v. Shelby, 90 Ala. 277, 7 So. 722.

One who, in an emergency, causes a doctor to be summoned to attend the victim of an accident, is not necessarily personally liable; but the jury ought to consider all the circumstances, and determine whether the plaintiff believed and had a right to believe that the defendant was offering his own credit. Raoul v. Newman, 59 Ga. 408.

A promise to pay the bill is not implied from the fact that a father calls a physician to attend his sick son, who is a man of mature age; but the circumstances or conditions may be such as to lead the physician to believe, and to charge the father with knowledge that the physician does believe, that the father is undertaking to pay for the services to be rendered. Morrell v. Lawrence, 203 Mo. 363, 120 Am. St. Rep. 660, 101 S. W. 571, 11 Ann. Cas. 650.

The request of a married woman for the rendition of services to members of her family does not raise any implied promise on her part to pay for the same, in the absence of any evidence tending to show that the services were rendered upon her personal credit, or that the physician, when rendering them, told her that he would look to her for payment. Hazard v. Potts, 40 Misc. 365, 82 N. Y. Supp. 246; Richards v. Young, 84 N. Y. Supp. 265.

One who sends for a physician in an emergency to attend the victim of an accident may be liable to the physician for answering the summons if he came upon a bare message without being advised of the circumstances under which it was sent; but he will not be liable for anything done after the physician became enlightened as to the true situation. Raoul v. Newman, 59 Ga. 408.

But a physician cannot recover compensation for so much of his first visit as consists in responding to the call, where he elects not to divide the charge, but renders his services on the credit of the patient. Shaw v. Graves, 79 Me. 106, 8 Atl. 884.

A doctor summoned by defendant to attend the victim of an accident does not, even though both parties understood that Circumstances under which the existence of an implied contract may or may not be inferred.

As above stated, the circumstances may be such as to warrant or require the inference of the existence of an implied contract; and this aspect of the question is dealt with in the following decisions:

A mere request from a father to a physician to attend a child of full age for whom he is not bound to provide, though sick at the father's house, raises no implied promise upon his part to pay for such medical services. Crane v. Baudouine, 55 N. Y. 256; Rankin v. Beale, 68 Mo. App. 325.

In Crane v. Baudouine, supra, it was held that testimony showing that plaintiff was summoned by the defendant's son-in-law, assuming to act therein for the defendant, though apparently without authority, to attend defendant's daughter, a married woman thirty years of age, having a home of her own, but who had been brought to her father's house that she might have the immediate care and attention of her mother; that defendant gave plaintiff a history of her case; that he was present when plaintiff made his professional calls; that he received plaintiff's directions as to treatment; that he recited to others plaintiff's opinion of the patient's condition; that he at no time during the attendance disclaimed liability; that he assented to the calling of another doctor in consultation; that he had employed other physicians to attend upon his daughter; and that he had made declarations showing that he had some idea of sending for the plaintiff,—was not sufficient, as a matter of law, from which to imply a promise on defendant's part to pay for the services.

In Morrell v. Lawrence, 203 Mo. 363, 120 Am. St. Rep. 660, 101 S. W. 571, 11 Ann. Cas. 650, it appeared that the relation of physician and patient had existed 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

plaintiff as a physician, at the request of the defendant, to the latter's daughter, a married woman living with her husband. The plaintiff was nonsuited at the trial, which was had in the city court of the city of New York, and the judgment entered in favor of the defendant, dismissing the complaint, has been affirmed by the appellate term and by the appellate division of the supreme court. Leave was then given to the plaintiff to further appeal to this court.

The plaintiff did not allege, nor does he pretend, that there was any express promise by the defendant to pay him for his services; but relies upon the facts as raising an implied agreement on her part to do so. These facts, taking them, as we should, in their most favorable light upon the plain-between plaintiff and defendant's son for several years, and that plaintiff's bills for medical services rendered to the son were presented to and paid by the son; that three years prior to the transaction in suit plaintiff received a telegram from defendant, asking him to go to another place where his son then was sick to minister to him as a physician, and plaintiff was on the eve of going when he received another telegram stating that the son had already started for his home; and that on his arrival plaintiff rendered him medical services and he paid the bill. The following year plaintiff went to Europe with the son as his attending physician at the request both of the son and of the defendant, who promised plaintiff that he would pay him or see him well remunerated for his services, but after their return from Europe defendant repudiated the contract, and all the pay plaintiff received for his services on that trip was a sum of money paid by the son. At the time of the transaction in question the son, then a man of forty-two years of age, of considerable means, and carrying on a business of his own, was not living with his father, but at a hotel in New York city. Defendant sent a telegram to plaintiff in St. Louis: "Frank is quite sick. We would like to have you come and treat him. Leave on noon train Sunday via Big Four. Answer at once." Plaintiff accordingly responded and remained in constant attendance on the son until his death. It was held that the telegram was to be interpreted in the light of the relations of the parties and of their past transactions with each other; and that whether in that light the defendant had reason to believe that the plaintiff would understand the telegram to imply an agreement to pay, and whether plaintiff did so understand, were questions for the jury, the court saying: "We think the evidence for the plaintiff in this case tends to prove a condition of affairs from which the triers of the fact, if they should see fit to draw the inference, might with reason do so that Dr. Lawrence intended the plaintiff to understand, and the plaintiff did understand.

tiff's case, show that, on November 1st, the defendant called the plaintiff upon the telephone, informed him that her daughter was seriously ill, and asked him to see her. He told her that he "could not go without the consent of the daughter's husband." Subsequently, on November 12th, the plaintiff had an interview, at his office, with the defendant and her son-in-law, Mr. Bradley. The defendant introduced her son-in-law and, in his presence, asked him if he would go up and see her daughter. Plaintiff said he was satisfied to go. To quote his testimony with respect to that interview, he said "that the introduction of Mr. Bradley by Mrs. Hughes was giving the consent to my going to see his wife." He had no conversation with Mr. Bradley, who thereupon left. Plaintiff then went with the defendant and made an examination of the patient, as the result of which he informed Mrs. Hughes that he would like to withdraw from the case, because of the particularly grave condition of her daughter. To this she replied by appealing to him to stay in the case, saying: "Doctor, you have been my friend; you have attended my family; you have attended my husband and our children; and I beg of you, for God's sake, don't desert Maude." (Maude being the name of the patient.) The plaintiff had been the defendant's family physician; but he had never attended the Bradleys. He continued in attendance upon the patient, rendering professional services, until some time in January, when she died. Nothing that he would pay for the services which the telegram called the plaintiff to render. This was not a call on the plaintiff for services in the field of his daily work. It called him away from his established field of action, it called him in effect to resign his practice, to dedicate himself for the time being solely to the service of the defendant's son, whatever the consequence might be to his general practice. This is altogether outside of the category of the cases above referred to. The patient was not one of twenty or more for whom the physician might prescribe in a day, he was one for whom the physician must give up all other patients. The call was a very unusual one and it involved unusual financial consequences."

In Edelman v. McDonnell, 126 Cal. 210, 58 Pac. 528, an action for medical services rendered to defendant's son, who was not shown to have been living with his father or to have been supported by him, it was found that the son contracted for the services and that plaintiff undertook the treatment on that employment; and that afterward defendant made statements which caused the plaintiff to believe that he would pay; but it was not shown that such statements were made as would justify such belief, or that defendant intended that they should be so understood, or that plaintiff would not have rendered the service had not such been made, and there was no finding that the services would have been discontinued but for the promises; it was held that a judgment in favor of the father must be affirmed.

In Boyd v. Sappington, 4 Watts, 247, a witness for the plaintiff testified in substance that defendant came to his house, where the plaintiff then was, and requested him to attend his son, a single man above the age of twenty-one, who was lying very ill at defendant's house, where he resided; that the doctor hesitated, but finally agreed to come; and that the defendant said that it was the wish of his son. On the trial the court refused to permit defendant to prove that the son was in business for himself and had property of his own. It was held 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) that, taken in connection with the testimony which was rejected, there was no ground for the presumption that the services were rendered on the credit of the defendant, and no reason to believe that the request was the inducement to the services, and that without this the son would not have been trusted.

In Crowell v. Donoho, 168 Mo. App. 305, 153 S. W. 1082, where it appeared that plaintiff was summoned to attend defendant's adult unmarried daughter, who was living at home and who had an interest in her father's estate then in course of administration by defendant, and that on other occasions he had been paid for his visits to the daughter by defendant's check, who testified, and the court found, that such payments, though made out of defendant's funds, were made for the patient at her request and were charged against her inheritance, it was held that the evidence did not require a judgment for plaintiff.

It is not possible to say whether the decision in Deane v. Annis, 14 Me. 26, turned on the theory that it was the duty of the father to provide medical attendance, or on the theory that he had impliedly contracted therefor. It there appeared that the defendant's minor son had left home against his father's wishes, but on being taken sick returned to his father's house; that the father went with the son to plaintiff's house to obtain medical assistance, and it was then understood by them that the plaintiff was to visit the boy at his father's house. No express promise by the father in words was proved, to pay the plaintiff, nor that the father notified the plaintiff that he did not expect to pay him. The court held that a verdict in favor of the father should be reversed, saying: "After the son surrendered himself to his father and sought his aid and assistance, we entertain no doubt he became liable for the medicine and advice furnished by plaintiff; more especially as he went with his son and was active in consulting the plaintiff as a physician."

In Best v. McAuslan, 27 R. I. 107, 60 Atl. 774, it appeared that at the time of the appears to have been said, at any time, with reference to the payment for plaintiff's services.

The only question upon this appeal is whether the defendant came under any obligation to the plaintiff. That turns upon whether the law will imply a promise on her part to compensate him. If we might assume the existence of a moral obligation, that would not determine that a legal or enforceable obligation existed. The rule in the United States has generally been that a physician is entitled to recover for his services, if not under an express contract therefor, then under an implied agreement to pay quantum meruit, differing, in earlier times, from the rule at common law, which, in England, before the passage of the medical act of 1858, in the absence of a special agreement, denied to the physician the right to sue for his professional services: the theory of any payment to him being that of an honorarium. Gibbon v. Budd, 2 Hurlst. & C. 92, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 182, 9 Jur. N. S. 525, 8 L. T. N. S. 321, 11 Week. Rep. 626; Battersby v. Lawrence, Crompt. & M. 277.

The general rule that, where a person requests of another the performance of services, which are performed, the law implies a promise by the former to pay their reasonable value, has no application in the case of a physician, rendering professional services to a third person, if the relation to the patient of the person who requests them be not such as imports the legal obligation to plaintiff's employment, the patient, a son of the defendant, although of full age, was living in defendant's family; and that the defendant was the only person who had anything to do with the original employment of the plaintiff. It did not anywhere appear that the patient had anything to do with such employment other than, being very ill and in great danger, to submit to a surgical operation and subsequent attendance and care; nor that he at any time made any express contract with the plaintiff, or promised to pay him. It further appeared that, upon plaintiff's rendering a bill to defendant, she did not then repudiate the obligation, but gave him to understand that it would be settled, her only objection being as to its amount; that plaintiff made the original charge upon his books to the defendant; and that the property of the defendant and her sons derived from the defendant's deceased husband had never been divided, and that it was customary in the family to charge any bills which should be paid for the benefit of either of them to the share of the income belonging to the one for whose account the payment was made. It was held that in view of all these facts the defendant had made herself liable for the payment of a proper and just bill for the services of the plaintiff.

In Foster v. Meeks, 18 Misc. 461, 41 N. Y. Supp. 950, it was held that testimony that defendant called upon plaintiff and said: "Doctor, I want you to come and attend my father: he had a doctor who was not satisfactory;" and that the doctor thereupon visited the father and rendered services,—was sufficient to warrant a finding in favor of the plaintiff, there being no evidence that the father ever directed the defendant to go for the doctor, and nothing from which it might be inferred that defendant acted merely as a messenger.

In Hentig v. Kernke, 25 Kan. 559, it was held that testimony on the part of plaintiff, showing that the defendant came to the plaintiff and called for his services without specifically stating to whom or to whose account they were to be rendered; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that upon such call plaintiff went to the house of defendant and rendered services to one who was then a member of the defendant's family, looking all the while to defendant for his compensation; that after the services were rendered he presented his bill to defendant, who did not disclaim his liability therefor, but on the contrary promised to pay it,—was sufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, though it appeared that the person to whom the services were rendered was the father of defendant and only temporarily a member of his family.

A man is liable for the services of the physician whom he calls in to attend his reputed wife, though their marriage may not have been legal, and though he informs the doctor that the woman is not legally his wife, where he does not at the time plainly and unequivocally put an end to the original employment. Gerlach v. Turner, 89 Cal. 446, 26 Pac. 870.

A husband who places his wife under the care of a surgeon is liable for an operation performed on her, though without his knowledge or assent; and it is therefore not necessary for the physician to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the operation was necessary and proper under the circumstances, or that he, before he performed it, gave notice to the husband, or that it would be dangerous to the wife, to wait, before he performed it, till such notice could be given. McClallen v. Adams, 19 Pick. 333, 31 Am. Dec. 140.

In Churchill v. Hebden, 32 R. I. 34, 78 Atl. 337, it was held that where all that appeared to charge the defendant with liability was that he requested a physician to attend his sick brother, a verdict was properly directed for the defendant.

In Smith v. Watson, 14 Vt. 332, where it appeared that defendant, accompanied by his father, visited plaintiff and requested him to take under his care an insane brother, for whom defendant was under no obligation to provide, and who had made his home with the father; and, further, that plaintiff had made inquiries as to whether a demand could be secured against the provide them. The courts below have followed the authority of Crane v. Baudouine, 55 N. Y. 256, though there was a division in opinion at the appellate division as to its application.

I think that it has been correctly held to be decisive of the question before us. In that case the plaintiff, a physician, was called in to attend the daughter of the defendant, who was lying ill at the latter's house. She was of age, married, and living with her husband, and had been brought there at her mother's request. There being no proof of any express promise to pay the plaintiff for his services, the question of a promise to be implied from the facts was considered by Judge Folger, who spoke for the court. He observed that "the relations between the defendant and her [his daughter] were not such as that there was upon him such obligation. She was much past her majority; . . . she had lived with her husband and their children, separately from her father, in a house of their own; she was, at the time, living with her husband and their children. Her husband was bound primarily to supply for her all that she needed. . . . The interest exhibited in the case by the defendant to the plaintiff; . . . his presence when the plain-father or the insane person before resorting to defendant for payment,—it was held that the facts would not warrant the inference of an implied contract.

In Veitch v. Russell, 3 Q. B. 928, it appeared that defendant, a lady, had written to plaintiff, describing her brother's symptoms and requesting the plaintiff to visit him. In one of her letters she made statements which showed that she was bearing the expenses of her brother's illness. On a subsequent occasion she wrote, stating that her brother had again been taken ill, saying, "I am anxious to apprise you of this sad affliction, believing you to be the only medical friend who can restore him. A medical gentleman was sent for: the result of his opinion I know not. Pray go and see him. . . . I am fearful of sending any physician from town, as they might not understand him as you do." Thereafter she again wrote: "As your account against me for attendance on my brother must be rather a formidable one, you will oblige me by letting me have it up to his removal to town." In another letter she said: "I have thought a great deal upon the subject of our conversation on Monday last; and the more I think of it, the more perplexed I feel as to what I should do. My wish is to present you with such a sum as you would call upon me to pay you. Now, as this can only be done by your telling me what that sum should be, I shall feel greatly obliged to you by your doing so. I really do not see how I can spare you this trouble; for I do not know what expenses you have incurred, or what you would deem, under the circumstances a suitable acknowledgment of your great professional skill and attention. Having thus explained to you my feelings on this subject, I hope that you will at once tell me what sum will be agreeable to you to accept from me." It was held that although, had the letters passed between parties in other relations, they would undoubtedly have had a strong effect, yet in view of the general understanding that physicians usually perform their duties without having a legal title to remuneration, the jury was warranted in finding that there was no actual contract on the part of defendant to make himself legally liable for plaintiff's professional charges. It will be perceived that as the foregoing decision was put expressly upon the ground that the compensation of a physician was merely honorary, so that he had no legal right to recover in the absence of an express contract, it cannot be regarded, in jurisdictions where the legal right of a physician to compensation is recognized, as authorizing a like conclusion upon a similar state of facts.

In Dorion v. Jacobson, 113 Ill. App. 563, it was held that something more than a mere request to a physician to render services to a daughter-in-law is necessary to render the father-in-law liable.

In Curry v. Shelby, 90 Ala. 277, 7 So. 922, it was held that an agreement on the part of defendant to pay for medical services rendered to his father-in-law, who, having met with an accident, had been carried to defendant's house, would be clearly implied from the facts that defendant went for plaintiff two or three times to go and see the father-in-law, which he did; that on two occasions he proposed to discontinue his attendance, when defendant requested him to continue his visits, and that after the father-in-law died he presented his bill to defendant as a claim against him individually, and asked its payment, when defendant did not deny his responsibility, but objected to the amount. But it further appearing that, immediately upon hearing of the accident, plaintiff went to see the patient and rendered medical assistance without request by defendant, who was not at home, and was visiting him when defendant came to him to go and see the patient, that when he proposed to discontinue his visits the patient and the wife of the defendant united in a request not to do so; and that the account for services was charged on plaintiff's books to the patient,—it was held to be a question for the jury as to whether there was an agreement on the part of defendant to become responsible for the services rendered after plaintiff proposed to discontinue his visits.

In Thomas v. Leavy, 62 Ill. App. 34, it was held that where the plaintiff testified that, before meeting defendant, he had been attending his wife's sister for about ten days, having been called by her uncle, tiff made his professional calls, alone and in consultation; his receiving directions as to treatment,— . . . are relied upon as circumstances making a basis for an implication." p. 259. He held that, "so far as legal responsibility was concerned, the defendant, though the father of the patient, was a stranger to her and to her necessities." There was a question upon the evidence, whether the defendant had, in fact, sent for the plaintiff, and it was said that, "even had he gone himself and requested the plaintiff to come, we have seen above that the law will not therefrom raise an implied promise to pay for the services." It was reasoned that, while a person may not avail himself of the benefit of services done for him "without coming into an obligation to reward them with a reasonable recompense," he cannot be said, "in the meaning of the law, to avail himself of services as so done, when they are not for his individual benefit, nor for that of anyone for whom he is bound to furnish them." The court in Crane v. Baudouine, applied the doctrine of the cases of Veitch v. Russell, 3 Q. B. 928, 3 Gale & D. 198, Car. & M. 362, 12 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 13, 7 Jur. 60, and of Boyd v. Sappington, 4 Watts, 247, that the fact of a request to a physician to attend a patient at whose house she was stopping; that on an occasion of one of his professional calls he met defendant, who said to him: "Doctor, you take care of the girls and attend to them, and I will pay you for your entire services, for those you have rendered heretofore and what you may hereafter render. There is my card. Send the bill to me, and I will pay all expenses," and defendant testifies that all he said to the doctor was: "Give this girl the attention she requires, and I will see that she has some money to pay her bills,"—the jury were warranted in rendering a verdict for services rendered after the conversation.

In Swan v. Warner, 197 N. Y. 190, 90 N. E. 430, it was held that, in an action brought to recover for professional services of a physician, items in his books of account which explicitly indicated that the services charged therein were rendered to a nephew of the defendant were improperly received in evidence, in the absence of any showing of express authority to charge such services to the defendant, or of proof of any circumstances which without express authority warranted such a charge.

No implied promise on the part of a husband or his wife to pay for medical services rendered to a third person making her home with them can be inferred where the most that can be pretended to fix any liability on the wife is that she knew that the plaintiff had been sent for, not directly by her but without any objection on her part; and the case shows that when plaintiff first came to the house he was met by the husband, who forbade him rendering any services on their account. Shaw v. Graves, 79 Me. 166, 8 Atl. 884.

In Grattop v. Rowheder, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 660, 95 N. W. 679, it was held that one who called a physician for one who was a member of his family, though not a relative, a lady about seventy years of age, was liable for the physician's services rendered without notice that the party calling him did not intend to make himself liable therefore.

In Clark v. Waterman, 7 Vt. 76, 29 Am. Dec. 150, where it appeared that defendant in person called upon one of the plaintiffs and requested him to go and see a girl who had been brought up as a member 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of his household and who, after having become of age, had the control of her time, but was then residing in his family as a servant without any stipulated wages; that defendant, subsequently becoming dissatisfied, called in the other of the plaintiffs; and that not far from the time the girl died defendant had called on plaintiffs for the amount of their account, saying he wanted to lay it before the town to see if they would assist him,—it was held that the proof was sufficient to authorize the triers of fact to find that the defendant intended and gave the plaintiffs so to understand that he was himself the employer. The court said: "We do not mean by this determination to intimate that a man who, by himself or another, happens to go for a doctor to attend a hired man or maid or sister or friend in his house, is of course liable to pay the bill. In many and perhaps most of these cases, the person going or sending might be regarded as a mere medium of intelligence that a physician was wanted; but where the proof in the case is sufficient as we think it was in this case, to authorize the triers to find that the defendant intended, and gave the plaintiffs so to understand, that he was himself the employer, then the original credit was given to him; then he is liable upon general principles, and, it not being the debt of another, is not affected by the statute of frauds."

An employer who merely summons a physician, and requests him to care for an employee who has suddenly become ill while engaged in his duties and has been thereby rendered incapable of acting for himself, is not, in the absence of an express stipulation between the employer and the employee that the former shall furnish medical aid to the latter, liable for the services of the physician, rendered under such circumstances. Norton v. Rourke, 130 Ga. 600, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 173, 124 Am. St. Rep. 187, 61 S. E. 478.

In McEwen v. Hoffman, 42 Ind. App. 202, 85 N. E. 364, a complaint alleging that defendants sent an injured employee to plaintiff for immediate attention and, for the immediate performance of an operation to remove a piece of steel from his eye, and that plaintiff "relied on the represen-is not, alone, sufficient for the inference of an agreement to pay for the services rendered. The doctrine, which Crane v. Baudouine adopted, has influenced the decisions of the courts of other states (see Smith v.

Watson, 14 Vt. 332; Raoul v. Newman, 59 Ga. 408; Meisenbach v. Southern Cooperage Co. 45 Mo. App. 232; Dorion v. Jacobson, 113 Ill. App. 563; the two latter cases citing Crane v. Baudouine), and the case was tations of said defendants and tendered the credit to them, and thereupon on said date performed" the services in question, was held demurrable on the ground that it did not show with reasonable certainty facts constituting a contract, express or implied.

In Cheek v. Boyd — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 252, it was held that where there was testimony on behalf of the plaintiff that he had been called on the telephone by one who said that a certain person had been injured and he wanted to send him over to plaintiff's sanitarium, and that the defendant said he would be responsible for the bill, and that in a subsequent conversation with the defendant the latter stated that he had ordered the man sent and that he would pay the bill himself, the question of the defendant's liability should have been left with the jury.

In Hasler v. Ozark Land & Lumber Co. 101 Mo. App. 136, 74 S. W. 465, where the testimony disclosed that the plaintiff had declined attendance upon defendant's employee until the vice president or general manager had directed him to render the services and agreed to pay him therefor; that plaintiff had received $40, which he claimed was in part payment, but which defendant claimed was a personal loan by defendant's official advancing it, though it was conceded to have been paid from defendant's funds, and without any knowledge or obligation therefor given back by plaintiff, it was held to be a question for the jury whether there was an implied contract to pay the physician.

In Weinsberg v. St. Louis Cordage Co. 135 Mo. App. 553, 116 S. W. 461, where it appeared that the court found not only that the president of the defendant corporation requested the plaintiff to attend an injured employee, but that he intended that the defendant should pay therefor, and it conclusively appeared that plaintiff intended to charge defendant, the fact of a contract between the parties was established by testimony, although there was no express promise.

In Michigan College v. Charlesworth, 54 Mich. 522, 20 N. W. 566, where a doctor, upon being informed of an injury to a tramp in a railroad yard, telephoned to the division superintendent of the railroad, asking if he should attend him, and whether he should take him to a hospital, to which the superintendent responded in the affirmative and added further, "it will not do to let the man suffer," or something of that kind, it was held that there being nothing in the language employed by the doctor to intimate to the superintendent that he was engaging his professional services to him, and nothing having been said, or implied from what was said, about pay or recompense, there was not sufficient, under the circumstances and the conversation, to raise an agreement by implication that the superintendent would pay the doctor for services by him to be performed, and the hospital for board, nursing, care, etc.

In Chicago Consol. Traction Co. v. Mathews, 117 Ill. App. 174, it was held that when a street railway company injures a stranger and then requests a physician to care for him, or with knowledge of the facts ratifies the act of its conductor in employing him, or with like knowledge fails and neglects to countermand such employment, the company is liable to such physician in a reasonable amount for his services.

In Starrett v. Miley, 79 Ill. App. 658, defendant sent for a physician to attend a woman who was, so far as the evidence disclosed, a stranger to him, and who ran into his home wounded and bleeding, and had fallen there unconscious. When the physician arrived, defendant directed him to the injured woman, told him to care for her, and had her carried to a room in the house. It was held that defendant did not thereby become liable.

In Smith v. Riddick, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 342, where it appeared that defendant, having been sent for a certain physician to assist in a surgical operation, and, not finding him, applied to plaintiff, saying: "I have come after you to go and see a sick man,"—it was held that the court properly charged the jury that if they believed that the plaintiff had been informed beforehand of the circumstances, defendant, being a mere messenger, was not liable.

The sending of the following telegram by one who is the manager of a hotel at a public watering place, the agent of the stockholders, and himself a stockholder, to a friend in a neighboring city: "There are many cases of yellow fever at the Well; send out a physician this afternoon without fail,"—does not render the sender liable for services of a physician who comes in consequence. Williams v. Brickell, 37 Miss. 682, 75 Am. Dec. 88.

In Bradley v. Dodge, 45 How. Pr. 57, it was held that where it appeared that defendant called at the plaintiff's office and, finding him absent, wrote on his own card the words: "Call on Mrs. Day, at No. 769 Broadway," requesting that it be given to the plaintiff, and that he should come as soon as possible, and there was nothing to indicate to the plaintiff, before he rendered the services in question, that the defendant had called at his office at Mrs. Day's request, and that he was therefore only acting as her messenger,—a verdict for the plaintiff would not be disturbed. E. S. O.

followed by the appellate division in Voorhees v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 129 App. Div. 780, 114 N. Y. Supp. 242, and in Van Gaasbeek v. United States Lace Curtain Mills, 132 App. Div. 595, 116 N. Y. Supp. 776.

I am therefore of the opinion that it should be taken as the rule of law, too well settled upon authority to be now questioned, that a physician, in the absence of a special contract, may recover upon an implied agreement to pay for his services quantum meruit, when they have been rendered at the request of the patient, or of a person who, in the eye of the law, is regarded as being under a legal obligation to provide such professional services for the patient; such as a husband, or the parent of a minor child. In the present case, notwithstanding the anxiety, the importunity, and the prayers of the defendant, how was the legal obligation of the husband shifted to, or assumed by, the defendant? According to the plaintiff's testimony, he refused to attend the patient until the husband had consented; which may be said to be a recognition, at least, of the marital relation, with its consequent responsibility or liability. It certainly followed that, when the husband's consent was given, an obligation arose on his part to pay the reasonable value of the services which the plaintiff might render. As there was no express promise by the defendant to pay, can we hold, upon the facts disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence, that there was also an implied promise on her part? It would be a simple matter, in cases where the physician is called upon to attend a person, at the instance of someone not standing in a responsible relation to the patient, to inform himself as to whom he shall look for his compensation.

For these reasons, I advise that the order of the Appellate Division be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

UNITED STATES RADIATOR CORPORATION, Appt.,
v.

STATE OF NEW YORK, Resp't.

(208 N. Y. 144, 101 N. E. 783.)

Tax — stock transfer — distribution of stock owned by corporation among shareholders.

1. The distribution by a trust company to which was delivered for the purpose of 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a voting trust stock of a corporation which purchased the assets of other corporations in consideration of shares of its stock of certificates among the stockholders of the selling corporation, showing that they were the owners of a number of shares of the buying corporation, equal to their respective interests in the selling corporation, is a transfer of stock within the meaning of a statute imposing a tax upon all sales or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales, or transfers of shares, or certificates of stock.

Corporation — shares.

2. Shares of the capital stock of a corporation, and their ownership, are created by the payment or agreement to pay for stock accepted by the corporation.

Same — sale of assets — title to consideration — division among stockholders.

3. The sale of its assets by a corporation to another corporation for stock of the latter vests title to the stock in the selling corporation, which cannot be placed in its own stockholders without a transfer, which may be subject to taxation.

(Gray and Hiscock, JJ., dissent.)

(April 15, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Claims which dismissed a claim filed to recover an amount paid under protest as a stock transfer tax. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Personius, with Messrs. Herendeen & Mandeville, for appellant:

There must be a sale or agreement to sell in connection with a transfer or delivery of capital stock to make the transaction taxable; and it is the transaction of sale, rather than the stock itself, that is subjected by the statute to a tax.

People ex rel. Hatch v. Reardon, 184 N. Y. 431, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 314, 112 Am. St. Rep. 628, 77 N. E. 970, 6 Ann. Cas. 515, 204 U. S. 152, 51 L. ed. 415, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 188, 9 Ann. Cas. 736.

The transaction involved in the case at bar was not a sale, but the original issuance, of stock.

People v. Duffy-McInnerney Co. 122 App. Div. 336, 106 N. Y. Supp. 878.

Note. — What constitutes a transfer of stock within statutes taxing stock transfers.

No cases are included herein except those considering the question with reference to statutes expressly imposing a tax upon transfers of shares of stock in corporations, as distinguished from statutes taxing transfers of property generally and inheritance and succession tax statutes.

If the vendor's shares were owned by the original corporations, then the stockholders had a beneficial interest therein, and the issuance of these certificates, therefore, is a division among the true owners of their property, and not a taxable sale or transfer.

Quintard*, 90 Fed. 84.

Mr. Henry Selden Bacon, with Mr. Thomas Carmody, Attorney General, for the State.

Collin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is to recover from the state of New York a sum paid by the plaintiff, under protest and without prejudice to its rights, for stock transfer stamps.

The facts were agreed upon by the parties for submission to the court of claims. The plaintiff, a corporation, purchased certain assets of each of four corporations. Under the contracts of purchase, each of the four corporations was entitled to a designated number of shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff as a consideration for the sale.

A transfer of stock certificates issued by a foreign corporation owned by a nonresident, where made within the state, is a transfer within the provisions of a statute imposing an excise tax on all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales, or deliveries or transfers, of shares or certificates of stock in any domestic or foreign association, etc., within the state; since the tax is not on property, but on the sale of property, or on a particular kind of contract when made within the state. People ex rel. Hatch v. Reardon, 184 N. Y. 431, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 314, 112 Am. St. Rep. 628, 77 N. E. 970, 6 Ann. Cas. 515, affirmed in 204 U. S. 152, 51 L. ed. 415, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 188, 9 Ann. Cas. 736.

A transfer of shares of stock takes place at the time a contract for their sale is delivered, although the sale is for shares to be delivered in instalments, where in the meantime and until default, the certificates are to be indorsed in blank and delivered in escrow and the transfer tax stamps must be affixed to the certificates of stock at the time of their delivery in escrow. Phillips v. Grossman, 76 Misc. 497, 135 N. Y. Supp. 567.

A sale of shares of stock under a mortgage foreclosure proceeding, by a referee appointed for that purpose, is a transfer within the statute imposing a tax on transfers 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Each of the four corporations and a trust company entered into a lawful voting trust agreement, which provided that the trust company as voting trustee should hold and vote for a designated period the full number of the shares of stock to which the four corporations were so entitled, and a certificate for those shares was issued by the plaintiff, upon the request of each of the four corporations, to the trust company, which thus became the record owner of the shares for voting purposes. Each of the four corporations (no condition forbidding) requested the issue to each stockholder therein by the trust company of a certificate for the number of shares proportionate to the number of the shares of its stock owned by him, and thereupon the trust company issued to each stockholder of the four corporations a certificate that he, the stockholder, was the owner of a designated number of shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff, deposited with and to be held by the trust company under the agreement as voting trustee, and might transfer the certificate, and that all dividends received by the trust company should be paid to the holder of the certificate, who should at the termination of the voting trust agreement, upon surrender of the certificate, be entitled to receive a certificate or certificates of the plaintiff for said shares of capital stock. Pursuant to the decision of the comptroller of the state that the certificates of the trust company were of stock in a corporation, although the sale is a judicial sale; since the transaction is essentially the same as if the mortgagee, without invoking the court's assistance to enforce the mortgage, had sold the stocks by virtue of a power contained in the mortgage, or as if the mortgagor had voluntarily released his equity in the mortgaged stocks. Glynn v. Conklin, 127 App. Div. 473, 111 N. Y. Supp. 111.

An original issuance of stock in a corporation is not a transfer thereof within the terms of the act imposing a tax on all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales, or deliveries or transfers, of shares or certificates of stock in any domestic or foreign association, etc. People v. Duffy-McInerney Co. 122 App. Div. 336, 106 N. Y. Supp. 878, affirmed in 193 N. Y. 636, 86 N. E. 1129.

Compare with UNITED STATES RADIATOR CORP. v. STATE, holding it to be a transfer of shares where different corporations sold property to another corporation and the latter issued capital stock to a trust company to hold as a voting trust, and to be voted as directed by the former, where the trust company, at the request of the selling corporations, issued trust certificates for the stock to individual stockholders in proportion to their holdings. A. G. S.

taxable under § 270 of the tax law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 60), the plaintiff paid for the transfer stamps without prejudice to its rights, and brings this action to recover the sum paid.

The statutory provisions authorizing and regulating the procedure in the action are: Section 276 of the tax law empowers the state comptroller to ascertain whether any stock transfer tax imposed is unpaid, and, if unpaid, to enforce the recovery of it and any penalty incurred by the nonpayment. Section 280 (added by chap. 186, Laws 1910) empowers him to pay to a person the amount erroneously paid as the tax, and authorizes the taxpayer to file with the court of claims a claim rejected by the comptroller, "which shall constitute a private claim against the state, and shall be subject to all the provisions of law governing such claims, except" the provisions relating to the time within which it shall be filed. The action was commenced "under the provisions of law governing such claims," which are familiar and do not require a particular reference. Section 62 of the executive law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 18) authorizes the attorney general, on behalf of the state, to "agree upon a case containing a statement of the facts, and submit a controversy for decision to a court of record which would have jurisdiction of an action brought on the same case, pursuant to the provisions of" §§ 1279-1281 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing the submission to a court of record of a controversy upon facts submitted. The court of claims was a court of record. Judiciary law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 30) § 2.

At the time of the transactions under consideration, § 270 of the tax law (Consol. Laws 1909, chap. 60) contained the following provisions: "There is hereby imposed and there shall immediately accrue and be collected a tax, as herein provided, on all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales, or deliveries or transfers, of shares or certificates of stock in any domestic or foreign association, company, or corporation, . . . whether made upon or shown by the books of the association, company, or corporation, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale, whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such stock, or to secure the future payment of money or the future transfer of any stock, on each share of $100 of face value or fraction thereof, two cents. . . . The payment of such tax shall be denoted by an adhesive stamp or stamps affixed as follows: In a case where the evidence of transfer is shown only by the books of the company the stamp shall be placed upon such books; and where the change of ownership is by transfer of a certificate the stamp shall be placed upon the certificate; and in cases of an agreement to sell, or where the transfer is by delivery of the certificate assigned in blank, there shall be made and delivered by the seller to the buyer a bill or memorandum of such sale to which the stamp provided for by this article shall be affixed; and every bill or memorandum of sale or agreement to sell before mentioned shall show the date thereof, the name of the seller, the amount of the sale, and the matter or thing to which it refers, and no further tax is hereby imposed upon the delivery of the certificate of stock, or upon the actual issue of a new certificate when the original certificate of stock is accompanied by the duly stamped memorandum of sale."

The section imposes the tax upon all agreements or instruments for the transfer of shares of corporate stock. It is in the nature of an excise tax on the transfer. People ex rel. Hatch v. Reardon, 184 N. Y. 431, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 314, 112 Am. St. Rep. 628, 77 N. E. 970, 6 Ann. Cas. 515. The language expresses clearly the intention of the legislature that every transfer of or agreement to transfer a share in the capital stock of a corporation, or, in other and definitive words, a right to share in the dividends declared by the directors of a corporation from its surplus profits and in the assets upon the distribution of them pro rata among the shareholders at its dissolution, shall be subject to the tax.

A share of corporate stock is the right which the shareholder has to participate according to the number of shares in the surplus profits of the corporation on a division, and in the assets or capital stock remaining after payment of its debts on its dissolution or the termination of its active existence and operation. Plimpton v. Bigelow, 93 N. Y. 592; Jermain v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 91 N. Y. 483. It is created by the joint action of the corporation and the shareholder. It imports a contribution to the capital stock made by the shareholder and accepted by the corporation. When a corporation has agreed that a person shall be entitled to a certain number of shares for a consideration permitted by law and executed by the person, those shares come into existence and are owned by him.

The statement in the certificate of incorporation or charter of the corporation that the capital stock is a designated amount divided into a certain number of shares, each of a named value, creates neither shares nor capital stock. It expresses the power of the corporation to acquire a capital stock. It creates potential shares which, transferred into actual shares by the acquisition of members and their payments, produce the money or property which, put into a single corporate fund, is the actual capital or capital stock on which the corporate business is undertaken and in which are the shares. It also fixes the sum of the payment necessary to create a share.

The certificate of the corporation for the shares, or the stock certificate, is not necessary to the existence of the shares or their ownership. It is merely the written evidence of those facts. It expresses the contract between the shareholder and the corporation and his co-shareholders. But it is the payment, or the obligation to pay for shares of stock, accepted by the corporation, that creates both the shares and their ownership. Burrall v. Bushwick R. Co. 75 N. Y. 211; Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 60 Am. Rep. 429, 12 N. E. 648; Southworth v. Morgan, 205 N. Y. 293, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 98 N. E. 490; Buffalo & N. Y. City R. Co. v. Dudley, 14 N. Y. 336; Dayton v. Borst, 31 N. Y. 435; Flour City Nat. Bank v. Shire, 88 App. Div. 401, 84 N. Y. Supp. 810, affirmed in 179 N. Y. 587, 72 N. E. 1141. In the last case cited, Judge Hiscock, then Justice Hiscock, writing for the court, said: "The company having thus acquired property under an agreement to give therefor to various people certain interests or shares in its capital stock, we think that such latter persons, immediately upon the acceptance of transfers by the corporation, became entitled to and vested with said interests or shares, and that no further steps were necessary to accomplish this latter result. It may be admitted at once that ordinarily the corporation would issue certificates for these shares of capital stock, but it is too well settled to permit of doubt that said certificates would be merely representative of, and not the real interest in, the property and assets of the corporation constituting its actual capital stock."

Each of the four corporations became, upon the transfer of its assets to the plaintiff, the owner of the shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff, which were the consideration for it. The transaction did not involve a transfer of those shares. The shares were not transferred to the vendor corporation by plaintiff; they were created by the transaction. At no time were they owned by the plaintiff. At the instant of their creation they were owned by the vendor corporation, which might at any time thereafter transfer them, and any transfer of them by it would be subject to the tax imposed by said § 270.

The four corporations did not transfer the shares owned by them to the trust company. They caused the record title to them to be placed in the trust company temporarily and for an expressed and limited purpose. They remained the owners of the stock. Their ownership was subject to the right of the trust company to vote the shares at corporate elections; but the power to transfer the shares, subject to the right of the trust company to vote them, remained in the corporations. The trust company could not sell or agree to sell the shares. It had no assignable interest in them. It had evidence in the certificate that it as trustee held the legal title, but this was notice of the existence of the trust agreement which disclosed the ownership of the corporations.

The valid request of each of the four corporations to the trust company, that it issue its certificate to each of the holders of shares of the stock of those corporations for shares of the stock of the plaintiff proportionate to his holding, and the compliance of the trust company, was a transfer of the shares by the corporations to their shareholders. Upon the completion of those acts, the corporations ceased having the right to receive the dividends declared upon those shares, and the shareholders acquired it. The ownership of the shares is in their stockholders severally, as certified by the trust company, by virtue of the assignment of it, inherent in the request and the execution of the request by the trust company. The appellant does not assert or claim that the corporations own the shares. It, on the contrary, concedes that their shareholders are the owners, but asserts that they were such through and from the time of the purchase by the plaintiff of the assets of the corporations, and therefore there was no transfer of the shares from the corporations to them,—an assertion erroneous, as already stated.

The appellant urges, with ability and earnestness, that if the four corporations did in the first instance own the shares, the transfer of them to the shareholders was a division among the true owners of their own property, and therefore not a taxable transfer. Without deciding whether or not the conclusion correctly expresses the law, it suffices in this case to point out that the premise given for its support is fallacious. While conditions may exist under which equity will consider the shareholders as the proprietors and the ultimate beneficiaries of the corporate interests, the fact is that a corporation is an individual being, incapacitated through statutory powers to acquire the title to, own, and dispose of real and personal property, enter into contracts, engage in business, sue and be sued and taxed. It is the owner of all the corporate property, real and personal, and within the powers conferred upon it by the charter can deal with it as absolutely as a private individual can with his own. The whole title to it is in the corporation, and the shareholders are neither tenants in common nor in any legal sense the owners of it. Hyatt v. Allen, 56 N. Y. 553, 15 Am. Rep. 449; Gibbons v. Mahon, 136 U. S. 549, 34 L. ed. 525, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1057; Lowry v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 172 N. Y. 137, 64 N. E. 796; Humphreys v. McKissock, 140 U. S. 304, 35 L. ed. 473, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 779; Buffalo L. T. & S. D. Co. v. Medina Gas & Electric Light Co. 162 N. Y. 67, 56 N. E. 505. A shareholder cannot acquire title to any of the property of the corporation through the operation of the law as an administrator acquires the title to the personal property of his intestate. A corporate act alone can effect that result. When the act, as did the act in the present case, transfers to the shareholders shares of the capital stock of another corporation, it is taxable under said § 270.

The judgment should be affirmed, without costs.

Appeal — denying judgment non ob- stante.

1. An order denying a motion for judgment non obstante is nonappealable.

Same — power to order judgment non obstante.

2. Held, construing § 7044, Rev. Codes 1905, that this court in a proper case has power on appeal to order judgment non obstante veredicto, although no motion was made in the lower court for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial.

Master and servant — arrest by serv- ant — liability of master.

4. Plaintiff, who was a passenger on defendant's train from B. to M., was wrongfully arrested, at the instance of defendant's conductor, about five minutes after alighting from the train at M., and while standing on the depot platform conversing with his companions. Held, for reasons stated in the opinion, that whether, at the time of such arrest, plaintiff's status as a passenger had ceased so as to exonerate the company from any duty as a carrier towards him, was, under the facts disclosed by the evidence, not material or controlling, as such conductor was not at the time acting for the company, but as a policeman for the state, pursuant to the duty imposed upon him under the provisions of chapter 228, Laws 1911, and the company is not liable for his acts.

Fisk, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was tried in the county court of Ward county before a jury, and resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $750, on October 31, 1911. Thereafter, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) and on December 28th, judgment was duly rendered on such verdict. On December 4th counsel for defendant served upon plaintiff's attorneys a notice that on December 12th they would make a motion for judgment in favor of defendant notwithstanding the verdict, and for an order granting a new trial, in the event such motion for judgment should be denied. Such motion designated but one ground thereof, to wit, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. On January 12, 1912, the parties appeared before the court, whereupon counsel for defendant moved the court for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, without incorporating therewith a motion for a new trial. Objections were filed by plaintiff's counsel to the hearing of such motion, upon the ground that it came too late, and that no notice of intention to move for a new trial was ever served. Thereupon the trial judge made an order denying the motion, and the defendant attempts to appeal from such order, as well as from the judgment.

The order, if treated merely as an order denying the motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, is nonappealable, as we have recently held in Turner v. Crumpton, — N. D. —, 141 N. W. 209.

It is unnecessary, however, to waste any time upon such question of practice, for the only propositions attempted to be urged by appellant by its motion are raised on the appeal from the judgment, namely, that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict at the close of the testimony. If the trial court should have directed a verdict, this court has the power to do so on the appeal from the judgment, even though no motion was made in the lower court for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, or for a new trial. Such appears to be the plain provision of § 7044, Rev. Codes 1905.

This brings us to a consideration of the appeal from the judgment. Respondent has made a motion in this court to strike out the statement of the case for failure to comply with rule 7 of this court (10 N. D. xli., 91 N. W. vi.), which requires the testimony to be reduced to narrative form. While this court will ordinarily require a strict compliance with such rule, as held in numerous cases, yet, owing to the exceptionally short record, the testimony in which comprises but a few pages, we have concluded not to enforce such strict compliance in the case at bar. The only testimony introduced is that of the plaintiff, defendant offering no testimony whatever; and the only specifications of error incorporated in the settled statement are predicated upon the rulings of the court in denying defendant's motions for a directed verdict.

Plaintiff testifies, in substance, that on July 22, 1911, he was a passenger on one of defendant's passenger trains en route from Burlington to Minot, having purchased a ticket at Burlington entitling him to ride on such train to Minot. During such trip one Ole Johnson, also a passenger on said train, approached plaintiff and offered him a drink, which plaintiff declined, whereupon the conductor of the train jumped up and grabbed the bottle from Johnson and kept it, saying at the same time, "When I get to Minot I will have you fellows arrested." He also testified that, upon the arrival of the train at Minot, he and his companions alighted from the train to the depot platform, but saw no officer there at the time. A few minutes thereafter an officer arrived, and the conductor pointed to plaintiff and two companions, saying, "That is them there;" whereupon the officer said to plaintiff and such companions, "Come with me;" and they were arrested and taken to jail. While the officer was taking these parties away from the depot, said conductor, holding the bottle in his hand, said, "Here is enough to convict the boys." Upon arrival at the jail plaintiff and his companions were incarcerated therein, where they were confined from about 1 o'clock P. M. until about 7 P. M., when they were released. On cross-examination plaintiff testified that it was about five minutes, as near as he could judge, from the time he left the train until the arrest was made, and that he had no business which detained him, or kept him waiting on the depot platform during such interval of five minutes, and the only reason he gave for remaining there was that he and his companions were "just talking back and forth is all I know." The cross-examination of plaintiff discloses that the bottle in question contained whisky.

The foregoing is all the testimony which is material to the question involved. At the close of such testimony, the defendant's counsel moved for a directed verdict upon the ground "that the testimony on the part of the plaintiff is wholly insufficient to establish a cause of action, the issue as alleged in the complaint, or otherwise; it appearing from the testimony that no officer or employee in charge of the train, or in the employ of the defendant, arrested, in the course of the discharge of any duty or obligation of his to the company, the plaintiff in this case, or that he arrested him at all. The complaint charges that the defendant, through its servants and employees on the occasion described, did wrongfully assault and arrest the plaintiff and deprive him of his liberty, which allegation is wholly unsupported by any evidence so far offered or by any evidence offered by the plaintiff."

Such motion was denied and an exception taken, and this ruling is the sole error specified in the settled statement of the case. While one of the assignments of error in appellant's brief is that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, such assignment is not properly before us for reasons heretofore stated.

Was it error to deny defendant's motion for a directed verdict? This is the sole question in the case. Counsel for appellant argue that the proof discloses that prior to the arrest the relation of carrier and passenger between defendant and plaintiff had ceased, and consequently that defendant owed plaintiff no duty which such a relation might impose upon it. That any act of the conductor performed towards or connected with such arrest five minutes after plaintiff alighted from the train, and while he was on the depot platform, was without the scope of his duty as defendant's servant, and consequently defendant is in no manner accountable therefor. They, of course, concede the general rule of liability of a master for the wrongful acts of its servants when performed within the scope of such servants' employment. The crucial question on this appeal, therefore, is whether defendant is responsible for the acts of its conductor of which plaintiff complains. The appellant contends that no such responsibility exists if plaintiff, at the time of the arrest, had ceased to be a passenger, and further that the right of action alleged is founded upon such relation, and no recovery can be sustained if such relation had ceased at the time of the acts complained of. While, on the contrary, plaintiff contends that such is not a necessary or proper test of liability, and that defendant is liable under the undisputed facts, even though the court should hold, as a matter of law, that the relation of carrier and passenger had ceased at the time of such wrongful arrest.

As we view the matter, it is not material whether at the time of the arrest the status of plaintiff as a passenger had ceased, or had not ceased, for, under the plaintiff's own version of the facts, the company on no theory can be held liable for such arrest, for the obvious reason that such conductor, in doing what he did, was not acting for the company, but was discharging a duty imposed upon him by law. The acts complained of were not done within the real or apparent scope of the master's business, and consequently the latter cannot be held responsible for such acts, under any rule known to the law. Instead of acting, or assuming to act, for the company, such conductor was manifestly attempting to discharge what he deemed a duty imposed upon him by chapter 228, Laws 1911. Section 1 of this law makes it a crime to publicly drink or offer to another any intoxicating beverage upon a train carrying passengers in this state, with certain enumerated exceptions. Section 2 confers police powers upon every passenger conductor, and makes it his duty, while thus engaged, to arrest any person who shall, in his presence or to his knowledge, violate the provisions of § 1, and to deliver such person to any policeman, constable, or other peace officer to be by him informed against and prosecuted. Is it possible that the common carrier can be held responsible for the faithful and proper discharge of such statutory duty thus imposed upon its servant? We think not, nor has the legislature by such act attempted to impose any such burden upon it. While acting in obedience to such statute, it cannot be said that the conductor is acting for the railway company at all. Such company has no control over him whatsoever while he is in the discharge of the duty thus imposed upon him by the sovereign power of the state. The authorities relied on the respondent are clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. They are cases where the servant, in doing the act complained of, was acting for the master, either within the actual or implied scope of his employment, or such acts were violative of the implied contract of the master for the protection of its passengers.

In announcing the foregoing conclusion, we are not unmindful of the numerous authorities holding a railway company liable for the acts of its servants committed within the scope of their authority, or even for acts which are done not for the benefit of the master or within the scope of authority, provided such acts are violative of the master's implied contract of protection and proper treatment of its passengers at the hands of its servants, which the courts generally hold is a part of the contract of carriage. The latter liability did not exist at common law; the rule formerly being that the master was not liable for the torts of a servant committed wilfully and not for the benefit of the master. This added responsibility of the carrier is not unjust or intrinsically harsh, for the carrier has a measure of protection by using due care in the selection of its servants. A very different situation, however, is presented in the case at bar. Chapter 228, Laws 1911, creates a new offense, a new malum prohibitum, as above stated, which makes it unlawful to publicly drink or offer another an intoxicating beverage upon a railway train. It imposes no duty upon the railway company, but confers police power upon every conductor, and imposes a specific duty upon him with reference to the enforcement of such law. In discharging such duty the conductor does so, not in order to protect the other passengers, nor to carry out the master's implied contract to protect such passengers, nor in violation of the protection which the company owes to the particular passenger, but, as before stated, at the behest and command of the sovereign state. He acts for the state, not the railway company, and the former's interests alone are controlling of his acts. The legislature, in its wisdom, saw fit to place the duty to enforce this law, not upon the railway companies, but upon their conductors. Their responsibility and duty in such cases is not to their companies, but to the state. It logically follows that the companies have no voice in the matter, and, even though deemed detrimental to their interest, the enforcement of said statute cannot in any legal manner be controlled by them. Manifestly, therefore, the framers of the statute in question never intended to impose a liability on the railway companies in such cases; it being clearly their intention that, in the enforcement of such statute, the conductor should be deemed an officer of the state, and not of the company.

There is no difference between this case and one where a constable or sheriff makes an arrest upon a railway train or at a railway station. In such a case it is clear that the railway company would not be liable for an abuse or an improper exercise of such official duty. It is very doubtful, indeed, whether the carrier could be legally subjected to such responsibility, but it is not necessary for us to determine such question, as by such statute the legislature has not attempted to do this. It would be different, as held in numerous cases, if the conductor had been vested merely with police powers to be exercised at his own or the company's behest, and for the benefit of the company. See 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1265, and cases cited; Gillingham v. Ohio River R. Co. 35 W. Va. 588, 14 L.R.A. 798, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827, 14 S. E. 243; Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L.R.A. 483, 488, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1. But it is held that where he may act in either one of two capacities, as a policeman for the state, or as a servant for the master, the presumption would be that he acted in the former capacity. Jardine v. Cornell, 50 N. J. L. 485, 14 Atl. 590; Foster v. Grand Rapids R. Co. 140 Mich. 689, 104 N. W. 380, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 479. See also Tolchester Beach Improv. Co. v. Steinmeier, 72 Md. 313, 8 L.R.A. 846, 20 Atl. 188.

In Jardine v. Cornell, supra, we quote the following: "The act of the police in removing the plaintiff from the train to the station house was a continuous one; it was their duty as officers of the law to do so, and it was not within the scope of their employment in enforcing the regulations of the railroad company. Upon an undisputed state of the facts, the question presented is for the court. Where a police officer takes a disorderly person from the scene of his disorder to the police station, it will be presumed to have been done in his official character, unless such presumption is repugnant to some rule of law, or is rebutted by the facts of the case."

Counsel for respondent calls our attention to § 9755 of the Revised Codes, which makes railroad companies responsible for the acts of its conductors or other persons employed by it while acting as peace officers under the provisions of article 8 of chapter 6 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Such article authorizes railway companies, at their own expense, to employ persons as peace officers for the protection of their property or the preservation of order on their premises, etc., and it is perfectly proper that the legislature should have imposed upon the companies the responsibility for the acts of such peace officers. Manifestly, however, the provisions of article 8 aforesaid can have no application to the case at bar, for reasons which we think are made plain in a prior portion of this opinion.

We are agreed that, under the undisputed facts as narrated by the plaintiff, the recovery cannot be upheld, and that it was the duty of the court to have granted defendant's motion for a directed verdict.

The judgment is reversed, and the lower court will vacate the same and enter a judgment dismissing the action.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Garfield County Court convicting her of maintaining a bawdyhouse. Affirmed.

Statement by Furman, J.:

John H. Burford testified for the state that he, in company with H. L. Reynolds, visited the house kept by appellant in the city of Enid on the 2d day of July, 1911, about a quarter after 9 o'clock at night.

Witness then testified as follows:

A. Well, we walked up the stairway into this building, and at the head of the stairs this lady came and met us. She met us at the head of the stairs. I asked her if she was the proprietor, and she said, "Yes." I asked her if she knew of any rooming house for sale, and she said "Yes," and mentioned among them the Grand avenue and one right next to the postoffice. I believe that I will have to look at my notes in order to remember the name of it; anyhow, she mentioned the two, and then I asked her as to her house, if she would like to sell it, and she said, "No," and I asked her if she was doing well with it, and she said, "Yes." I asked her, "How do you manage to make it pay? Do you keep any girls?" She said "Yes." She pointed back to the front end of the hallway and invited us to go back. I says, "They seem to have company; I see a gentleman back there, a man or somebody." She said, "That's all right; that doesn't make any difference; go back." I walked back and had a seat, and so did Mr. Reynolds, and this gentleman opinion, though the weight of authority favors its admission. See 14 Cyc. 504. But where such evidence is held to be admissible, the general rule is that such evidence is not alone sufficient to determine its character, although there are a few cases which hold the contrary.

In adhering to the general rule PUTMAN that was sitting there got up and went into the room just across the way, on the southeast corner; it was the same room I had seen this woman go into.

Q. What woman are you speaking about?

A. I mean the one here. We sat and talked for some little bit. There was a small girl that I was talking to, and the girl that Mr. Reynolds was talking to was rather small. While we were talking, I overheard the girl that was talking to Mr. Reynolds insisting on him going to the room with her, and heard him ask her how much she wanted to charge him, and she said, "$3," and they were jolly about the price; that is about all I heard of their conversation.

Q. Well, what happened to them?

A. Well, after a little they got up and left and went into the second room from the front on the north side, near the head of the stairway.

Q. With reference to the room on the southeast side in which Mrs. Putman entered, how far was this room in which they entered?

A. Well, it was diagonally across the hall from where Mr. Reynolds and this girl entered, and was facing in the direction of that, and I should judge about—I should

And in State v. Bresland, 59 Minn. 281, 61 N. W. 450, it was held admissible in corroboration of other evidence.

In Botts v. United States, 83 C. C. A. 646, 155 Fed. 50, 12 Ann. Cas. 271, and Hall v. United States, 84 C. C. A. 215, 155 Fed. 52, the general reputation was held to be insufficient, although by the Alaska Code "common fame is expressly made competent evidence in support of an indictment for keeping of a bawdyhouse for purposes of prostitution."

In the Botts Case, it was said: "If reputation alone is enough, then one may be tried and convicted of keeping a house commonly said to be a bawdyhouse for purposes of prostitution, regardless of the question whether or not the house involved in the inquiry is in fact bawdy and used for such immoral purposes. On principle such a rule would be dangerous, and we must decline to approve it. There should be some additional evidence of the immoral purposes for which the house is kept; and, while it may not seem always easy to obtain testimony of such purposes, as a practical affair it ought not to be difficult, provided the reputation is based upon facts. The very same circumstances that have given a place its ill repute would ordinarily be ample additional evidence of the uses made of the house and the purposes for which it is kept. If men are seen going at unusual hours into a house where only women live; if obscene language and profanity are heard in the house; if drinking and boisterous conduct occur therein; if women clad in an unseemly way are about the premises; and if the women who live in the house are themselves reputed to be prostitutes,—these are all circumstances which, when considered with the general reputation of the place, justify the conclusion that such a house is kept for purposes of prostitution."

And a good reason for requiring corroboration of such evidence was stated in Reg. v. St. Clair, 3 Can. Crim. Cas. 557, 27 Ont. App. Rep. 308, that witnesses who speak simply to a general reputation, without being able to point to anything bad, may easily attribute the character of a common bawdyhouse or house of ill fame to a house to which, however irregular may be the life of its inmates, the law does not affix that character. The court further said that though the evidence of general reputation of a house is admissible, it was not prepared to say that such evidence alone would be sufficient to convict; that such a reputation is not acquired without acts or conduct capable of proof from which the character of the house may be inferred; such as the character of the women as being common prostitutes, and the fact of men visiting the house at all hours, and dissolute and disorderly behavior there.

And so, in State v. Anderson, 82 Conn. 111, 72 Atl. 640, upon prosecution for keeping "a house which was, and was reputed to be, a house of ill fame," under chap. 122 of Public Acts of 1907 of Connecticut, which provides that anyone who shall "keep a house which is reputed to be a house of ill fame shall," etc., an instruction was held erroneous which in effect stated that it was a criminal offense and an offense charged in the information to keep a house which had a reputation, based upon the honest opinion of the neighborhood, that it was a house of prostitution; and that the accused could be convicted of that distinct offense, although the evidence including the reputation might not be sufficient to prove that.

judge, going diagonally, it must have been pretty nearly the width of two ordinary rooms or something like that, I would judge.

Q. What was the condition of her door with reference as to whether or not it was open at this time?

A. I noticed—

By Mr. Glasser: If the court please, the defendant objects to that question for the reason that it is a trifle leading and suggestive, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

By the Court: The question is leading.

Q. What was the condition of that door?

the house was in fact of the character it was reputed to be. The court said: "Upon such proof of reputation, in the absence of any other evidence of the true character of the place, the jury may convict the accused of keeping a house or place which is in fact of the character that it is reputed to be. When such evidence of reputation is offered, it must, either by itself or in connection with other evidence, be sufficient to satisfy the jury beyond reasonable doubt that the reputed character of the house or place in question was its true character. When evidence of the reputed character of the place is offered, it may always be met by evidence that such is not the real character of the place; and however complete may be the proof of reputation, there can be no conviction if it appears that the house or place is not in fact kept or used for the reputed immoral or unlawful purposes."

Some cases, however, hold that a conviction may rest upon evidence of the character of the house, without corroboration:

People v. Buchanan, 1 Idaho, 681; Teritory v. Bowen, 2 Idaho, 640, 23 Pac. 82; State v. McDowell, Dud. L. 346; Morris v. State, 38 Tex. 604; Stone v. State, 22 Tex. App. 185, 2 S. W. 585; Cook v. State, 22 Tex. App. 511, 3 S. W. 749; Sara v. State, 22 Tex. App. 639, 3 S. W. 339; Forbes v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 24, 29 S. W. 784; Ramey v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 200, 45 S. W. 489; Moore v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 559, 110 S. W. 911 (dictum); Owens v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 1, 108 S. W. 379 (dictum); Burton v. State, 16 Tex. App. 156 (dictum).

And State v. Ballew, 26 S. D. 494, 128 N. W. 716, prosecution for keeping house of ill fame, may perhaps be authority for the sufficiency of general reputation to characterize a house as a house of ill fame, as the court said that it was clearly shown by the evidence in that case that the house kept by accused was a house of ill fame, as a number of witnesses on the part of the state had testified that the house had the general reputation of being such a place.

Q. State, if you know?

A. The door was standing open every time was said: "It has been held time and again that proof by general reputation that the house is kept for prostitution is both admissible and sufficient to establish its character as a disorderly house," and cites among other cases, State v. Smith, 29 Minn. 193, 12 N. W. 524. An examination of that case will disclose that, while holding such evidence admissible, the court expressly stated: "We do not hold, however, that evidence of general reputation alone would be sufficient to establish the character of the place."

It will be noted that most of the cases which hold contrary to the general rule are Texas cases, and it would seem that many of them are decided on the principle of stare decisis; for in Stone v. State, 22 Tex. App. 185, 2 S. W. 585, the court said that it is the settled doctrine in that state that the character of a house alleged to be disorderly house may be established by proof of its general reputation as such, and that it has been held that such proof is sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the house to be disorderly; and stated that, while this doctrine may be against the weight of authority, it is the established rule in that state, and it can see no good reason why it should be changed. The court based its reason for holding such evidence sufficient upon the fact that all the authorities hold it competent to prove the character of a house by proving the general reputation of its occupants for lewdness, and that it seemed to them that there is no material difference between proof of the character of the house and proof of the character of the occupants of the house. That the proof of one establishes the other.

But the court in this case did hold that an instruction that "proof of the general reputation of the house is sufficient to establish the character of the house," while correct in the abstract, was error as a charge upon the weight of evidence; that it was the province of the court to admit the evidence and of the jury to determine the sufficiency thereof. And in Forbes v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 24, 29 S. W. 784, a similar charge was said to be obnoxious as a charge upon the evidence. J. H. B.

I saw it, but at the time he went in there I wasn't sitting where I could see.

Q. All right. Go ahead and tell what next happened.

A. They stayed in the room, I suppose, for twenty or thirty minutes and came out, and Mr. Reynolds came back and sat down, and the girl came out directly with either a slop bucket, or something with water in it, or something like that. During the time they were away, this little girl insisted on my going to room with her. Before they came back, the little girl went back up the hallway, and there was a girl and a man that entered the northeast room; that door was open all the while I was there.

Q. Do you remember in what position they were when you saw them?

A. I wouldn't say that the man was sitting down or standing up. I rather think that he was standing up dressing, and in his shirt sleeves; anyhow, he passed out of the room and I wouldn't say where he went; anyhow, this little girl walked down the hallway while Mr. Reynolds was in the room with the other girl, and she said to me, "Why don't you go on and spend some money with the little girl?" I says, "Well, I am not feeling very well this evening," or something like that; I don't know just what it was that I said. Now, I believe that that is about all that I do know about it.

Q. Did you see that girl again who was in company with a strange man who was dressing and who departed? Did you see her later, after he departed?

A. After the man departed?

Q. Yes, after he left.

A. Well, that is when I was sitting there talking to her and while the little girl was gone, she asked me why I didn't take the girl and spend some money with her; it was this little girl; she was sitting in a chair, as I remember, just inside the door; the woman was sitting, and I think the man was standing when we came up.

Q. Where did she go? Where did the girl go?

A. The little girl— I don't know other than she went— Let me see. I was trying to get at the direction.

Q. Do you know where she went?

A. Yes, sir; I do.

Q. Where did she go?

A. She went west; she went in the opposite direction from the front, down the hallway; I don't know where she went.

Q. Was she the girl who was in the room with the strange man?

A. The little girl was not; this larger girl was; the one that I talked to while the little girl was gone was the girl with the man; she was sitting inside the door, and when the man left, and this little girl walked up the hallway, she talked to me.

Q. What did she say to you?

A. She said to me, among other things, "Why don't you take the little girl and spend some money?"

Q. Who said that?

A. This big girl that was in this room with this man.

Q. Who had left?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Glasser: I think that this examination is as leading as it can be; this witness can tell what is necessary.

By the Court: Tell what happened there and relate the conversation as near as you can.

A. In our conversation, she remarked she was from Oklahoma City.

Q. Did you have any further conversation?

A. Yes, sir; we did.

Q. Can you remember what it was?

A. I can; yes, sir.

Q. What was that conversation?

A. I says, "Well, how do you find business up here to, or how is business here compared to what it is in Oklahoma City? Are you making much money up here?" She says, "I made something over $60 this past month."

Q. This happened in what county?

A. It happened in Garfield county.

Q. In what state did it happen?

A. It happened in the state of Oklahoma.

Q. Do you remember the date?

A. I do remember it, yes.

Q. What was the date?

A. It was on the 2d day of July.

Q. Of what year was it?

A. Of the year of 1911.

Q. About what time that day was it?

A. It was about 9:15 o'clock in the afternoon.

H. L. Reynolds testified for the state as follows:

A. Mr. Burford and I went up the stairs which went through the center of the house, and at the head of the stairs we met the defendant, and Mr. Burford engaged her in conversation. I heard Mr. Burford ask her if she knew of any rooming houses for sale, and she answered that there were one or two, she thought; she named several, I think.

Q. Do you remember what next was said?

A. Yes, I remember about all the conversation that took place at that time.

Q. What was the next thing that was said?

A. He asked her if her rooming house was for sale.

Q. Did she reply to that?

A. She did.

Q. What did she say in reply to that?

A. She said, "No;" that she was doing a pretty good business.

Q. What was the next that was said between them?

A. Mr. Burford asked her if she depended upon her rooms for keeping up her house, or whether she kept some girls; she said, "Yes;" she had three girls, and she asked us if we wouldn't go back and talk with them. We went to the front of the building, and Mr. Burford, I think, was in the lead; there were two girls sitting there, and another man, and the man and Mrs. Putman went into the room to the south of the front there, and left Mr. Burford and I there with these two girls. In a few minutes another girl came out from the north room in front and sat down, and there were the three of us there and Mr. Burford, and I was talking to one girl there and Mr. Burford was talking to the other two; I don't know just what his conversation was with them; I was pretty busy myself, but some time during my conversation with the girl that I was talking to we were talking about Oklahoma City and different places and things in that place, and she asked me if I wouldn't go to bed with her and go to a room with her, and I asked her how much she wanted. We finally agreed upon the price.

Q. What was that price you agreed on?

A. It was $2; we went to the room; this room was situated just west of the north room on the east side, and we used the second room on the north side from this end of the building.

Q. Did you both go in the room together?

A. Yes, sir; we did.

Q. What did you do while you two were in there?

A. While we were in there we had sexual intercourse and we came out; Mr. Burford and I left the building.

Q. What took place in that room?

A. Why, we had sexual intercourse.

Q. Do you remember any conversation which she had with you at that time?

A. I couldn't state just the conversation; I think she intimated that she had seen me in Oklahoma City, and I may have stated that I had been there.

Q. She said she thought she had seen you there?

A. She said, anyhow, that she thought she had seen me down there. As we were going out of the door, she said, "You are not a gentleman if you turn me in."

Q. Where did you go next?

A. Well, do you mean after I left the room? Do you mean where I went next after I left the room?

Q. Yes. Where did you next go after leaving the room?

A. Well, I entered the hall and called for Mr. Burford.

Q. Then what did you do?

A. We then left the building.

Q. This happened in what county, Mr. Reynolds?

A. It happened in Garfield county.

Q. In what state did it happen?

A. In the state of Oklahoma.

Q. On what date did it take place?

A. The date was the 2d day of July.

Q. Now, about what time did it happen?

A. It happened about 9:15 o'clock P. M.

P. Chaney testified for the state that he resided in the city of Enid for eighteen years, and that he was acquainted with the house kept by appellant, and that it had the general reputation in that community of being a place where lewd and lascivious persons of both sexes congregated for the purpose of unlawful cohabitation or sexual intercourse. To this counsel for appellant objected upon the ground that the evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and for the further reason that a house cannot have a reputation; which objection was by the court overruled, to which action of the court appellant excepted.

W. J. Roberts testified for the state that he had lived in the city of Enid between thirteen and fourteen years, and knew the house kept by appellant and that it had the general reputation in that community of being a house where lewd and lascivious persons of both sexes congregated for unlawful cohabitation or sexual intercourse, to which evidence appellant objected upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and for the further reason that a house cannot have a reputation, which objection was overruled by the court, to which action of the court counsel for appellant excepted. The state here rested.

Appellant testified in her own behalf that she was keeper of the house in question and had kept said house for about a year, and that on the night when the house was visited by Burford and Reynolds there were only three girls there. One was named Clara Brown, who said she was from Oklahoma City; the other was a Mrs. Farris, who claimed to live in El Reno, and who said she was in Enid for the purpose of visiting her husband, who was also in the house at that time; and the other girl was named Maud, who had been in the employ of appellant several months as a chambermaid; that Clara Brown had previously been at the house of appellant two weeks and had come back that way on her way from Oklahoma City to Joplin, Missouri; that appellant was a married woman, who was divorced from her husband, and that she had been operating and managing rooming houses in the city of Enid for eight years; that, if any of the girls stopping at the house of appellant had ever been guilty of immoral practices there, she did not know it. Appellant did not deny the conversation of the witnesses Burford and Reynolds, as testified to by them. Appellant did not offer any evidence as to the reputation of the house or as to the character or business of the persons who patronized it.

Mr. Harry O. Glasser for appellant.

Messrs. Smith C. Matson and Joseph L. Hull for the State.

Furman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the authority of Carroll v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 242, 111 Pac. 1021, and Smith v. State, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 380, 118 Pac. 1003, the judgment of conviction in this case should be affirmed without a written opinion. But as a matter of respect for the earnestness and zeal which counsel for appellant has manifested in this cause, and the courtesy and ability with which he has presented his contention before the court, we will treat the questions involved as though they were of first impression.

The arguments advanced by counsel for appellant may be grouped under the general objection that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and the evidence. The legal question presented in the language of counsel for appellant is "that a house itself cannot have a reputation," and that therefore the court erred in admitting the testimony that the house kept by appellant had the general reputation in that community of being a house where lewd and lascivious persons of both sexes congregated for unlawful cohabitation or sexual intercourse. We concede that the position assumed by counsel for appellant is plausible upon its face, and that it is supported by respectable authorities. Upon an examination it will be found that the cases supporting this contention are all from states in which the common-law doctrine of a strict construction of penal laws is in force, which compels a very narrow view of such matters. But this doctrine is not in force in Oklahoma. On the contrary, it is repealed by the express language of our statute, which requires that all statutes shall "be liberally construed with a view to effect their objects and to promote justice." Rev. Stat. 1910, § 2948. It was in obedience to this statute that in the case of Buchanan v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 645, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 83, 112 Pac. 32, this court disregarded the great weight of common-law authorities upon the question of construing statutes. Under this statute we have repeatedly held that the corpus delicti may be proven by circumstantial evidence. See George v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 307, 97 Pac. 1052, 100 Pac. 46; Brown v. State, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 132 Pac. 359.

In the case of Stewart v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 564, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505, 109 Pac. 243, and in the case of State v. Coyle, 7 Okla. Crim. Rep. 50, 122 Pac. 243, and in the same case on motion for rehearing, 8 Okla. Crim. Rep. 686, 130 Pac. 316, this court held that an offense may be created by defining it by a particular description of the act or acts constituting it, or by defining it as any act which produces, or is reasonably calculated to produce, certain defined or described results. In fact, without a single exception, this court has always held that the penal laws of this state are to be given that reasonable and liberal construction which will enable them to reach and destroy the evils at which they are aimed. For these reasons the authorities cited by counsel for appellant are not applicable to the question now before us. But, even if they were based upon statutes in all respects similar to ours, we would not feel disposed to follow them, unless we understood and approved the principles upon which they are based. In the early case of Slater v. United States, 1 Okla. Crim. Rep. 275, 98 Pac. 110, this court said: "Precedents should be weighed, and not counted," and "a multiplicity of errors does not make right that which is predicated upon false premises, and which was therefore wrong at its inception." We then declared that we would not follow any precedents, it mattered not by what court established, unless they met with our approval, as a matter of principle. The habit of blindly following and parrot-like repeating precedents without reference to the principles upon which they are based is the cause of most of the confusion and conflicts which now exist among the decisions of the American appellate courts. One practical illustration is worth a thousand theories. Experience is the acid test of any theory.

A few illustrations will demonstrate the fallacy in the reasoning of the cases relied upon by counsel for appellant. What is known as the social evil is the greatest danger which now threatens the integrity of society and the purity of the home. It presents itself in many different forms. At first the evil was local in its character and was confined to ordinary bawdyhouses kept by individual proprietors. Then the rule contended for by counsel for appellant might have been sufficient. But in the development of crime it has gone far beyond this. In the underworld to-day it is recognized as a regular matter of commerce, and trusts are organized for its exploitation, and immense sums of money are made thereby. Thus it has grown to become the infamy of the infamous. The greatest states in the Union and the Congress of the United States have been compelled recently to pass stringent legislation against the spread of this vice and its attending enormity, the white slave trade. The old doctrine of the common law, that the reputation of a house could not be proved, will not begin to meet and check the evil as it presents itself to-day. It is a fact so well known in all large cities that courts take judicial knowledge of it that houses of ill fame are established and kept where notoriously lewd persons of either sex are permitted to remain. These establishments are exclusive in their character, and present an air of gentility and imminent respectability. They are patronized only by persons of both sexes who live double lives and against whose virtue nothing is publicly known. Eminent and unsuspecting girls are inveigled into such establishments, and their ruin is accomplished. Men and women of supposed respectability and virtue, and against whose reputation no legal evidence could be obtained, visit these houses for the purpose of indulging in unlawful sexual intercourse. This is really the most insidious and dangerous form in which the social evil presents itself. It is more dangerous to a community than a pesthouse of leprosy would be. If the general reputation of such a house is not admissible in evidence against its keeper, it would be almost impossible for the state to secure a conviction, and a community in which it was established would be unable to relieve itself of this airhole of hell and recruiting office for perdition. The men who patronize such houses generally occupy respectable positions in society. The women who accompany them are generally so heavily veiled as to make recognition impossible; but, if recognized, many, if not all of them, will be found to occupy respectable positions in society. So the state would be forced to rely largely upon the reputation of such a house to support a prosecution. The practical effect of the position of counsel for appellant would be to grant immunity to the keepers of such houses, it matters not where located. But again, if we recognize the doctrine contended for by counsel for appellant, it would place it in the power of those who control these houses to organize a vice trust in Oklahoma, and by changing the women kept in ordinary bawdyhouses from one town to another, and not allowing them to remain in one place long enough for their true character to become generally known, and thereby the evidence which the authorities relied upon by counsel for appellant recognize as proper could not be obtained by the state. Again, in the case of Nelson v. Territory, 5 Okla. 512, 49 Pac. 920, relied upon by counsel for appellant, it is expressly stated: "It is competent for the prosecution to show that the house is resorted to by people of both sexes who are reputed to be of lewd and lascivious character. From evidence of the general reputation of the inmates and persons who resort thereto, as being of lewd and lascivious character, the law will infer that such characters resort thereto for lewd and immoral purposes."

If the reputation of those who resort to the house may be proven, why may not the reputation of the house itself be proven? If this inference can be drawn from the character of the persons who resort to such houses, why can it not be drawn from the character of the house to which they resort? If children go to a building which has the reputation of being a schoolhouse, does not this raise the inference that they are going there for the purpose of being educated? If entire strangers are seen to enter a house on Sunday which has the general reputation of being a church, would this not raise the inference that they were going there for the purpose of engaging in religious services? Do ladies go to drug stores to purchase millinery, or go to millinery stores to purchase drugs? As a matter of principle, we are unable to recognize the doctrine established in the authorities relied upon by counsel for appellant. But we are gravely told that the character of a house of ill fame can be established by proving that the inmates have been fined in the police courts as prostitutes. In police courts the fact that a woman resides in or resorts to a house of ill fame is conclusive of the character of the woman. According to the position of counsel for appellant, while the reputation of a house may not be admissible in the first instance, yet, after it has received the seal of approval of the police court, it then becomes competent in a court of record. If this court refuses to blindly follow the decisions of the appellate courts of other states, we would instantly assume a ridiculous position if we allowed ourselves to be bound by the decisions of a police court. So as a matter of principle we submit the cases relied upon by counsel for appellant will not stand the test of reason.

But we are told that the character of a defendant is never admissible in evidence unless he first raises this issue. There are two conclusive answers to be made to this objection: First. The evidence in question does not go as to the personal character of the defendant, but goes alone to the reputation of the house she is charged with keeping, and this is the essence of the crime alleged, without reference to her personal character. It is true that the character of a defendant cannot be attacked, as a general rule of law, unless it is first placed in issue by the defendant; but like all other general rules this has its exceptions.

Mr. Wigmore, in the second volume of his work on Evidence, § 1620, under the head of "Keeping a House of Ill Fame, or a Disorderly House," says: "Having regard to the circumstances from which such a reputation arises, and the difficulty in obtaining other evidence in the ordinary way from unimpeachable witnesses, it seems unquestionable that reputation should be admitted as trustworthy and necessary evidence."

We find the following in the Encyclopedia of Evidence, vol. 4, p. 725: "Whether reputation is admissible to prove that a house is disorderly is a question concerning which the cases are conflicting. But the weight of authority seems to be that evidence of reputation is admissible to prove the character of a house, and particular acts of lewdness or prostitution need not be proved. On the same subject under the head of bawdyhouses, on page 503 in volume 14 of Cyc., we find the following: "Under common-law principles it would seem that evidence of the general reputation of a house would be inadmissible upon the issue of whether it is a bawdyhouse, and so quite a number of authorities hold; but very many authorities hold that the reputation of the house is admissible."

The terms "bawdyhouse" and "disorderly house" are used interchangeably and mean the same thing.

In the case of State v. Main, 31 Conn. 572, that court said: "3. Evidence of the reputation of the house prior to the discontinuance of the first prosecution was properly received. In the case of Cadwell v. State, 17 Conn. 467, it was held that evidence of the reputation of the house prior to the commission of the offense as charged in the information, and even prior to the enactment of the statute on which that prosecution was founded, was admissible to prove its reputation at the time of the offense committed, because, as remarked by Judge Storrs, 'evidence of the reputation of the house previous to a particular time fairly conduced to show its reputation afterwards.'"

In the case of Territory v. Chartrand, 1 Dak. 383, 46 N. W. 584, the court said: "The first error assigned is this: That the court erred in admitting evidence to show the general reputation of character of the house kept by defendant. In disposing of this question, it is understood, as the fact appears, that the defendant was the proprietor or keeper of the house in question. That fact being established, both upon principle and authority, we think the testimony competent. Acts of adultery, acts of lewdness, acts of prostitution, are not acts to which the perpetrators give publicity or notoriety. Shameless and degraded indeed must this class of criminals be who will not by all the means within their power conceal and hide their shame. Nor is it a crime which ordinarily will be attended with such circumstances as is calculated to lead to exposure and detection. No immediate death or fatal shot will invite public attention to criminals. From the necessity of the case, therefore, we are unanimously of the opinion that this testimony was properly received."

In the case of King v. State, 17 Fla. 191, the court said: "We are aware that the courts of some of the states have held that evidence of reputation of the house as a house of ill fame is not admissible, but believe the better rule to be that adopted in Connecticut. In that state the language of the statute is precisely similar to our own, 'keeping a house of ill fame resorted to for the purposes of prostitution or lewdness;' and the courts of that state have held that by force of these particular words, it is both permissible and necessary to prove the reputation of the house."

In the case of Betts v. State, 93 Ind. 376, that court said: "Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary, defines a 'bawdyhouse' as being 'a house of ill fame, kept for the resort and unlawful commerce of lewd people of both sexes;' and other law dictionaries and law-writers give substantially the same definition. Accepting this definition as sufficient, it has been held, and we have no doubt correctly, that the terms 'bawdyhouse' and 'house of ill fame' are synonymous. State v. Boardman, 64 Me. 523, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 351. Webster's Dictionary, in giving the meaning of 'bawdyhouse' treats the term 'house of ill fame' as its synonym. A 'house of ill fame' may therefore be said to be a 'bawdyhouse kept for the resort and unlawful commerce of lewd people of both sexes.' The words 'house of ill fame' has consequently a well-defined legal, as well as generally accepted, meaning. We see no objection to the sufficiency of the indictment. At the trial one Miller was examined as a witness for the state. He stated that he had been acquainted with the defendants since about the 1st of April, 1882; also with the house in which they had lived, as well as the reputation of that house during that period. Over the objection of the defendants, he was permitted to further state that 'the general reputation of that house was that it was a house of ill fame, a house of prostitution,' and complaint is made that this evidence ought to have been excluded. The authorities are not entirely in accord upon the admissibility of such evidence in a case like this, but we think the decided weight of authority is in favor of its admissibility. Moore's Criminal Law states the rule to be that 'a house of ill fame may be proved to be such by direct evidence, or by reputation, or by circumstances; as, that the inmates were reputed to be prostitutes, or that prostitutes and libertines frequented it, or that lewdness took place therein;' and numerous authorities are cited in support of these several propositions. See Moore, Crim. Law, § 1072, and notes. State v. Brunell, 29 Wis. 435, one of the cases cited by Moore, holds that, in a prosecution for keeping a house of ill fame, the state must first prove that the person charged kept the house in question; that the general reputation of the house, and of its frequenters and the defendant, may then be shown, and, if these satisfy the jury that the house was kept and resorted to for the purposes of prostitution and lewdness, they may so find without proof of particular acts of prostitution or lewdness occurring in the house. But that proof that the house was reputed to be a house of ill fame, or that its frequenters and the defendant were persons of bad character for chastity and virtue, is not conclusive of the defendant's guilt. Such facts constitute only circumstances proper to be considered by the jury. That case impresses us as one that may be safely followed in this state, and fully sustains the admissibility of the evidence of Miller, objected to as above."

In the case of State v. McDowell, Dud. L. 346, the supreme court of South Carolina, in an opinion by Justice O'Neal, said: "When it is shown that their houses were notorious—that is, known to the whole community—as common bawdyhouses, it is the same thing as if it was proved that over the door of each house was written in the abominable law word, 'bawdy within.' Look to the reason why the law punishes the offense. It is because such houses may draw together dissolute and disorderly persons, to the danger of the public peace, and may corrupt the manners of both sexes. Is not a house, notorious as a bawdyhouse, the very thing to attract dissolute and disorderly persons, and is it not the very thing to corrupt the manners of both sexes? To say that there is any danger of a virtuous woman being convicted on such testimony is utterly absurd. She cannot even be suspected until she has lost her character, and she cannot be convicted until she occupies a position furnishing flagrant proof. But, if such a charge should even be made against a virtuous woman, her character will be her shield: and in her vindication she may examine into the foundation and truth of every particular on which such a charge may be made. I think, too, a decent regard to good morals should always be had in requisition and adduction of evidence in a court of justice. Every corrupting fact which can be supplied by general proof should be excluded. The general proof here is just as satisfactory as the most direct proof can be. Why should more be required? The law does not require it, for no such rule of evidence exists. The best evidence which the nature of the case admits of is an old and familiar rule that has been complied with here; and we have the proof of the truth of the old saying that 'what everybody says must be true,' in the admission of the zealous counsel for the defendants that he had not a doubt of their guilt. And, in a case in which character is its very gist, I am willing to make that which everybody says the evidence on which a jury may, if they choose, convict defendants for keeping a bawdyhouse."

We might continue to quote authorities to the same effect indefinitely. These are ample to show that we are not without support in the matter of precedents in the position which we have assumed. The rule for which we contend is in strict harmony with the fundamental principles of justice. If a house has the general reputation of being a bawdy house, such reputation must be known to its keeper, and can only be gained and maintained on account of the conduct of the persons who resort to it. It is inconceivable that a house kept for proper purposes should ever gain the general reputation of being a bawdy house. The reputation of the house is the advertisement of its keeper. It draws customers and is a source of revenue. There is and can be no injustice in holding the keeper of a house responsible for its general reputation when that reputation is backed up by any evidence which tends to show that it is well founded. It was for these reasons that in the case of Carroll v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 242, 111 Pac. 1021, and the case of Smith v. State, 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 380, 118 Pac. 1003, that this court held that in a prosecution for the keeping of a bawdyhouse it is competent for the state to introduce evidence of the general reputation of the house in the community in which it is situated as to its being a place where lewd and lascivious persons of both sexes congregated for the purpose of unlawful cohabitation or sexual intercourse. But it will be observed that this court has never stated that such evidence alone was sufficient to sustain a conviction. We are of the opinion that those cases which so hold go too far. We think that, while this evidence is admissible, yet standing alone and by itself it is not sufficient to sustain a conviction. Evidence of recent possession of stolen property is always admissible in a prosecution for theft, but this evidence alone will not sustain a conviction, but must be considered in connection with all the other facts and circumstances in the case. The danger of convicting a defendant alone upon the reputation of a house is clearly pointed out in an opinion by Presiding Judge Armstrong, handed down at the present term of the court, in which the conviction was reversed because there was no corroborating evidence. But in Patterson's Case, — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 132 Pac. 693, the admissibility of evidence of the reputation of the house was recognized and affirmed.

We have discussed this question fully, because counsel for appellant so strongly insisted that such evidence was not admissible for any purpose. In this case there is no question that the appellant kept the house. In fact, it was admitted.

In the light of the testimony of the reputation of the house, in connection with the other testimony in the case, the jury were fully warranted in finding the appellant guilty.

The judgment of the lower court is therefore in all things affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

ROBERT A. BOLE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

PITTSBURGH ATHLETIC COMPANY.

(— C. C. A. —, 205 Fed. 468.)

Proximate cause — amusement park — jostling of crowd.

The natural jostling or pushing of a crowd seeking entrance to a ball game, which causes a patron to be pushed against a trapdoor left open in a passageway leading to seats on an upper floor, cannot be considered as the proximate cause of the accident, for the purpose of relieving the owner of the grounds from liability for negligently leaving the door open in that place.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while a patron of defendant's baseball grounds. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

There are many cases where the intermediate cause is the direct cause of the injury, and yet the defendant's negligence is held to be the proximate cause of the injury.

Wagner v. Hazle Twp. 215 Pa. 219, 64 Atl. 405; Sturgis v. Kountz, 165 Pa. 358, 27 L.R.A. 390, 30 Atl. 976; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 32; Thompson. Neg. 2d ed. § 54.

The same rule should be applied to determine whether or not the weakened condition of the plaintiff was caused by the injuries which he received in the accident.

Lindvall v. Woods, 44 Fed. 855.

Gray, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The case before us arises out of an action in the court below for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff below (plaintiff in error), on a grand stand controlled by the defendant below (defendant in error), at the Forbes Field Baseball Park, in the city of Pittsburgh.

On the afternoon of September 16, 1911, plaintiff, having paid his admission, was going along a passageway on the first floor of the grand stand, toward the elevators, to be taken up to his box in one of the galleries. On that particular afternoon, the defendant had allowed to remain open an iron trapdoor, 3 feet square, covering an opening in the main floor of the grand stand, leading to the machinery beneath that operated the elevators. When shut, the door was flush with the cement floor, and formed part of the floor of the passageway. When open, the top of the door faced the elevators and narrowed the passageway between it and the elevators, according to the presumably accurate measurement of the blueprint in evidence, to a width of 5 feet. It was testified that there were about 20,000 people at the game on that particular afternoon, and many hundreds of them who used the elevators had to pass through this narrow passageway. The door, when raised, stood at an angle of about 80 or 85 degrees from the plane of the opening which it was designed to cover, and was held rigidly in place by brace irons on either side of it.

A great crowd of people were pressing through this passageway, between the uplifted door and the elevators, which became more dense at that point from the pressure of those behind, as the guard rails to the elevators only admitted one at a time. The only testimony as to how the accident happened was that of the plaintiff himself. The following is the essential part of his testimony, as it appears in the record: "The crowd was progressing towards the rear to get into the elevator. I was going along, without any idea of any obstruction in the way. The point at which you pass around to get into the elevator, around the guard, is only a very short distance from the trapdoor, which was propped open,—I should say not more than 6 or 7 feet [the evidence of the blue print is 5 feet],—and this dense crowd had to go through that small opening. Somebody jostled me, and I couldn't see anything, lost my balance, and went right over this thing. Nobody could possibly have escaped it in the position I was in. The trapdoor extended about 3 feet, and I fell over and doubled up like a jackknife."

Looking at a photograph, he testified: "Well, the crowd was surging through here (indicating) to get around here (indicating) to get into the elevator. I was coming around the crowd. I was on the outside, the crowd surging around here. . . . There isn't a very strong light here, and if you are not watching for that thing, with the crowd around you it is hard to find. I was in this crowd and somebody jostled me, and I went over the edge of it. I tripped here first and lost my balance."

On cross-examination, also, he says: "There was difficulty on this particular occasion, because the crowd was so dense nobody could have seen it. I was all around in that crowd, a swirling crowd, trying to get through a 7-foot opening. I should say there were several hundred people ahead of me, waiting to get up on the elevator. I recall that there were 20,000 people there that day."

The case was submitted to the jury with a charge by the court, and a verdict was rendered for the defendant. After refusal of a motion by plaintiff for a new trial, to the judgment entered on this verdict, the present writ of error has been sued out by the plaintiff. The assignments of error are founded upon exceptions to certain portions of the charge of the court. The question raised by these assignments concerns the propriety, in relation to the facts of the case, of what was said by the court in its charge, as to the proximate cause of the injury suffered by the plaintiff. The parts of the charge excepted to are as follows: "Now, if you find the defendant was not negligent, then that is the end of this case, but if you find the defendant was negligent, there is another question that you are to consider, and that is, whether that negligence was a direct and proximate cause of the injuries to the plaintiff. . . . If the plaintiff was jostled or pushed and thereby forced upon this hatchway door, and if he would not have come in contact with the hatchway door except for that, then you may conclude that the jostling or pushing was the direct and primary cause of the injury. If the pushing and jostling was the direct cause of the injury to the plaintiff, then you could not hold the defendant for injuries which were caused by another.

. . . I think one of the witnesses testified there was some loss of power and the engineer had to go down and start up the power. That might have caused an unnecessary and an unusual crowd there, but if the pushing and jostling was the direct and efficient cause of the injuries to the plaintiff, without which he would not have fallen over the grating and had been hurt, then the verdict should be for the defendant, because you cannot—should not make one party pay for what another party has brought about; but you are to consider all the facts in the case, and determine whether or not the jostling and pushing was the direct and proximate cause, or primary cause, or whether it was the open hatchway door."

We are compelled to differ from the learned and careful judge of the court below, in the view here taken of the application of the rule, causa proxima, non remota spectatur. It would answer no good purpose to indulge in the subtleties of abstract reasoning to which this maxim so often gives rise. In its juridical sense, it would seem incapable of such definition as would furnish a practical test of liability or non-liability in a given case. The terms used do not accurately connote the conceptions they are intended to cover. Whether "proximate" means "nearest" in point of time or space to the result complained of depends upon circumstances. "Primary" may sometimes better describe the efficient or responsible cause of a legal liability,—though first and in point of time the most remote. In many, if not in most, cases, that cause of an injury to which legal liability attaches may be better described as the "efficient" cause. So many elements, however, may enter into the determination of what is the efficient cause, and so long a train of antecedents may come under consideration, "but for" the happening of any one of which the result complained of would not have occurred, that we may still be involved in the difficulties of selecting from the train of antecedents the one to which should attach the legal liability sought to be imposed. The practical application of the rule must depend upon the circumstances of each individual case.

Parsons, in his work on Contracts 6th ed. vol. 3, p. 179, says: "Not only is there no definite rule or clear and precise principle given, by which we may measure the nearness or remoteness of effect in this respect; but the highest judicial authorities are so directly antagonistic, that they scarcely serve as guides to lead us to a conclusion. . . . We have been disposed to think that there is a principle, derivable, on the one hand, from the general reason and justice of the question, and, on the other hand, applicable as a test, in many cases, and perhaps useful, if not decisive, in all. It is that every defendant shall be held liable for all of those consequences which might have been foreseen and expected as the result of his conduct, but not for those which he could not have foreseen, and was therefore under no moral obligation to take into his consideration."

For this rule, the author refers to the high authority of Pollock, Chief Baron, in Rigby v. Hewitt, 5 Exch. 240, 19 L. J. Exch. N. S. 291. This rule, so far as it extends, satisfies the reason and common sense which is the essence of the common law, and is applicable to the present case.

The defendant owned or controlled the premises upon which the accident, which resulted in the injury complained of, happened. The building was erected for the accommodation of the large crowds that gather to witness the athletic contests and games, which were conducted by the defendant for profit, the public being invited to patronize the same. The entrance and passageway along which the plaintiff proceeded after paying the sum demanded for his admission, was necessarily for the accommodation of the crowds who were expected to throng such places of amusement. It is not contradicted that, on the holiday afternoon in question, about 20,000 people were present to witness a game of baseball that excited the public interest. The testimony of the plaintiff is not contradicted, that many hundreds were crowding through the passageway described, which led to elevators, by which persons were taken to galleries on an upper tier or floor. That the iron trapdoor in the concrete floor, on the afternoon in question and while the crowd was pressing along the passageway, had been left open by someone in the employ of the defendant, is not denied. This open door, facing the elevators, narrowed the passageway between them and it to a width of about 5 feet, and, according to the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff, the crowd at that point became dense from the pressure of those behind and from the fact that only one person at a time could pass through the guard rails to the elevators. The plaintiff says he was on the outside of this crowd; that is, on the side nearest the trapdoor, and that this crowd was "surging" through the narrow passage between the trapdoor and the elevator; that the light was not very bright; that by reason of the crowd, he did not see the door; and that, by being jostled by someone in the crowd, he fell across the edge of the iron door and sustained the injuries complained of. There is nothing to indicate that such jostle was other than an incident of the ordinary pressure of a crowd thronging into a narrow passage. There was no disorder, no assault made upon him, and nothing to indictae other than the normal condition attending a thronged and crowded passageway.

No question of proximate cause is here involved. The only question which should have been submitted to the jury is the simple one of the defendant's negligence. The charge was not that there was negligence in the location of the trapdoor opening, but in the alleged improper raising of the trapdoor, and allowing it to stand as a barrier in the pathway of persons approaching the elevator. In disposing of this question, the jury should be told that they were to take into consideration the conditions which would naturally arise in the presence of a crowd, and defendant should be held liable for those consequences (and those consequences only) which might have been foreseen and expected as a result of its conduct in permitting the trapdoor, under the circumstances, to remain open. But, as said by Mr. Justice Colt, in Hill v. Winsor, 118 Mass. 251: "It is not necessary that injury in the precise form in which it in fact resulted should have been foreseen. It is enough that it now appears to have been a natural and probable consequence."

We are therefore compelled to the conclusion that the learned judge of the court below was in error, in submitting to the jury, as was done in those portions of his charge upon which the assignments are based, the question whether the negligence of the defendant, if found by them, was the direct and proximate cause of the injuries to the plaintiff, or whether the jostling and pushing was the proximate or primary cause. The "surging crowd" and the "jostling" were in no sense the juridical cause of the accident, though they were the conditions which might make the negligence of the defendant the efficient cause.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

ECHO L. WELLS, Respt.,
v.

MINNEAPOLIS BASEBALL & ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION, Appt.

(122 Minn. 327, 142 N. W. 706.)

Pleading — negligence — sufficiency.

1. In this a personal injury action, the complaint contained sufficient allegations of negligence, and the objection to the reception of any testimony thereunder was rightly overruled.

Baseball grounds — duty to patrons.

2. One who maintains grounds to which the public is invited to witness games of baseball is not an insurer against the dangers incident to witnessing the game, but is required to use the care and precaution of the ordinary prudent person to protect the spectators against such dangers. He is not required to anticipate the improbable.

Same — assumption of risk.

3. Persons who know and appreciate the danger from thrown or batted balls assume the risk, and they cannot claim the management guilty of negligence when a choice is given between a seat in the open and one behind a screen of reasonable extent.

Trial — jury — duty of owner of baseball grounds.

4. It is a question for the jury what precaution and care should be taken by the management of a baseball exhibition to warn and safeguard the spectators against the dangers incident to the game.

Damages — personal injury — expense of nursing.

5. If plaintiff prevailed, she was entitled to recover as special damages the reasonable value of the nursing necessitated on account of the injuries, notwithstanding such nursing was rendered by a member of the family without expectation of payment.

Evidence — warnings in baseball grounds — effect on spectators.

6. Evidence that in conspicuous places in the grand stand were signs in large letters stating that the management will not be responsible for injuries received from thrown or batted balls was admissible, as tending to prove a precaution taken to warn spectators of the perils.

Trial — instructions — error.

7. Parts of the charge held objectionable, though not, perhaps, sufficient to require a reversal.

denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict for plaintiff or for a new trial in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while attending a baseball game upon defendant's grounds. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kerr, Fowler, Ware, & Furber, for appellant:

A married woman is "not entitled to recover the expenses incurred for medical treatment, as these were expenses for which her husband was liable, and for which she was not liable."

The posted signs that the management will not be responsible for injuries received from thrown or batted balls constitute a notice and warning to the public, the consequences and effect of which should have been submitted to the jury.

These signs called the attention of plaintiff to the possibilities of danger, and notified her that she must assume all risks incident to putting herself in a position where she would be exposed to being struck by foul balls, and warned her that she must assume the risks incident to the game.

The fact of knowledge may be established by circumstantial evidence, even where actual knowledge must be proved.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appeal by the defendant from an order denying its motion in the alternative for judgment or a new trial.

The defendant maintains grounds in the city of Minneapolis to which the public is invited to witness games of baseball. An admission fee is ordinarily charged, but upon certain days ladies are admitted free. The ball grounds are on the block bounded by Blaisdell avenue on the west and Thirty-first street on the south. The old grand stand in which plaintiff was injured was built in the corner formed by the intersection of the streets mentioned. It was so constructed and arranged that the front seats—that is, those nearest the players—and the parapet in front were at least 6 feet from the ground, then passing up towards the rear each row of seats was raised several inches above the row next in front of it. The home plate was on the line bisecting the angle formed by the streets mentioned. About 65 feet back of the home plate was the front row of a section of seats; each row in this section being about 25 feet long, and perhaps increasing in length toward the rear. This section, together with the rows on either side thereof running parallel to Thirty-first street and Blaisdell avenue, respectively, formed three sides of an octagon. The length, however, of the rows on Thirty-first street was about 90 feet, and on Blaisdell avenue nearly the same. These rows were broken by aisles running from front to rear. The grand stand was covered by a roof sloping slightly to the rear. The front, of course, was open; the space from the top of the parapet in front of the front seats to the roof being about 15 feet. Posts 8 inches square supported the roof in front. These were placed along the parapet referred to, and about 20 feet apart, except the two behind the home plate, which were 25 feet apart, one at each end of the center section of seats above spoken of. Foul balls and foul tips frequently pass from the home plate, where the batter stands, toward the grand stand. Naturally that part of the ground stand back of the home plate is the most exposed to danger from such balls and tips, and to protect the spectators the defendant had a wire or steel screen (through which the ball could not pass) which completely covered the opening from the roof down, and extended between the two center posts mentioned, and thence to the next adjoining post on either side, so that in all about 65 feet of the center of the grand stand was protected by screen.

Plaintiff alleged that on July 9, 1910, she attended a game, and was struck with such force by a flying ball from the players that her collar bone was fractured; that the only way of protecting spectators from the dangers incident to the game was to place and maintain screens between the players and spectators; and that "the defendant did place and maintain in such position a screen or netting for the purpose aforesaid, but that defendant negligently constructed such screen or netting of insufficient size to furnish such protection; that the plaintiff saw said screen or netting, and was ignorant of the fact that it was of insufficient size, and was ignorant of the fact that a batted ball might pass the same and hit the spectators in said grand stand." The answer denies negligence, and avers that the injury was accidental, and further that the plaintiff was injured through her own negligence, and that she assumed the risk of injury from flying balls.

Plaintiff testified that she took a seat in the front row of seats on the Thirty-first street side, about 10 feet west of the easterly end of the street. As there was an aisle and box seats in front of her, she was about 10 to 12 feet to the rear of the screen. She selected the seat. There were vacant seats more protected. She does not claim that the ball which struck her went through the screen. She thinks it curved around the end of it. Her companion, seated to her right, was of the same opinion, and also stated that she thought the screen extended to the east about 8 feet farther than where she was sitting. All the other thirteen witnesses, who professed to know where the plaintiff was when she was hit, are agreed that she was seated farther east and beyond the screen.

It is not necessary to discuss each error assigned. They may be considered under the claim of appellant that the complaint does not state a cause of action, that the defendant was entitled to judgment, that the testimony of the value of the nursing rendered by plaintiff's mother should not have been received, that the testimony relating to the posting of certain notices in the grand stand was erroneously excluded, and alleged errors in the charge.

We think it sufficiently appears from the complaint that the danger of injury to spectators is incident to a game of baseball, that it is necessary for those who manage such public amusement to protect against these dangers by screens, that the defendant, in the performance of this duty, was negligent in not furnishing a screen of sufficient size to give protection, and that plaintiff was ignorant of that fact. The complaint states a cause of action. Therefore the court properly overruled the objection to the reception of any evidence thereunder.

The court left the jury to determine plaintiff's right to recover, either upon her own claim that she was within the screen, or upon the defendant's that she was outside, when struck. Upon her theory the defendant contends that the course of the ball was so unheard of that no duty rested upon defendant to protect her therefrom, and that, if she was seated outside the screen, she knowingly assumed all risk from injury from foul balls. We are all agreed that, if plaintiff occupied the place she and her companion testify to, the defendant had performed its full duty for her protection, and there is no liability for the injury. It is inconceivable that a baseball, when fouled by a batter, could curve around the end of the screen in the manner this ball is said by her to have curved and reach her. No one claims that it glanced from striking any post or object after the time it touched the bat and before it struck plaintiff. The defendant was not an insurer against all perils, nor was it guilty of negligence in failing to guard against improbable dangers. Therefore, if the court had submitted the case to the jury solely upon plaintiff's claim, or if all the evidence had sustained her as to her position in the grand stand, a direction for judgment would have been unavoidable.

But the court also left it to the jury to say whether a recovery should be had if plaintiff was seated outside the screen; and she may have been mistaken as to where she was seated. Upon this view, we think it cannot be said as a matter of law that there is no cause of action. It has been frequently held that one who invites the public to places of amusement, such as theaters, shows, and exhibitions, must exercise a high degree of care for the safety of those invited. As to stairways, platforms, walks, and other structures, it may be said that the duty is somewhat similar in degree and nature to that owing from a common carrier to its passengers. Thomp. Neg. §§ 995, 996; Scott v. University of Michigan Athletic Asso. 152 Mich. 684, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 234, 125 Am. St. Rep. 423, 116 N. W. 624, 15 Ann. Cas. 515. But this rule must be modified when applied to an exhibition or game which is necessarily accompanied with some risk to the spectators. Baseball is not free from danger to those witnessing the game. But the perils are not so imminent that due care on the part of the management requires all the spectators to be screened in. In fact, a large part of those who attend prefer to sit where no screen obscures the view. The defendant has a right to cater to their desires. We believe that as to all who, with full knowledge of the danger from thrown or batted balls, attend a baseball game, the management cannot be held negligent when it provides a choice between a screened in and an open seat, the screen being reasonably sufficient as to extent and substance.

This is virtually the rule applied in Crane v. Kansas City Baseball & Exhibition Co. 168 Mo. App. 301, 153 S. W. 1076, where it is said: "Defendants were not insurers of the safety of spectators, but, being engaged in the business of providing a public entertainment for profit, they were bound to exercise reasonable care, i. e., care commensurate to the circumstances of the situation, to protect their patrons against injury. [King v. Ringling, 145 Mo. App. 285, 130 S. W. 482; Murrell v. Smith, 152 Mo. App. 95, 133 S. W. 76]. In view of the facts that the general public is invited to attend these games, that hard balls are thrown and batted with great force and swiftness, and that such balls often go in the direction of the spectators, we think the duty of defendants towards their patrons included that of providing seats protected by screening from wildly thrown or foul balls, for the use of patrons who desired such protection. Defendants fully performed that duty when they provided screened seats in the grand stand, and gave plaintiff the opportunity of occupying one of those seats." And if it had appeared clearly that plaintiff knew the dangers incurred by taking a seat in the open, it should be held that she assumed all risk of injury from balls thrown or batted in the game. We do not think this knowledge conclusively appears. In the Crane Case, supra, one of the stipulated facts was this: "Baseball is our national game, and the rules governing it and the manner in which it is played and the risks and dangers incident thereto are 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) matters of common knowledge." But we do not think that all who attend baseball games would or should enter such a stipulation. Only those who have been struck with a baseball realize its hardness, swiftness, and dangerous force. Women and others not acquainted with the game are invited, and do attend. It would not be either a safe or reasonable rule to hold that, in these games to which the general public is invited, no duty rests upon the management to protect from the dangers incident thereto, other than by a proper screening of part of the seats. What precaution the ordinarily prudent person, furnishing a public amusement of this kind, should take to warn and protect the spectators from the attendant dangers of which they may be ignorant, we think a question for the jury.

Over objection, plaintiff was permitted to show the value of the nursing, rendered by her mother, with whom plaintiff, although of age, was living. It does not appear that the mother expected pay therefor. The authorities are not agreed that the value of services rendered under such circumstances is an element of recoverable damages. Goodhart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 177 Pa. 1, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705, 35 Atl. 191, and Morris v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 144 Mo. 500, 46 S. W. 170, are to the effect that the recovery may not include the value of services rendered gratuitously. In Indiana it is settled that an element of damage in a personal injury action is the reasonable value of nursing and caring for the one injured, regardless of whether rendered gratuitously or under promise to pay. In Pennsylvania Co. v. Marion, 104 Ind. 239, 3 N. E. 874, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 175, the court says: "The plaintiff, having testified that the nurses who attended him while prostrated from the injury did so voluntarily and without charge, was nevertheless permitted, over objection, to prove by his attending physician what their services were worth. This evidence was admissible under the rulings in Indianapolis v. Gaston, 58 Ind. 224, and Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Dickerson, 59 Ind. 317. These services were necessary to ameliorate the condition and suffering of the plaintiff. That they were voluntarily and gratuitously rendered was for his benefit, and not for the benefit of the defendant. Klein v. Thompson, 19 Ohio St. 569." Brosnan v. Sweetser, 127 Ind. 1, 26 N. E. 555; Varnham v. Council Bluffs, 52 Iowa, 698, 3 N. W. 792, and Crouse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 102 Wis. 196, 78 N. W. 446, 778, are to the same effect.

Belyea v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 61 Minn. 224, 63 N. W. 627, and other cases cited by the appellant, are not in point, for the reason that the law placed the duty to furnish medical attendance and nursing upon another than the plaintiff in the case, at the suit of whom the defendant would be liable. We adopt the rule followed in Iowa, Indiana, and Wisconsin, to the effect that a plaintiff who is entitled to recover special damages for nursing in a personal injury action may recover the reasonable value thereof, even though the nursing was rendered by a member of the family without expectation of compensation. Although services between members of a family or relatives are not often paid for in cash, the tacit understanding is that the recipient will reciprocate in kind when occasion arises, and there is a moral obligation so to do. If the defendant's tort necessitated the nursing, it should pay the reasonable value thereof. It is true that the recovery is limited to the amount agreed upon, where the services have been rendered with the understanding that payment should be made; but it is also true that, if the agreed price is more than the reasonable value, the recovery cannot exceed such value. We therefore think that the amount alleged to have been paid or expended may be said to state, although not directly, nevertheless by permissible inference, the reasonable value. At any rate, we would not reverse on the ground that the value of the nursing was not alleged, because a slight amendment of the complaint would obviate the objection.

We also think that the testimony which was offered by the defendant that signs in large letters were posted at the entrance and in the grand stand in conspicuous positions should have been received. These signs were: "The management will not be responsible for injuries received from thrown or batted balls. M. E. Cantillion, President." As hereinbefore indicated, a jury might find that the defendant owed its patrons a duty other than providing some seats behind screens; that it must use proper care to impart notice of the danger incident to the game. It is true the defendant stated that it could not prove that the plaintiff saw these notices. But that is not decisive. The notice may serve a twofold purpose. It may impart actual knowledge to the plaintiff, and posting it might tend to absolve defendant from the charge of negligence in failing to warn of danger. If the jury should conclude that, in posting these notices and screening a part of the stand for the use of those who sought protection, the defendant had performed its full duty to its patrons, then there can be no negligence and no recovery, regardless of the plaintiff's actual knowledge of such notices. It may be contended 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) that these signs were not in the nature of a warning, and were not intended for that purpose. Conceding that the defendant may not escape liability by merely stating it will not be responsible, nevertheless we do think the signs convey information that injuries are apt to happen from thrown and batted balls, and are therefore in the nature of a precaution to prevent injury. The signs, as well as the screens, bore upon the defendant's conduct with respect to precautions taken for the safety of the spectators; they also bore upon the question of plaintiff's assumption of risk. If the signs conveyed warning or information, the mere posting in conspicuous places in the grand stand made plaintiff's observation of them a question for the jury, without direct proof that she saw them.

Fault is found with the court's charge in several respects; but, since there must be a new trial, it is not deemed necessary to discuss the errors based thereon, except that in one place the court left the jury to say whether the screen was constructed in a reasonably safe manner. There was no evidence that the screen was defective, or did not turn the ball, so that technically the court's statement was not correct; but no attention was called to the inaccuracy at the time, and, if that were the only error in the case, it would not be reversed. It may be also said that the question of defendant's negligence did not depend on the extent to which the screen should extend beyond the place plaintiff chose for her seat, but rather upon whether the screen furnished was one which the ordinarily prudent person would deem of sufficient size to afford reasonable protection.

Order reversed, and a new trial granted.

(February 24, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for negligently leaving a sponge in the body of the plaintiff patient after an operation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jesse H. Wise, William E. Minor, Joseph W. Walters, and Frank P. Corbin for appellants.

And as to the liability of a physician or surgeon for acts of associate see note to Morey v. Thybo, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 785.

Generally, as to the degree of skill and care of specialist, see note to Rann v. Twitchell, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1030.

It is generally held that a surgeon, under his duty to exercise ordinary skill and care in performing an operation upon a patient, is liable for injuries resulting from his leaving a foreign substance, such as a gauze pad or sponge, in a wound or incision.

Thus, a surgeon was held liable for injuries resulting from his leaving a gauze sponge in the abdominal cavity of the patient. Ruth v. Johnson, 96 C. C. A. 643, 172 Fed. 191; Palmer v. Humiston, 87 Ohio St. 401, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 640, 101 N. E. 283; Gillette v. Tucker, 67 Ohio St. 106, 93 Am. St. Rep. 639, 65 N. E. 643, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 421; Samuels v. Smith, supra, evidence of the method adopted at the hospital where the operation was performed, to determine whether all gauze pieces used in operations are accounted for, was held inadmissible, where the physician testified that his method of keeping track of the pieces of gauze used required the nurses to count them, but the 46 L.R.A. The surgeon is liable only as for negligence.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff Mrs. Gertrude Davis, with a view of having a surgical operation performed on her person by the appellee, a professional surgeon, upon the latter's suggestion, and advice and with his assistance, secured accommodations at Mercy Hospital, in the city of Pittsburgh, where the operation was performed by appellee July 24, 1908. The plaintiff was suffering from tubercular peritonitis. To reach the diseased part, an incision into the abdomen was required, sufficient in length to admit of the hand of the operator being introduced for the manipulation of the parts therein inclosed and affected. In every such operation pads or sponges are introduced through the wound to take up the secretions, the flow of blood, foreign matter, if any, and to wall off the intestines from the field of operation. These pads or sponges are all supposed to be removed before the closing up of the incision. But in this case one of the sponges inserted, a piece of gauze about 12 inches in length, through record did not indicate that such method was followed in performing the operation on plaintiff, and there was no evidence that any precaution had been taken save by tying a knot in the second piece of gauze inserted. The court observed: "Had there been evidence of how track of the gauze was actually kept, doubtless, as bearing on the issue of negligence, testimony that this was in accord with custom would have been competent. In the absence of such evidence, the rule is otherwise."

To close an incision leaving a sponge in the body is malpractice. Harris v. Fall, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1174, 100 C. C. A. 497, 177 Fed. 79.

In an action against a surgeon for malpractice, in which it was claimed that a sponge or pad had been carelessly left in the body after the wound had been closed, from which injury had resulted, it was held not error in Akridge v. Noble, 114 Ga. 949, 41 S. E. 78, for the court to charge the jury that if they believed that the pad or sponge had been in fact left in the body, they should then determine whether it was so left by reason of the failure of the defendant to exercise due care and skill: and that he owed the plaintiff a duty to exercise reasonable care and skill, in performing the operation; including, in that expression, not only the opening of the body and the somebody's mistake or negligence, was not removed, but was allowed to remain in the abdomen after the wound had been sewed up. Though plaintiff remained in the hospital some two months under appellee's care after the operation, the mistake was not discovered until more than nine months following the operation, when a second operation was required for the removal of the sponge that had been overlooked. This action was brought by Mrs. Davis and her husband against the surgeon who performed the operation, charging him with negligence in failing to remove the sponge in the first instance. In view of the disposition we propose to make of the appeal, reference need be made to but a single feature of the case as disclosed by the evidence.

Mercy Hospital is a public hospital, supported in part by state appropriations, and is under the charge of an order known as Sisters of Charity. The defendant was neither a director, nor was he one of its staff, though he frequently performed operations there. When he or other surgeons operated in this hospital, the nurses required for assistance were assigned by the Mother Superior. It is a custom prevailing universally in hospitals of this character, when an operation such as this is to be performed, to commit to the nurses assigned the duty of preparing in advance, by sterilization and otherwise, an adequate supply of sponges, carefully counted, to be taken into the operating room. These nurses having in charge the sponges attend upon the operation. It is the business of one having custody of the sponges to hand them to the operating surgeon as required, while it is the duty of the other to receive them from the operating surgeon after each has served its purpose. The removed sponges speak for themselves as to number. When the operation has been concluded, comparison is made by the nurses of those removed with those shown to have been introduced. In this case the defendant, preparatory to closing up the wound he had made, inquired of the nurses whether their count tallied, and whether all the sponges had been removed, and it was only upon their replying affirmatively that he closed the wound. The evidence will support no other conclusion than that the defendant was misled by the mistaken count of the nurses. Two questions were left to the jury to pass upon: First, the credibility of the witnesses who testified that defendant, before closing the wound, had inquired of the nurses whether all the sponges had been removed; and, second, whether the general system or practice of permitting the handling and counting of sponges as we have above indicated was reasonable. The verdict of the jury was an affirmative finding as to each. The only assignments of error which we propose to consider are those which relate to the rulings of the court with respect to the second question.

removal of the affected parts, but also the use and handling of the sponges or pad. In this case there was a verdict for the defendant, the evidence showing that no pads or sponges had been left in the body.

The removal of all appliances used, such as gauze pads and sponges, is part of the operation which a surgeon contracts to perform (Akridge v. Noble, supra, and Gillette v. Tucker, 67 Ohio St. 106, 93 Am. St. Rep. 639, 65 N. E. 643, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 421), and it seems that an error in a nurse's count will not relieve a surgeon from liability for failure to remove such an appliance (Palmer v. Humiston, 87 Ohio St. 401, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 640, 101 N. E. 283).

But in Van Skike v. Potter, 53 Neb. 28, 73 N. W. 295, an action against two surgeons, one of whom, in performing an operation, broke a drill and left the point imbedded in the patient's kneecap, the defendants were held not liable. "The evidence of the defendants on the point under consideration," said the court, "was in substance that, after the operation of wiring the fractured kneecap was completed, the plaintiff was suffering greatly; that the temperature of his body was abnormally high and his pulse abnormally rapid, and that the knee was highly inflamed; that it was impossible to remove the drill point without breaking the bone; that the drill point, as well as all other instruments used in the operation, had been antisepticized, and it was the unanimous opinion of all surgeons and physicians who testified in behalf of the defendants that, under the circumstances, the leaving of the drill point in the bone was proper. We cannot say that the jury was wrong in agreeing with the defendants' theory." Upon the question whether defendants were negligent in not advising the plaintiff that the drill had been broken and the point left in the bone of his kneecap, the court said: "The jury have found, and the evidence sustains the finding, that the defendants, in keeping the plaintiff ignorant of the presence of the drill point in his kneecap, were in good faith exercising their best professional judgment, and when they did this they cannot be held, as a matter of law, to have been guilty of negligence, though it afterwards turned out that they were mistaken as to the effect that the drill point in the bone would have upon the plaintiff's knee."

It was held in Brown v. Bennett, 157 Mich. 654, 122 N. W. 305, that an attending physician who engaged a surgeon to perform an operation, and who assisted at the operation, but did not have principal charge of it, could not be held jointly liable with the surgeon for neglect to remove a sponge from the wound.

J. D. C.

The rule of practice as we have stated it required no submission. That the precautions it required in order to avoid the serious mistake of allowing a sponge to remain in the abdomen after the wound had been closed were not only reasonable, but wise, was not a subject of dispute. A verdict of a jury is not needed to give sanction to a rule or practice in surgery adopted and approved so universally by those skilled in the science of surgery. But, aside from this, however directly the negligence in this case may be traced to the nurses, the injury complained of could not be referred to the rule, but to the nurses' neglect in applying or observing the rule. Therefore, as thus understood, the reasonableness of the rule was not a question in the case. The court should have given the jury a very different understanding of what the reasonableness of the practice involved than that implied in his charge. He instructed the jury as follows (third assignment): "If you determine the custom was reasonable, or the practice, or whatever you choose to call it, custom or practice, among the surgeons was reasonable, and Dr. Kerr followed it, then that is the end of the case, and you should return a verdict for the defendant." There is here an unavoidable implication that involved in the rule, as an essential part of it, is exemption of the operating surgeon from liability in all cases where, as here, the nurses report that their count shows a removal of all the sponges, and the wound is thereupon closed up with a sponge remaining within; that the whole responsibility for the mistake is with the nurses, because of their mistaken count of the sponges. Indeed, the whole case for the defendant was conducted on this theory, as appears from the examination of the witnesses; and that the learned trial judge had no other appears, not only from the above extract from the charge, but from his answers to the several points submitted by the defendant.

The third point of defendant was as follows: "It being the undisputed evidence in the case that the counting of the sponges, both before and after an operation, was the duty of the nurses, and not of the operating surgeon, and it being further undisputed that the nurses reported to defendant, Dr. Kerr, that all the sponges had been accounted for, the verdict of the jury must be for the defendant." The answer was (seventh assignment): "That is affirmed if you find that the practice or custom to have the nurses' count the sponges is a reasonable and proper custom or practice." The instruction not only misconceives the purpose and object of the rule or practice, but treats it as a rule defining the whole duty of the surgeon, limiting his responsibility accordingly. Manifestly the only purpose in introducing the approved system or practice was to reduce as far as practicable the hazards to which the one operated upon is exposed, by affording additional security against such accidents as here occurred. It certainly did not contemplate that the security provided was to be the only security upon which the patient could rely for the avoidance of such mishaps, displacing entirely those which had before been recognized, among these the skill and observation of the operating surgeon, which had theretofore been employed and relied upon to see that all the sponges had been removed. It may well be that, because of the additional security provided, the burden theretofore resting upon the surgeon was reduced; that whereas before it was his duty to take accurate count of the sponges, this duty being devolved upon the attending nurses, the surgeon is enabled to give closer attention to the work immediately before him. We can well understand how better results can in this way be achieved. But before the counting of the sponges by the nurses, and before the wound is closed, is it reasonable to suppose that no duty rests on the surgeon to employ his skill or observation to assure himself that no foreign substance has been allowed to remain within? This defendant did not understand the rule or practice as relieving him from all responsibility in this regard; for he testified that he supposed he had removed all the sponges and pads, and that, "when those were all removed, then my next step was to confirm that supposition by the statement of the nurse whose duty it is to count the sponges, and to have her tally with the nurse who is handing the sponges to me, the clean sponges, or the ones that haven't been used." In making the observation which led him to conclude that he had removed all the sponges, he was strictly in the line of his duty, and acting in accordance with the rules of the improved practice, according to his own testimony. Granting the credibility of his testimony, the only question of fact remaining was: Did he, in making his observation, exercise reasonable skill, care, and prudence? The surgeons who testified in behalf of the defendant unite in saying that it is only in most exceptional cases, if any, that the surgeon is warranted in exploring the restored parts after the count of the sponges by the nurses. We can understand how this is a reasonable rule of practice; but it does not concern us here.

had reached the conclusion that he had removed all the sponges, a mistaken conclusion, but verified by the nurses' count. In reaching his conclusion, did he exercise ordinary skill? We see nothing in the evidence to warrant the inference that he did not; but, on the other hand, we find nothing to warrant the inference that he did, which is far more important, since the burden of showing care was upon him. Why was a foreign substance left in the parts which the operating surgeon should have removed? It was for him to acquit himself of negligence with respect to it. The sponge escaped his observation, why? Was it so hidden and concealed that reasonable care on his part would not have disclosed it, or were conditions such that, in his professional judgment, further exploration by him for sponges would have endangered the safety of the patient? In a word, did he do all that reasonable care and skill would require? Except as one or the other of these questions can be answered affirmatively from the evidence, the law will presume to the contrary, and attribute the unfortunate consequences to his contributing negligence. Neither does the defendant, nor a single witness in his behalf, undertake to give any explanation of the fact that here a sponge which the defendant should have removed was allowed to remain, except to say that the nurses failed to keep accurate count. For all that appears in the case the retained sponge might readily have been discovered by the surgeon, and reasonable prudence and care on his part would have avoided the accident. If this were so, clearly his negligence contributed with that of the nurses, and responsibility therefor in law attaches. The case must be tried again. We have sufficiently indicated wherein the error on the first trial consists, and such of the assignments of error as properly fall within what we have said are affirmed.

The judgment is reversed, with a venire facias de novo.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

S. W. POWELL, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HOUSTON & TEXAS CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

(104 Tex. 219, 135 S. W. 1153.)

Eminent domain — obstructing travel to business property — compensation.

1. Compensation must be made for diminution in value of business property by the raising of the grade of a railroad track across the street, which, by the complete obstruction of travel pending the work, which is unduly prolonged, and by causing permanent difficulty of access, diverts customers from the property, where the Constitution requires compensation to be made for property damaged for public use, although the obstruction is not within the block where the injured property is located.

Same — injury to public — special injury.

2. The right to compensation for diminution of value of property by diverting travel therefrom, because of the obstruction of a street not within the block, is not defeated by the fact that other property within the block is injured in the same way, since this injury is different from that suffered by the public at large.

Evidence — measure of damages — sufficiency.

3. Evidence that, before injury to property by right of eminent domain, it was worth a certain sum, and after the injury it was worth one third less, is sufficient to carry to the jury the question of the amount of damages to be awarded for the injury.

Damages — items of injury — loss of profits.

4. Upon the question of damages to be awarded for obstructing travel to a place of business by exercise of the right of eminent domain, evidence is sufficient to carry the case to the jury, which tends to Note. — Right of landowner to damages for obstruction of street or highway by railroad not adjacent to his property.

The earlier cases on this question have been collected in the note to Scrutchedfield v. Choctaw, O. & W. R. Co. 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 496.

As to right of property owner whose access from one direction is shut off or interfered with by closing or adjoining street, or portion of street, upon which he is situated, see notes in 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 269, and 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 637.

As there stated, where the landowner suffers a peculiar damage from the obstructed street, he may recover, although the obstruction is not adjacent to his property.

W. 434, the occupation of a street by the construction of a permanent improvement at a point 88 feet from premises fronting thereon, with the result that pedestrians travel on that side of the street was diverted in other directions, was held to constitute an interference with the natural property rights enjoyed by the owner, and therefore to entitle him to damages. A feature which distinguished the plaintiff's premises from other property farther down the street, as showing that the damage likely to follow to him was not the same in kind as suffered by the public generally, was the fact that no street intervened between the cul de sac and his lot.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Fifth Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the District Court for Navarro County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's property alleged to have been caused by the obstruction of a street by defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Treadwell & Tarver and Richmond Mays, for plaintiff in error:

Where, in changing a grade level across a public street, a railway company makes the crossing impassable, or puts it in such condition as unnecessarily to impair its usefulness, and then abandons the work for six months, leaving it blocked and impasswhile as to other property there was an intervening street.

In Ellis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 131 Mo. App. 395, 111 S. W. 839, where the obstruction was in an alley upon which plaintiff's premises abutted, and about 100 feet from the plaintiff's premises, and it completely cut off communication to his lot by way of the obstructed alley, and there were no intervening streets or alleys by which plaintiff might come into or go out of the alley, and thence to or from her property, plaintiff was held to suffer a different kind of damage from the general public, and to be entitled to damages for the obstruction.

The fact that there are streets on other sides of property does not prevent a recovery for such obstruction. Ibid.

So, in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Elliott, 129 Ky. 121, 110 S. W. 817, where a street was entirely obstructed several hundred feet from premises, the owner thereof was held to have a right to recover damages therefor.

In Idaho & W. N. R. Co. v. Nagle, 106 C. C. A. 578, 184 Fed. 598, where the railroad obstructed a street near plaintiff's premises, and there was evidence tending to show that it was so near the premises and of such character as to inconvenience and injure the plaintiff in an essentially different manner from the public at large, damages were allowed to the plaintiff.

Apparently, the obstruction in Gray v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 81 S. C. 370, 62 S. E. 442, was not adjacent to the plaintiff's property, but it prevented and destroyed the access to his property, which was situated on the street in which the obstruction was placed. This was held to be a direct injury peculiar to the plaintiff, and different in kind from that sustained by the public, it is guilty of negligence per se, and liable for any resultant damages.

St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Byas, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 657, 35 S. W. 22; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Smith, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 107 S. W. 641; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Butcher, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 81 S. W. 820; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Davis, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 547, 116 S. W. 427; Texas C. R. Co. v. Randall, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 249, 113 S. Plaintiff's damages were special and recoverable.

It is not a sufficient reason for disallow-public sufficient to sustain an action for damages therefor.

So, damages were allowed in Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. v. Wolf, 78 C. C. A. 589, 148 Fed. 961, where a public street was wholly obstructed by a railroad company a short distance from the lot of plaintiff, under a constitutional provision against the taking or damaging of property without just compensation.

But where the plaintiff suffers no damage peculiar to himself and different from that suffered by the public at large, he is not entitled to recover.

Thus, in Hyde v. Minnesota, D. & P. R. Co. 29 S. D. 220, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 48, 136 N. W. 92, the right of a landowner to damages under a constitutional provision prohibiting damaging property without compensation, for the closing of a street by a railroad company at a point not abutting on his property, was denied where such owner had free access to all his lots by public streets, there being an intervening street between plaintiff's premises and the obstruction.

So, in Crofford v. Atlanta, B. & A. R. Co. 158 Ala. 288, 48 So. 366, a viaduct over a street, which contained a sufficient archway for travel on the street to pass through, located at a distance of 50 to 250 feet from the complainant's premises abutting on said street, was held not to be a taking, destroying, or injuring of such property within a constitutional provision requiring compensation for taking, destroying, etc.

So, a landowner was held not entitled to recover damages for the construction of a trestle by a railroad company across a street on which his lot abutted, but not in front of his lot, in Murphy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 66 Wash. 663, 120 Pac. 525.

Plaintiff's damages, if any, were common,

In Ft. Collins Development R. Co. v. France, 41 Colo. 512, 92 Pac. 953, where the obstruction raised by the railroad company was from 80 to 110 feet from the house of the plaintiff, it was held that the mere fact that the plaintiff used the street obstructed more frequently than other people, and therefore would be more frequently inconvenienced by the obstruction across the street, did not entitle him to recover damages against the defendant for the obstruction of said street.

So, where the obstruction is so remote from plaintiff's property as not to affect its permanent or rental value, and the plaintiff is merely driven to a circuitous route or a longer road, no peculiar injury is shown such as to authorize the assessment of damages. Walls v. Smith, 167 Ala. 138, 140 Am. St. Rep. 24, 52 So. 320.

The position of the obstruction with reference to the plaintiff's property is not made clear from the opinion in O'Brien v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 148 App. Div. 733, 133 N. Y. Supp. 322, but the obstruction necessitated a longer route to the premises, and it is held that the substitution of a longer route, or one that made the plaintiff's premises less accessible, did not deprive him of any vested right, or cause any injury to the premises which must be compensated.

In Warner v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 86 Conn. 561, 86 Atl. 23, where a street was wholly obstructed at the side of plaintiff's property, and another crossing provided, so that the only damage to the plaintiff was to render access to his land more inconvenient than it formerly was, by reason of a more circuitous route being required to be taken, it was held that he was not entitled to compensation. The company was 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) authorized to make the change by the railroad commissioners, and the decision is based on the theory that the change is in effect made by the sovereign authority, and therefore no liability is incurred. "It is a part of the price paid for the social compact of organized society," says the court, "that the public has reserved to it certain dominant rights over all individual property. . . . Acts which would be actionable if done by an individual frequently are not when done by authority of the sovereign power."

As to whether or not the fact that one is prevented by an unlawful obstruction from using a highway causes him a special damage which will sustain an action by him against the wrongdoers, see note to Sholin v. Skamania Bomb Co. 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1053.

As to obstructions in highways preventing access to property except by circuitous route, as a special injury entitling owner to maintain an action for damages or to abate the nuisance, see note to Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co. v. Johnson, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 226, and supplementary note in 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 75.

Brown, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We copy this statement of the evidence from the opinion of the court of civil appeals:

"The evidence shows that appellee owned a lot of land on the south side of First avenue, about 200 feet east of where the railroad crossed First avenue; said crossing being just west of Seventh street. Appellant, in attempting to comply with the Texas railroad commission's order to so construct its track that the Trinity & Brazos Valley railway, which ran along Sixth street, just east of appellee's store, could cross under appellant's track at a point a short distance north of First avenue, raised its track across First avenue to a height that rendered said street at said point practically impossible for travel, and stopped work thereon for several months. During this time the city placed obstructions at said point which deterred any person from attempting to cross at said point. First avenue was a regular thoroughfare for persons entering the city from the north and northeast. The main business section of the city is on Beaton street, and First avenue intersects Beaton street about two blocks north, or where said business section begins. To reach the business section of said Beaton street, it is as near for parties coming into the city from the north and northeast to leave First avenue at Fifth or Seventh streets, go down to Second or Third avenues, and thence to Beaton street, as it is to travel First avenue to Beaton street, thence to the business section. Travel was diverted at Fifth avenue, thence down said avenue to Second avenue, thence diagonally across one block to Third avenue, thence to Beaton street. The appellant's right of way is immediately west of Seventh street.

"Appellee's store abutted on First avenue, which was obstructed by the appellant some 200 feet west from said store; but the street in front of said store, and ingress and egress to and from the store, were not interfered with, further than the free passage along said street at the point of obstruction. There was a street immediately west of the block in which appellee's premises were situated, and between the obstruction and said premises, and this and other streets running north and south, and east and west, all open to travel, which gave him and that section free access to all parts of the city, and the only interference, as before stated, to travel, was the obstruction on First avenue caused by appellant, and this obstruction did not increase the distance to the main part of town for the appellee or those living in that section, nor those living in the country to the north and northeast. The obstruction only caused an inconvenience in reaching that portion of First avenue lying west of the obstruction to those living east thereof, and they were only inconvenienced by having to travel the distance of around one block."

We add to the statement as made by the court of civil appeals, that the plaintiff below alleged in his petition that the work was prolonged an unreasonable time, beyond what was necessary to do it, during which time the crossing was impassable, which caused damage to his business. He testified to facts from which a jury might have concluded that his trade was greatly lessened, causing damage. Plaintiff testified that before the raising of the grade his property was worth $1,300, and since that crossing was raised it was worth one third less.

Article 1, § 17, of our state Constitution, as it is applicable to the facts of this case, may be read thus: "No person's property shall be . . . damaged [for] . . . public use without adequate compensation being made, unless by the consent of such person." Does the evidence show such damage to the plaintiff's property as comes within the protection of the above section of the Constitution? We condense and restate the facts which the evidence tends to establish. The railroad was constructed and operated across a street in the city of Corsicana about 200 feet from a lot abutting on that street which plaintiff owned and upon which he had a storehouse where he transacted his business as a merchant. Under a contract with the Brazos Valley Railroad, approved by the railroad commission, the defendant in error raised its grade at that point about 2 feet, and thereby obstructed the crossing for a time, and that it unnecessarily delayed for several months the completion of the work, by which the travel of persons over the said street from points beyond the railroad track was interrupted, which travel would have come to the store of the plaintiff in error for the purpose of trading with him. The alteration of the said grade by raising it 2 feet higher made it more difficult to cross, and impaired the plaintiff's right of access to and from his property by persons who would have traded with him, and who had been trading with him, whereby the value of his property was diminished in the amount alleged in the petition. The change in the grade is permanent, and whatever effect it had upon the property of the plaintiff is permanent in its nature.

The ownership of the lot abutting upon the street carried with it as property the right of free and unimpaired access thereto and egress therefrom, and whatever impaired that right and caused a depreciation of the value of the lot constituted damages to the lot within the meaning of the Constitution. O'Brien v. Central Iron & Steel Co. 158 Ind. 218, 57 L.R.A. 508, 92 Am. St. Rep. 305, 63 N. E. 302; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fuller, 63 Tex. 467.

It was not necessary that the obstruction should be in front of or near to the plaintiff's property, but the test of the right to recover in this action is: What effect did that crossing and the condition in which it was have upon the value of the plaintiff's property, and upon the exercise of his right of egress and ingress?

"The conclusions thus stated in the first edition have been verified by numerous decisions since rendered, and, we believe, without any material dissent, except in the case of Missouri, as shown below. If a street or public way communicating with the plaintiff's premises is obstructed elsewhere than in front of the plaintiff's property, as by a viaduct or bridge, or approach thereto, or by a railroad crossing a street in a cut or on an embankment, or otherwise, and the result of such obstruction is to render such property less valuable either to sell or to use, then the property is damaged, and compensation may be recovered to the extent of the depreciation." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 354, p. 646. The above extract from that excellent writer is supported by many authorities, of which we cite these: Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; Coker v. Atlanta, K. & N. R. Co. 123 Ga. 483, 51 S. E. 481; Highbarger v. Milford, 71 Kan. 331, 80 Pac. 633; Dantzer v. Indianapolis Union R. Co. 141 Ind. 604, 34 L.R.A. 769, 50 Am. St. Rep. 343, 39 N. E. 223; Cooper v. Dallas, 83 Tex. 242, 29 Am. St. Rep. 645, 18 S. W. 565; Gainesville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Hall, 78 Tex. 175, 9 L.R.A. 298, 22 Am. St. Rep. 42, 14 S. W. 259.

There can be no doubt, under these authorities and the facts of this case, that a jury might find that there was damage caused by the crossing to the property and to the trade of the plaintiff in error. But the court of civil appeals placed their decision upon the additional ground that the depreciation in the value of the lot, by reason of the condition of the said crossing, is such as was suffered by all others owning property in his vicinity. This proposition can best be answered by quoting from Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Golberg, 68 Tex. 688, 5 S. W. 826, as follows: "The fact that the injury was common to all other property holders on the street would not bar the plaintiff's right of recovery. The plaintiff sues for special damage to his own property by reason of defendant's having impaired the use of the street upon which it fronts. It does not affect his right to recovery that the owners of property fronting on the same street have been injured in the same manner. This is a loss peculiar to plaintiff's property, and not one he suffers in common with the community generally where the property is situated. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fuller, 63 Tex. 467."

The law is so clearly stated by Judge Gaines in the above extract that we are unable to add any force to the reasoning which supports the conclusion announced. The depreciation of the value of the lot which belonged to Powell does not affect others who might own property in the same neighborhood, neither does the depreciation in the value of the property of others affect Powell. Therefore the injury suffered by Powell is special and personal to himself, and does not come within the rule which is invoked by the court of civil appeals.

In addition to the statement of the court of civil appeals, the plaintiff testified that his property, before the change in the grade in the street, was worth $1,300, and after the grade had been so changed, and up to the time of the trial, it was worth one third less than that sum. This was sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the question of damage to the lot, and which was submitted by the court to the jury in a charge fair and just to the defendant. Plaintiff also testified as to the volume of trade which he did before the time the grade of the street was interfered with, and the volume of trade that he did during the time that the crossing was obstructed, also since it has been opened. He also testified to the average per cent of profit that he made on the goods sold. He stated that he had many customers from different directions from the opposite side of the railroad track who had previously come to his store over the street on which this obstruction now exists, and that during the time the obstruction existed many of those customers did not visit him as they did before. He also stated that he had customers on the opposite side of the railroad track to whom he delivered articles upon order, and that the condition of the crossing made his access to those customers much more difficult than it was previously. It would be quite difficult to prove with any degree of certainty the damages which might arise from the interference with trade under circumstances such as are shown in this case; but the evidence is such that a jury might with reasonable certainty ascertain the damage done. We therefore hold that the trial court did not err in submitting to the jury the issue of damage to the property and to the trade of plaintiff, and that the court of civil appeals erred in reversing and rendering the judgment in this case.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the court of civil appeals be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to the District Court for another trial.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 1.)

SAMUEL R. STERN et al., Appts.,
v.

CITY OF SPOKANE, Resp't.

(73 Wash. 118, 131 Pac. 476.)

Eminent domain — interference with access to property — structures in street.

1. Constitutional liability to make compensation for damaging property for public use does not extend to the loss of rental value of property abutting on a highway, because of the occupation of the street with towers and power houses necessary for the removal of a condemned bridge which carries the street across a river, and the construction of a new one, although access to the property is temporarily interfered with by such structures.

Appeal — conflicting verdicts — right to set aside.

2. An appellate court cannot set aside a verdict in one case because a jury has reached the opposite conclusion on the same facts in another case.

(April 18, 1913.)

Note. — Liability of a municipality for temporary interfering with access to property in making improvements.

The liability for interfering with access during the changing of the grade of a street, and while the property is being changed and adapted to the new grade, is not discussed herein.

Cases such as Brooks v. Boston, 19 Pick. 174, in which the abutting landowner seeks to base a liability upon the mere fact that the street is encumbered with materials, and thus rendered inconvenient for passing and repassing, without any reference being made as to whether or not access to the abutting property is interfered with, have in general been excluded.

In the absence of unskillfulness or unreasonable delay in doing the work, a municipality is not liable for mere temporary interference with access to abutting property.

Thus, a city may temporarily obstruct a public street so far as it may be necessary to enable the city or its agent to construct a public improvement, such as a tunnel, sewer, or water supply pipe, without becoming liable for damages to an abutting owner upon the street. Lefkovits v. Chicago, 238 Ill. 23, 87 N. E. 58.

In Tuggle v. Atlanta, 57 Ga. 114, the court holds that the public officials may temporarily exclude the public from a street during the process of a public improvement, and if they have not grossly abused their discretion in doing so, the municipality is not liable. The plaintiff in this case was the owner of a store on a street from which a bridge was removed, leaving the street

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to plaintiffs' property by the erection of a street improvement. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robertson & Miller and J. W. Hancox, for appellants:

Recovery should have been permitted under the Constitution, and because of the nuisance created and maintained.

Peterson, 69 Wash. 143, 124 Pac. 400.

impassable during the time the bridge so remained removed. It is not clear that access was interfered with further than in the direction in which the bridge was located.

Temporary obstructions erected in a street and a river during the construction of a tunnel under the river, which deprive an abutting owner of access to his premises, both on the side of the river and on that of the street, during the prosecution of the work, do not render the municipality liable therefor to the abutting owner, where the work is being done under authority from the state, and there is no claim of negligence, or that the work was prolonged a longer time than was necessary to complete it. Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 640, 25 L. ed. 337.

Such an obstruction made in the construction of an improvement which is authorized by the legislature cannot be a nuisance so as to give a right of action against the municipality for damage, where the municipality has acted within its authority and with care and skill. Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, supra.

So, in Vidalat v. New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 1121, 10 So. 175, there was held to be no right to damages because access to a market on a street was temporarily obstructed on account of the banquette adjacent to the market house being torn up during some two or three months while the street was undergoing repairs. "Such inconveniences," says the court, "as may fairly and legitimately result from the making the needed public improvements, must be submitted to by all citizens without compensation."

A municipality is not liable for closing a street, thereby interfering with access to the plaintiff's property, at a dangerous railroad crossing, while an overhead bridge is being erected. Crowell v. Monroe, 152 N. C. 399, 67 S. E. 989. In the course of the opinion, the court states that the record does not present the question of taking private property for public use, nor the question of the permanent closing of a public street in which an abutting owner has certain recognized rights; but that the fact discloses nothing more than a closing of a railway crossing in order that an overhead bridge immediately above the crossing may be erected for the use of the public, and evidently for public safety and convenience. "It may be that the plaintiff is inconvenienced and temporarily damaged," says the court, "but it is damnum absque injuria."

The court in Osgood v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 532, states that where there is no claim that the work is not done skillfully or diligently, the right to construct, being conferred by statute, might be exercised without responsibility for damage to property not invaded, but for the provision in the Constitution of 1870, which gives compensation "for property damages." The court then considers whether or not such damage comes within this constitutional provision, and concludes in the following language, which is approved on the affirmance of this decision in 154 Ill. 194, 41 N. E. 40: "But to construe that provision as giving compensation for all temporary obstructions necessary when streets are being repaired, etc., even though thereby access to abutting property is for a time wholly cut off, would be unreasonable," and it is accordingly held in the case that rent lost while the approaches to a viaduct were being constructed did not constitute such damage as required compensation to be made.

Neither is there any liability for an elevation of railroad tracks so as to interfere with the connection with a spur track belonging to the plaintiff. Chicago Flour Co. v. Chicago, 243 Ill. 268, 90 N. E. 674. In the course of the opinion, it is stated that "it is not claimed that there was any diminution of its value; the only invasion of their rights complained of is the temporary interference with the ordinary means of access to, and egress from, their property during the process of the work. It is well settled that inconvenience, expense, or loss of business occasioned to abutting owners by the temporary obstruction of a public street, and the consequent inter-

The misconduct of counsel and the juror created a bias and prejudice preventing a fair trial.

Messrs. H. M. Stephens and William E. Richardson, for respondent:

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs are the owners of a three-story brick building and an adjoining frame structure in the city of Spokane. The lower floor of these buildings is devoted to business uses, and the upper floors are used as a hotel and lodging house. The city of Spokane is built on either side of the Spokane river, and the city has for a long time maintained a steel bridge on Monroe street, it being the principal connecting street between the north and south sides. The old bridge being adjudged to be insecure, the city closed it for traffic on January 1, 1909, and immediately began the work of constructing a new concrete bridge, the main span of the new structure being, as we are informed, the longest arch of like construction in the world. In order to facilitate the work of dismantling the old and erecting the new bridge, the city erected two high towers in the street in front of plaintiffs' property. Over these towers, cables were run to and over like towers to the opposite side of the river. These cables were used as an aerial tramway, over which the old material was removed, and the false work and new material was carried. The city also erected a house in the street and installed an engine. This engine furnished power to run the tramway. The free use of plaintiffs' property was interrupted, and this action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been suffered in the way of lost rents, etc.

ference with their right of access to their property made necessary by the construction of a public improvement, is no cause of action against the municipality. The Constitution provides no remedy for the property owner under such circumstances; such a claim is not damage to property not taken within the meaning of the Constitution."

The doctrine of Osgood v. Chicago, supra, was approved in Sanitary Dist. v. McGuirl, 86 Ill. App. 392, an action against the sanitary district of Chicago, in which some of the elements of damage claimed by the plaintiff were incidental to the construction of a drainage canal, and of a mere temporary character.

The action of Chicago v. Rumsey, 87 Ill. 348, was one for damages arising in consequence of the construction of a tunnel under the Chicago river, and it is not clear that there was any claim made for temporary interference with access to the property, although it is stated that a claim was made for loss of rent because of the obstruction to the street adjacent to the property, by the act of constructing the tunnel herein. It was there held under the old constitutional provision against "taking" property, that no damages could be recovered of the city under such circumstances.

The temporary obstruction involved in Northern Transp. Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 640, 25 L. ed. 337, was held not to be a taking of public property within the meaning of the Constitution requiring compensation for a taking of property.

A temporary interruption of travel to and from land in front of which a water company, a quasi municipal corporation, is laying water pipes, does not entitle the owner to compensation in an action to assess damages for an alleged taking of the owner's lands. Bishop v. North Adams Fire Dist. 167 Mass. 364, 45 N. E. 925.

Where a city had removed the planks of a drawbridge which formed a part of a public highway, and obstructed the travel over the same for sixteen days, whereby the plaintiff, who was a dealer in lumber, wood, and coal at a wharf adjacent to the bridge, was injured in his business by reason of the fact that his customers were unable to come to his wharf, the plaintiff is not entitled to compensation, as these elements of damage are not special or peculiar to him, so as to furnish a good cause of action. The same was held with reference to rents on certain buildings owned by the plaintiff. Willard v. Cambridge, 3 Allen, 574.

If access to the premises is obstructed unnecessarily, or for an unreasonable time, by a market which is temporarily changed during the erection of a new building, the municipality is liable. St. John v. New York, 6 Duer, 315.

So, a loss of trade and expense in receiving and delivering goods, owing to the material excavated from a sewer being thrown in a street in front of one's place of business, and allowed to remain there an unreasonable length of time, is an injury of such a nature as to require compensation therefor by the municipality, under a statute making it the duty of a municipality to keep its highways safe and convenient, and making any town that shall neglect such duty "liable to all persons who may in any wise suffer injury to their persons or property by reason of any such neglect." Williams v. Tripp, 11 R. I. 447. A statute conferred upon the city power to construct sewers in the streets. This was held to suspend the duty to keep its streets safe Without indulging in unnecessary detail, it may be said that the plaintiffs base their right of recovery upon the allegations that the act of the city was a damaging within the meaning of § 16, art. 1, of the Constitution, and that they are entitled to have their damages assessed in money; that, if the right of the city be sustained, the work was negligently and carelessly done; that the plans were defective; and, finally, if it be held to be otherwise, an unreasonable time was consumed in finishing the work. The case was tried to a jury and a general verdict was returned in favor of the city.

The following interrogatories were submitted to and answered by the jury:

"No. 1. Was there unreasonable delay in the construction of the bridge, and, if so, what was the excess of time over and above a reasonable time? A. No.

"No. 2. Did the plaintiffs suffer any loss of rentals by reason of the wrongful construction or placing of any of the structures, machinery, or appliances used in a reasonable length of time, but no more, and if a longer time was taken, the city became liable for injuries.

This rule applies whether the city itself does the work or commits the doing of the work to contractors. Ibid.

What is an unreasonable length of time is largely a question of fact to be determined from all the circumstances of the case.

In Vidalat v. New Orleans, 43 La. Ann. 1121, 10 So. 175, where a sidewalk was torn up during some two or three months while the street was undergoing repairs, it is stated that this was much longer than seems necessary for the speedy and energetic accomplishment of the work, yet there is nothing in the evidence that would justify the belief that either the city or the paving company was grossly negligent of its obligation, or wilfully did an injury to the abutting owner, and therefore there is no liability.

In Williams v. Tripp, supra, where a municipality had let the contract for the construction of a sewer to contractors who commenced the work and allowed obstructions to remain in the street in front of the plaintiff's place of business for over seven months, a verdict was found for the plaintiff under instructions that there could be a recovery in case of an unreasonable delay in doing the work, and during the delay access to the plaintiff's store was cut off or obstructed. See statute involved in this case, supra.

See Ogden v. New York, infra.

In Tuggle v. Atlanta, 57 Ga. 114, where a bridge on a street on which the complaining landowner's premises were situated was torn down, and over four months intervened before a new structure was erected building the bridge, and, if so, what was the amount of such loss? A. No.

"No. 3. Did the plaintiffs suffer any loss of rental on account of any negligence in the use or operation of any of the machinery or appliances used in building the bridge, and, if so, how much? A. No."

The trial was a long one, and the testimony took a wide range. It was conflicting upon all the material issues, and in consequence we feel bound by the verdicts, general and special, and hold without further discussion that the work was not negligently done, and that the city did the work within a reasonable time. It follows then that there can be no damage unless it be under the Bill of Rights. Appellants state their position in broad terms. It is that an owner of land abutting a street is given a cause of action for an invasion of his property or right of occupation, or for any act that may injure the rental value of his property; and, if the occupation of a street interferes with the owner's use and enjoyment of property in greater degree than is thereon, the municipality was held not liable.

In order for the abutting owner to recover for negligence, negligence must be shown.

Thus, where structures were erected in a street, and at the base deposited stone, gravel, and sand, and the purposes for which they were placed there are not shown, so that the court can determine whether they remained an unreasonable time, it will be presumed that the time was reasonable, and no liability will be incurred by the city. Lefkowitz v. Chicago, 238 Ill. 23, 87 N. E. 58, affirming 142 Ill. App. 27.

Where the complaint does not show that the corporation is not prosecuting the work with reasonable diligence, it cannot be presumed, for the purpose of making out a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff, that the corporate officers will violate the law and perpetrate a wrong. Cummins v. Seymour, 79 Ind. 491, 41 Am. Rep. 618. The obstruction in this case arose from large quantities of earth which was thrown out on the highway, thus obstructing the way and destroying the same, but it is not clear that the action was based upon the theory that there was an interference with access.

Where the city is acting in its private capacity it is liable for damages suffered. Thus, where a city constructing docks in its private capacity temporarily destroyed a street by an excavation, so as to prevent access to the property for two years, it was held liable to the owner thereof for damages. Ogden v. New York, 141 App. Div. 578, 126 N. Y. Supp. 189. A large part of plaintiff's property fell into excavation, and this would have prevented her use of the property if she had had access to it. The recovery is based on both grounds.

suffered by the public generally, that he is entitled to compensation for such use or taking, irrespective of any negligence or omission arising in or growing out of the prosecution of the work. Appellants rely on the following cases: Smith v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 39 Wash. 355, 70 L.R.A. 1018, 109 Am. St. Rep. 889, 81 Pac. 840; Lund v. Idaho & W. N. R. Co. 50 Wash. 574, 126 Am. St. Rep. 916, 97 Pac. 665; Brown v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 35, 18 L.R.A. 161, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214; Farnandis v. Great Northern R. Co. 41 Wash. 486, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1086, 111 Am. St. Rep. 1027, 84 Pac. 18; State ex rel. Smith v. Superior Ct. 26 Wash. 278, 66 Pac. 385; Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 67; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820.

This court has held in common with the majority of the courts in this country, that the individual is bound by the intent and purpose of the original dedicator, and that an abutting owner cannot claim damages resulting from an original grade. Fletcher v. Seattle, 43 Wash. 627, 86 Pac. 1046, 88 Pac. 843; Ettor v. Tacoma, 57 Wash. 50, 106 Pac. 478, 107 Pac. 1061. And that "the dedication of streets and alleys to the public use implies an agreement of the dedicator and his successors in interest that the city may establish grades and improve streets and alleys thereto in aid of such use." Wood v. Tacoma, 66 Wash. 266, 119 Pac. 859.

The power to establish grades and improve streets imposes a duty on the administrative officers of a city to keep them in proper repair, to pave and repave, to take out worn material and to replace it with new, to build and repair bridges, to remove them, and to build others in their place. It is a duty imposed by statute, and, if omitted, subjects the city to resultant damages. It has never been held that a municipality was liable for damages consequent upon a performance of a duty. The intent of the dedicator to submit his property to the city for the establishment of grades and the building of streets and bridges being established, it follows by the same intent that the city may, as occasion requires, occupy the streets for the purpose of making or maintaining an open and passable highway in front of the abutting property. The cases cited by appellants are not in point. In all of them the act complained of was such that it permanently changed a physical condition, either destroyed the use of the street or added an additional servitude, as, for instance, in the case of Sweeney v. Seattle, 57 Wash. 678, 107 Pac. 843, which is relied on by appellants. Although not indicated in the opinion, the damage there sought to 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) be recovered arose out of a regrade of Pine street in the city of Seattle. In such cases damages are recoverable. In doing its work, the city left a permanent obstruction at the end of an alley which was essential to the use of the plaintiff's property. If the testimony had shown a temporary obstruction incident to the repair of the street, no recovery would have been allowed. The logic of that case is that all property suffering a direct damage on account of a regrade is entitled to compensation.

Appellants charge counsel with misconduct, and a juror with interest. The motion for a new trial was filed May 18th, and a supporting affidavit was filed May 31st. The affidavit is not made a part of the statement of facts. Although not properly before us (Spoar v. Spokane Turn Verein, 64 Wash. 208, 116 Pac. 627; Sakai v. Keeley, 66 Wash. 172, 119 Pac. 190), we have examined the affidavit, and find that it does not warrant a new trial.

Counsel asks why verdicts in personal injury cases growing out of the work complained of have been returned and sustained upon the theory that the city negligently constructed an arch which fell, causing an unforeseen and unexpected delay. We cannot answer. The fact that one jury will decide a question of fact one way, and another will decide it in a contrary way, does not raise a question of law, nor is the verdict in one case reviewable, or to be considered as evidence, in another.

APPEAL by the United States from a judgment of the Court of Claims awarding damages for an alleged taking of property in the course of such an improvement. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Holmes Conrad and Waitman H. Conaway for Mary E. Hughes.

Messrs. John Q. Thompson, Assistant Attorney General, and J. Harwood Graves for the United States.

Mr. Chief Justice White delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was commenced to recover from the United States the sum of $200,560, subsequently reduced by an amended petition to $165,000, and $12,000 per annum until the principal sum was paid, on the ground that the United States had, as the result of work done by it in relation to the Mississippi river, taken, in the constitutional sense, two certain plantations belonging to the claimant, one the Wigwam plantation, situated on the east bank of the Mississippi, and the other a plantation known as the Timberlake plantation, also lying on the east bank, but higher up the river; that is, in Bolivar county, Mississippi, and opposite Arkansas City on the west bank. As to the first, the Wigwam plantation, there was judgment below in favor of the United States, rejecting the claim, and No. 718 is an appeal by the claimant from that judgment. As to the Timberlake plantation, there was a judgment against the United States for what was deemed to be the value of the plantation, and No. 719 is an appeal by the United States from that judgment. The court made a series of general findings stating what was considered to be the facts concerning the situation upon which the right to recover in a general sense as to both plantations was based. It then made particular findings as to the Wigwam plantation and like findings as to the Timberlake plantation. Although the general findings are in some respects amenable to the criticism that they draw erroneous conclusions of law concerning the legislation of Congress, with regard to the improvement of the Mississippi river, and the action of the officers under such legislation, as was done in the Jackson Case, 230 U. S. 1, 57 L. ed. 1363, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1011, and also treat such mistaken conclusions as findings of fact, such errors are not as apparent as they were in the Jackson Case. This results from the fact that the general expressions in the findings manifesting the error which we pointed out in the Jackson Case are, as a rule, in this case qualified by statements incompatible with the general expressions, and which therefore serve to correct the error which otherwise would exist. Thus, in finding 1, after referring to the St. Francis and other basins on the west bank and the outflow of water into these basins, ultimately reaching the Gulf of Mexico, as described in the findings in the Jackson Case, and the stoppage of such outflow and consequent increase of the volume of water in the river, which, in the Jackson Case, was virtually attributed exclusively to work done by the United States or under its control, the finding in this case accurately states the relation of the United States and the local authorities to the work as follows:

"The outlets and drains thus provided by nature were such as to accommodate said flood waters, and the lands of claimant were not overflowed as frequently before the outlets were closed by levee construction by the United States to improve the river navigation, and by the state and local authorities to protect and reclaim land subject to overflow in times of high water, and consequently were but little injured by said overflows."

So, again, in No. 2, although the finding refers to the adoption of the Eads plan alright to embank against water turned out of stream, see note to Wills v. Babb, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 136. As to liability of municipality for confining flood water within banks of stream to injury of riparian owner, see note to Walters v. Marshalltown, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 199.

most in the same all-embracing words used in the Jackson Case, it yet states in explicit terms that the acts of Congress but authorized an improvement of navigation, and empowered expenditures for that purpose, and in referring to levee construction done pursuant to such Congressional action, it is declared in the finding that the United States "for the improvement of the Mississippi river for navigation . . . and the local authorities or organizations of the states bordering along the river on both sides, from Cairo to the Gulf, have before and since 1883, constructed and are now constructing and maintaining certain lines of levees at various places and of various lengths for the purpose of protecting and reclaiming lands within their respective districts from overflow in times of high water." Again, in the concluding part of the fourth finding, a statement in accord with that made in the Jackson Case is found concerning the co-operation of the United States and local authorities in levee building, which is qualified, however, by subsequent statements, which, with reasonable accuracy, displays the real situation, that is, the unifying of the energies of the United States and the local authorities to a common end, levee construction, although the purpose on the one hand was the improvement of navigation, and on the other, the protection of land from overflow. And this also is further illustrated by finding 3, which points out the scope and character of the authority delegated by Congress to build levees; that is, the improvement of the navigation of the river.

The special findings relating to the Wigwam plantation but established that that plantation was situated in one of the minor basins below Vicksburg, like those between Natchez and Baton Rouge, which were described in the Jackson Case. Indeed, the court, in express terms, found there was identity between that case and this, and placed its conclusion against the right to recover upon its ruling in the Jackson Case; and in so doing, in view of our affirmation of the judgment in the Jackson Case, it follows that, in our opinion, no error was committed.

As to the Timberlake plantation, special findings were made, and omitting those which relate to the title of the claimant and to the loss suffered by the overflow of the property in the years following the special action by the government, which it was considered gave rise to the right to relief, the findings are as follows:

"IX.

"Timberlake Plantation.

"Prior to the construction of the Huntington Short Line levee by the United 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

States, the waters of the Mississippi river did not overflow and submerge the Timberlake plantation hereinafter described at such frequent intervals and for such duration as to disturb the claimant in the profitable use, enjoyment, and possession thereof, or so as to materially affect its cultivation, productive capacity, or market value. It was then suitable for the purpose of raising thereon, and there was profitably raised thereon, crops of cotton, cotton seed, corn, hay, and other products. Since the completion of said Huntington Short Line levee by the United States, placing the plantation of claimant between the old and new levee, in the restricted and narrower high-water channel of the river, the rises in the water of said river, by reason of the water being thus confined and restricted in its flow, have been, and are now, occurring at such frequent intervals and for such duration as to prevent the claimant from raising any kind of a crop thereon; the buildings have become untenable and uninhabitable; the fencing washed away; the land covered with superinduced additions of water, earth, sand and gravel to a depth of from 3 to 12 feet; said land has since grown up in willows, cottonwood, underbrush, and weeds, so as to render it valueless to her; to destroy its market value; and to compel its abandonment.

"Prior to 1898 said lands (Timberlake plantation) were comparatively high and secure from overflow by the flood waters of the Mississippi river, except at long intervals, and the occurrence of such overflows did not materially affect their productive capacity or market value. Said lands were highly improved, well stocked with tenants and laborers, yielded large crops of cotton, cotton seed, corn, hay, and other products, were located adjacent to what was formerly the town of Huntington, located between the Huntington Short Line levee and the river, since washed away by the flood waters of the Mississippi river, and deserted as a place of residence by the inhabitants some years after the building of the Huntington Short Line levee,—1898-1900,—was very valuable as plantation property, and was worth the sum of ninety thousand dollars ($90,000).

"The claimant, Mary E. Hughes, obtained $12,000 from the Board of Mississippi Levee Commissioners, by judgment, for damages to the drainage of the Timberlake plantation into Black Bayou when it was thrown out by the construction of the Huntington Short Line levee in 1899-1900. This plantation is located in the vicinity of and opposite the Arkansas City gauge, and was protected from overflow up until the time of the construction of the Huntington Short Line levee.

"XI.

"Prior to the year 1898, said Timberlake plantation was protected from overflow by the flood waters of the Mississippi river by a continuous levee line located in front of said lands, along, by, and close to the river bank for its entire frontage, built by state and local authorities, and said plantations still remained valuable for plantation purposes, and up to that time had not been seriously injured in its use and enjoyment by the flood waters of said river.

"About the year 1898, the United States surveyed and thereafter began to construct what was known as and now called the Huntington Short Line levee, a new levee, about 15 feet high, located some distance back from the old levee, behind the land of claimant, thus placing and permanently locating said Timberlake plantation between the Huntington Short Line levee and the old levee in the narrower high-water channel and bed of the river, placing an additional burden and servitude thereon, and subjecting said property to more frequent and destructive overflows and the force and scouring power of the high-water current of said river. After the completion of the Huntington Short Line levee a high water came in the river during the year 1903, and because of a break in said old levee, the water of said river began to flow onto and over the plantation of claimant, then located between the old levee and the Huntington Short Line levee, and remained standing on and over said land to a great depth after the high waters receded, and because of the great pressure of the water thus confined, standing against said Huntington Short Line levee, threatening its destruction by breaking through, the United States then caused the old levee to be blown up by dynamite in many places, so as to relieve the pressure of the water standing against the Huntington Short Line levee, and to save it, thus causing the water to rush over and across said land, injuring it for agricultural as well as all other purposes, greatly reducing its value.

"Upon the foregoing facts the court finds as an ultimate fact, so far as it is a question of fact, that the effect of placing and permanently locating the Timberlake plantation of claimant between the Huntington Short Line levee and the old levee, and the river bank, was and is an act on the part of the United States intending to place, and which finally resulted in placing, the lands of claimant in the narrower high-water channel of the Mississippi river, subjecting it to more frequent and destructive overflows, and the forceful and destructive action of the current, placing an additional burden and servitude thereon, which has finally resulted, since the years 1907, 1908, and 1910, in such serious and continuous interruption to the common and necessary use and enjoyment of said property, as to amount to a taking thereof by the United States under the 5th Amendment to the Constitution."

It will be observed that finding 9, although special to the Timberlake plantation, contains statements concerning the general raising of the flood level in the river as the result of the levee work done by the United States and the state and local authorities, followed by a description of the injury by overflow to the Timberlake plantation, which would give rise to the inference that the judgment which was rendered against the United States as to that plantation was based upon a consideration of that subject. If that view were taken, the case would be controlled by our decision just rendered in the Jackson Case; but we cannot adopt that view of the court's action, as the court in the Jackson Case decided that like facts did not justify recovery against the United States, and reiterated in this case its conclusion in that respect by rejecting the claim as to the Wigwam plantation. Under this view we assume that finding 9 was a mere inadvertence, or, at all events, if not so, may be now put out of view. This leaves only for consideration the special facts concerning the Timberlake plantation.

The plantation bordered on the river, and was protected by a levee. Whether that levee was built by the private efforts of the owner of the land or by state or local authority does not appear. The officers of the United States, deeming it advisable, in aid of the improvement of navigation, to construct a new levee, did not locate it along the river, in front of the plantation, but joining the existing line of levee, somewhere above the projecting point on which Timberlake plantation was situated, built a direct line of levees which passed across the point several miles back of the Timberlake plantation, and joined the line of levees on the river bank below the plantation. This levee, known as the Huntington Short Line, is thus described in the report of the Mississippi River Commission for 1898, at page 3390:

"Huntington Short Line.—This is a new levee under construction from Mound Landing to a point about 1½ miles below Offutt's Landing. The new levee here is 4.4 miles in length, and will shorten the levee line 7 miles over its present length."

The findings exclude the conception that this new and more direct levee was built upon land belonging to the owner of the Timberlake plantation. They show that the location and construction of this new line of levee was approved by the local levee authorities, since they establish that those authorities paid to the owner of the Timberlake plantation a sum of money for the incidental damage occasioned to that plantation by the fact that the levee, in passing in the rear of the plantation, obstructed drains or means of drainage by which the surface water of the plantation was carried off to the rear. The report of the Mississippi River Commission for 1900, page 4849, shows that before this payment was made by the local authorities there was a suit brought by owners of the plantation, and that that suit culminated in a recognition by the local courts of the right to build the levee on payment of the sum stated, which was but a part of a much larger claim made, which was disallowed. The facts just stated serve to demonstrate the error which was committed in deciding that the exertion of national power to build levees for improving navigation had effaced the exercise of state power to construct levees for protection from overflow, since they manifest the harmonious co-operation of the two powers, the United States bearing the burden of building a great levee in the interest of navigation, and the local authorities, in view of the protection from overflow which necessarily resulted from the construction of the levee for navigation purposes, contributing the amount essential to pay an award of a local character.

Upon all these facts we are unable to perceive any ground for distinguishing the claim as to the Timberlake from that as to the Wigwam plantation or from the claims which were held to be without merit in the Jackson Case. We say this because the claims in the Jackson Case as well as the claim in this case, made as to the Wigwam plantation, in their last analysis but involve the assertion of a right of recovery against the United States for failing to build a levee in front of the plantations in question for the purpose of affording them protection from the increased stage of high-water which it was asserted had been created by the act of the United States in building levees elsewhere along the river. This being so, as it is not pretended that the building of the new line of levee here considered trespassed upon the property rights of the owners of the Timberlake plantation by an actual taking of land, the asserted claim but comes to this: That the owner of the Timberlake plantation, abutting on the river, is entitled to hold the

United States responsible, because in improving the navigation of the river the officers of the United States, in selecting the place where the levee should be built, did not select the front of the plantation, that is, did not construct the levee along the river bank of the plantation. Thus accurately fixing the contention, it is patent that we cannot affirm the judgment of the court below against the United States as to the Timberlake plantation without reversing its judgment in favor of the United States as to the Wigwam plantation, and without disregarding the decision which we have just announced in the Jackson Case. In saying this we are not unmindful of expressions in the findings, and which indeed the court below declared in express terms were the basis of its legal conclusion in respect to the liability of the United States, to the effect that the building of the new levee operated to change the situation of the claimant's property by putting it in the bed of the river. But the substance of things may not be changed by mere figures of speech. The plantation was situated on the bank of the river. It was protected from overflow by the levee on that bank. Whether that levee was private or public, as we have said, does not appear, but nothing in the fact that a new levee was built far in the rear of the plantation changed the physical situation, or had the magical effect of transporting the property from one place to another. Where it was before the location of the new levee, it remained after the new levee was completed. True it is that if, from caving banks or other natural causes, it became impossible to protect the property by means of a levee along its front, that fact was in no way caused by the building of the new levee, and if high water and disastrous overflow subsequently came from the inherent weakness of the existing levee along the front on the river bank, the consequent loss may not be attributed to the fact that a new and stronger levee was constructed along shorter and safer lines. There is no pretense of any intention to injure the claimant by the building of the new levee; and on the contrary, light is reflexly thrown upon the conditions which led to the exercise of judgment on the part of the officers of the United States in building the new levee on the much shorter and more direct line by the report of the commission for 1899, at page 3555, where the caving condition of the bank of the river in and about the place where the plantation was situated is stated.

As to the statement in one of the findings concerning the act of an officer of the United States after the old levee had given way, in using dynamite to enlarge the opening, we find it difficult to understand the finding. Of course it can be easily appreciated that when a break occurred in the old levee along the bank, that impelled by the great force of the current of the river and the volume of its water, there rushed through the opening or crevasse with great momentum, a body of water which might, before its force was spent, strike the new levee, although it was far in the rear, and endanger its safety,—a danger which is aptly portrayed as to a relatively similar situation elsewhere in the report of the chief of engineers for 1903 at p. 260. But the finding does not seem to refer to such a danger nor to assume that the dynamite was used to guard against it, that is, to expand the opening in the old levee to such a degree that, although increasing the quantity of the flow of water, it would diminish its momentum, and thus prevent the danger of striking against the new levee and sweeping it away. We say this since, taking the finding literally, it gives rise to the conviction that the old levee was dynamited after the river had subsided, for the purpose of allowing the water to flow off, which had accumulated in the basin created by the remaining line of old levee along the river front and the line of the new levee. We do not stop, however, to further consider the subject, since whatever view be taken of the finding, the fact as to the use of dynamite would not in law amount to a taking by the United States, because in any event the mere act, to meet an emergency, of the officer, conceding, under the circumstances stated, that it was a wrongful act, cannot be held to be the act of the United States, and therefore affords no ground in any event for holding that the United States had taken the property for public use.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment below in favor of the United States in No. 718 must be affirmed, and the judgment against the United States in No. 719 must be and it is reversed.

And it is so ordered.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.
(Department No. 1.)

AUGUST PAULSEN et al., Appts.,
v.

ELIGIO FEROGGIO, Resp't.

(— Wash. —, 131 Pac. 1163.)

Master and servant — safe working place — excavation on hillside.

1. A master who sets an employee at work excavating a foundation for a building on a hillside at a time when other servants are making excavations further up the hill is bound to take precautions to protect the former from material which may be loosened by the latter employees in such a manner as to roll down on him.

Same — assumption of risk — sufficiency of barriers.

2. An employee engaged in making an excavation on a hillside, who knows that the employer has erected a barrier to prevent material loosened by persons working further up the hill from rolling down upon him, does not assume the risk of the insufficiency of the barriers.

Same — negligence of foreman — fellow servant.

3. The negligence of a foreman supervising different gangs of men engaged in excavating on a hillside in constructing an insufficient barrier to protect the man lower down from material loosened by those further up is that of the master, and not of a fellow servant of the workmen.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendants were alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Myron A. Folsom, John H. Wourms, and John H. Pelletier, for appellants:

Where the danger is alike open to both master and servant, they stand upon an equal footing, and the servant assumes the risks.

Note. — Duty of master to protect servant from material rolling down hillside.

This note is confined to places where the declivity is natural, or where the danger is not created by the work itself; and cases involving the duty of the master in respect to protecting the servant from the caving in of banks, cliffs, trenches, etc., which are at the time being excavated, have been excluded.

The servant has no right to assume that the master has furnished a safe place to work, where the dangers are apparent.

of the working place during progress of work, see notes to Citrone v. O'Rourke Engineering Constr. Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 340, and Smith v. North Jellico Coal Co. 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1267.

Upon the applicability of the rule as to safe place where servants are engaged in the work of removing dangerous conditions, see note to Neagle v. Syracuse B. & N. Y. R. Co. 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 321.

The cases very generally hold that the rule as to the master's duty to furnish a safe place of work to the servant applies with full vigor to a case where the servant whose place of work is at the foot of a hill is injured by materials rolling down the hill.

Thus, in McKenzie v. North Coast Colliery Co. 55 Wash. 495, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1244, 104 Pac. 801, it was held that a mine owner owes the duty to his servants who are working on a slope in the mine to inspect the batteries or dams which are erected to prevent loosening materials from rolling down upon them, to see that they are reasonably safe; and the fact that a battery or dam was erected by the miners themselves does not relieve the master from liability to one of them who is injured by its insufficiency, where he had no part in the construction.

The decision in PAULSEN v. FEROGGIO is fully supported by the decision in Campbell v. Jones, 60 Wash. 265, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 110 Pac. 1083, which is fully set out in the principal case.

The greater number of cases where injury occurs because of materials rolling down a hill have to do with railroads constructed along a hillside or through a deep cut; and the cases are very consistent in holding that under such circumstances the master owes the servant a special duty to guard against the danger of rocks, logs, etc., rolling down the hillside, and causing an obstruction to the railroad tracks.

Thus, in Clune v. Ristine, 36 C. C. A. 450, 94 Fed. 745, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 416, it was held that when a railroad track is constructed in such a manner that rocks overhang it, or loose rocks are imbedded in the slopes of cuts through which it runs in such a position that they may be displaced by the action of the elements and be precipitated upon the track, it is the duty of the railroad company either to remove them, or to take other adequate precautions to guard against danger, and to render the track reasonably safe.

So, where, for several days before the accident, it appeared that fires had been burning on the mountain side immediately above the track for several miles along a railroad in the immediate vicinity of the accident, that stones, sticks, and logs were rolling down upon the track by reason of said fires, and that this condition of affairs was known to the railroad company, and that there were no track walkers upon that section of the track until midnight, negligence upon the part of the railroad is shown sufficiently to take the case to the jury. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Wilson, 12 Colo. 20, 20 Pac. 340.

And in Bean v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 107 N. C. 731, 12 S. E. 600, where a railroad had been constructed along the side of a mountain, it was held that the company was negligent in leaving a mass of stone just above and near the track in such a position that it might slide down upon the tracks, and the fact that the company employed a track walker whose duty it was to examine and see, just after a train had passed the dangerous point, whether rock had fallen or was about to fall, did not excuse the company; assuming that the track walker was a fellow servant of the injured trainman, and that his negligence contributed to the injury, the trainman might, nevertheless, recover on account of the negligence of the company.

A snowslide being usually mingled with gravel and rock is a dangerous obstruction to a railroad, distinct in nature from a snowdrift, and a section foreman having knowledge of such an obstruction to the track must give notice thereof to the managers of the road and to the conductor of an approaching train if he has an opportunity, and his failure so to do is the failure of the railroad company. Fisher v.

der v. Viola Min. & Smelting Co. 3 Idaho, 28, 26 Pac. 127.

As to who are fellow servants in the state of Washington, and the master's liability for their acts, the following cases are cited:

Wilson v. Northern P. R. Co. 31 Wash. 67, 71 Pac. 713; Frengen v. Stone & W. Engineering Corp. 66 Wash. 204, 119 Pac. 193; Ponelli v. Seattle Steel Co. 64 Wash. 269, 116 Pac. 864; Hale v. Plaintiff could not recover on the theory that he was not warned, under the evidence in this case.

Jones v. Moran Bros. 45 Wash. 391, 88 Pac. 620; Anson v. Northern P. R. Co. 45 Wash. 92, 87 Pac. 1058; Bailey v. Mukilteo Lumber Co. 44 Wash. 581, 87 Pac. 819; Woelffen v. Lewiston-Clarkston Co. 49 Wash. 405, 95 Pac. 493; Laidley v. Wm. Musser Lumber & Mfg. Co. 45 Wash. 239, 88 Pac. 124; Bundy v. Union Iron Works, 46 Wash. 231, 89 Pac. 545; Stewart v. Bal-

Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. 22 Or. 533, 16 L.R.A. 519, 30 Pac. 425.

So, in Pantzar v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. 99 N. Y. 368, 2 N. E. 24, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 832, where a cliff which overhung the place of work of a servant engaged in building a wall in a mine fell upon him, the mining company was held liable because the superintendent had been told of the danger, and knew that a large crack had appeared in the cliff, and that it was growing larger, and yet took no steps to prevent it from falling.

So, where injuries were caused by a rock rolling down a hillside onto a track, it is not error to instruct the jury that if the defendant in any way knew of the dangerous condition, or might have known of it by the use of reasonable care and diligence, the failure to remove the rock was negligence. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71.

In Union P. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 161 U. S. 451, 40 L. ed. 766, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 618, it was held that the risks assumed by an engineer on a line of road running at the foot of a mountain range do not include unnecessary risks and dangers arising from the failure of the company so to construct and maintain its track and roadbed as to prevent sand from being deposited on the track, causing a derailment.

In El Paso & N. E. R. Co. v. Whatley, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 85 S. W. 306, a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for death of an engineer, due to a derailment caused by the negligence of the railroad company in permitting a rock to remain on the track, was sustained, but it does not appear how the rock came to be on the track.

In situations like those here discussed the railroad company owes its servants a peculiar duty of inspection.

Thus, in True v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 22 App. Div. 588, 48 N. Y. Supp. 86, it was held that in a suit for the death of an engineer, caused by the engine running into a landslide, a nonsuit was erroneous where the evidence showed that the cliff alongside of the track was composed of shale, and likely to slide off, and had slid off from 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

time to time in small quantities, and the company had made no inspection thereof except such as could be made by observation while passing along the track.

So, in Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Warring, 37 Colo. 122, 86 Pac. 305, it was held that the duty of a railroad company as to inspection was not limited to its roadbed, but it would be liable for failure to protect the track from boulders rolling down an adjoining mountain side and displacing the rails of the track, where it knew or ought to have known of the danger. The court said: "The rock in the case at bar came from a point on the slope of the mountain outside of the right of way of the company. It was plainly visible from the track, however; and the character of it was, or should have been, known to the company. We do not think the obligation of the company ends with an inspection of its right of way. Objects beyond its right of way may be quite as menacing and dangerous as those within; and the company is not relieved of its obligation by showing that the rock came from a place on the mountain beyond its right of way. A week or so before, another rock came down in the night and injured materially the company's track, and from a place not far distant from the rock in question. Not long before, but in the same canyon, a large quantity of dirt and small rocks had come down, completely covering the track. Witnesses and employees of the company testified that in the spring these disturbances were more likely to occur; yet the company, it was shown, did not have the track patrolled at night. There was no inspection of the track at this place after about 5 o'clock in the afternoon before the accident. We are of opinion that the question of negligence should have been submitted to the jury."

And in Fisher v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 104 Va. 635, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 954, 52 S. E. 373, it was held that a railroad company which constructs its road along the base of a high bluff must exercise ordinary care to protect its employees from landslides, and such railroad is negligent where, hav-

Messrs. Robertson & Miller and Thomas J. Corkery, for respondent:

The master must furnish a safe place. The servant does not assume the risk of the master's negligence in that regard.

The appellant, after setting in motion a dangerous agency through its own negligence, cannot be heard to complain of the confusion and fright of plaintiff.

Sandquist v. Independent Teleph. Co. 38 Wash. 313, 80 Pac. 539.

Mount, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for personal injuries. Plaintiff recovered a judgment in the court below for $2,200 on the verdict of a jury. The defendants have appealed from that judgment.

The facts are, in substance, as follows:

ing built its track along the base of a high bluff which is not solid, but seamed with a crack across its face, through which loose dirt has exuded, and which appears and is believed to be in an unsafe condition, it fails to make any special inspection or use any means to determine whether or not it is in fact safe.

And the cases also hold that a servant whose duty it is to watch the tracks and to guard against the danger of collisions between trains and materials which have fallen upon the track is not a fellow servant of the other employees of the road, but is a vice principal of the master, for whose negligence the latter is responsible.

Thus, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Pointer, 113 Ky. 952, 69 S. W. 1108, a recovery for the death of a fireman, caused by his engine running into a quantity of dirt and rock which had slipped onto the track in a cut, was sustained upon the ground that the section foreman by whose negligence the rock and dirt were permitted to remain upon the track was, in keeping the track safe, a representative of the railroad.

So, in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie, 81 Va. 71, the court said: "On the other hand, let it once be settled that the humblest watchman who walks the track is, within the scope of his employment, the representative of the company, that he has eyes to see, ears to hear, and lips to communicate to his superiors the knowledge he acquires as to the condition of the track or of impending danger, and the law upon this important subject will be placed upon such a footing as that none can misapprehend and all reasonable men must approve it."

Upon the question whether the duty to warn is delegable or nondelegable, see note to Anderson v. Pittsburgh Coal Co. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 624.

In a few cases recovery has been denied 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

where injuries of the character under discussion occurred, but in these cases, it will be observed, there were other factors which entered into the result.

In Scott v. Astoria & C. River R. Co. 43 Or. 28, 62 L.R.A. 543, 99 Am. St. Rep. 716, 72 Pac. 594, where an engineer was injured by reason of a landslide which derailed the engine, a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed because the trial court permitted the jury to pass upon the question of the railroad company's negligence in locating its tracks where it did,—this being a purely engineering question which could not be submitted to the jury.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Murphy, 143 Ky. 31, 135 S. W. 422, where an engineer was injured because his engine ran into a landslide, no recovery was allowed because the slide took place when the train was so close at hand that no watchman stationed there could have prevented the accident, and furthermore the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in increasing rather than reducing the speed of his train at a place where he knew slides were likely to occur.

A railroad engineer who obeys, although reluctantly, an order to take his train through a mountainous region on its regular trip at a time of heavy rains, when landlides are anticipated, assumes the risk of such slides, and cannot hold the company responsible in case his train is carried from the track by a slide which comes upon it so suddenly that there is no time to escape, and the danger of which was not observed by a track inspector who had passed the spot just before the train reached there, since it must be regarded as pure accident. Kinzel v. Atlanta, K. & N. R. Co. 69 L.R.A. 757, 70 C. C. A. 73, 137 Fed. 489, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 685. W. M. G.

The defendants, with others, on November 20, 1910, were the owners of the Hercules mine, located at Burke, Idaho. They were engaged in constructing a building for a mill near there at Wallace, Idaho. This mill was being constructed upon the side of a mountain which was very steep, rising at an angle of about 45 degrees. At that time they were engaged in making a cut for the foundation of the mill. The plaintiff was employed as a workman in this cut. His duties were to hold a drill while another workman used a large hammer with both hands to strike the drill. In order to hold the drill, it was necessary for the plaintiff to watch the drill closely. On the date named the defendants had made two angular cuts in the side of the mountain. The perpendicular wall of the lower cut was about 16 feet in height. Immediately above this, and to the east was another triangular cut, the perpendicular wall of which was about 4 feet in height. The plaintiff was working in this upper triangular cut, holding a drill while another man was hammering on the drill. He was sitting or resting upon his knees with both hands upon the drill. Each time the drill was struck, it was necessary to raise it slightly and turn it. The drill was operated in solid rock. The mountain side above where plaintiff was working had been cleared of brush, and when he was standing he could look above the perpendicular wall under which he was working, and have a good view of the side of the mountain. About 100 feet up the mountain side from where the plaintiff was working, a crew of men in the employ of the defendants were making a cut for a water flume. These men, under the direction of Mr. Franz, the foreman in charge, had piled brush below the cut for the water flume in order that the rocks therefrom might not roll down the mountain side. While the plaintiff was holding the drill, as above stated, a rock started to roll down the side of the mountain. One of the men above saw the rock, and called a warning to the men below. The foreman in charge at that time was within about 8 feet of the plaintiff. He saw the rock coming, and called a warning to the plaintiff and the man who used the hammer. The foreman and the man who was doing the hammering ran. The plaintiff at the time the warning was given was either sitting or resting upon his knees, holding the drill. He started to run, but got in the way of the rock, which struck him and injured him. The plaintiff knew that the men were working above him on the hill. He also knew that brush had been piled along the cut for the flume. But, while he was sitting at his work, he could not see above the perpendicular cut under which he was working. He knew that the side of the hill was very steep; that when a rock or anything above was loosened, it would roll down. There was no evidence to show just where the rock started or what caused it to start down the mountain side. Plaintiff knew the vicinity and all the surroundings.

Upon the trial of the case, several interrogatories were propounded to the jury by the court at the request of the defendants, two of which questions were answered as follows: "Was the injury to the plaintiff caused by the negligence of any person or persons? Answer: Yes. If you answer the first interrogatory in the affirmative, state the name of the person or persons whose negligence caused the injury. Answer: Mr. Franz." Mr. Franz was the foreman in charge of all the men at work on the mountain side. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendants moved the court for a nonsuit, and at the close of all the evidence moved the court for a directed verdict. These motions were denied.

The appellants make no question upon the introduction of evidence or the instructions of the court. The assignments of error are to the effect that the court erred in overruling the motion for a nonsuit and the motion for a directed verdict, and that the special verdicts are inconsistent with the general verdict. The theory of the plaintiff's case is that the defendants placed plaintiff at work in a dangerous place and stationed men above him on the hillside, which made the place more dangerous than it otherwise would have been, and negligently failed to make the place safe or to keep it safe. The appellants contend upon this appeal that the plaintiff, knowing the conditions which surrounded him, assumed the risk of rocks rolling down upon him, and that the doctrine of "safe place" does not apply to this case. They also contend that the negligence, if there was any, which caused the rock to roll down the mountain side, was the negligence of a fellow servant of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff therefore cannot recover. There is no evidence in the case which shows how the rock was started in its descent. One of the men working above saw the rock after it had started. He shouted a warning to the men below. Mr. Franz, the foreman, was standing near the plaintiff, and also shouted a warning to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, in obedience to the warning sought shelter, not knowing the course of the rock. If he had remained at his post, he would not have been injured.

We think the rule of "safe place" applies to this case. The plaintiff while at his work was unable to see the workmen above him, or to see rocks which might start from the hillside. The foreman in charge of the work had attempted to make the place safe by placing brush below the cut for the flume where workmen were engaged in throwing rocks and material upon the brush. This brush was for the purpose of preventing such material from rolling down the hill. In other words, the foreman, who represented the master, realized the necessity of protecting the men below, and therefore had directed the men above to place this barrier for that purpose, and for the purpose of holding the material upon the ground. If we may assume for the purpose of this case that the plaintiff working below was a fellow servant with the workmen above, it was the duty of the defendants, through their foreman in charge of the work, to furnish the plaintiff with a reasonably safe place so that he might be protected from acts which he could not see and which he could not prevent. Where the plaintiff knew that the defendant had constructed a barrier, he certainly had the right to assume that the defendant had furnished an effective barrier. It is no doubt true that this court has held in many cases that a servant assumes the ordinary risks incident to the work in which he is engaged. And it is also true, as we have many times held, that the servant has no right to assume that the master has furnished a safe place where the dangers are known or are as apparent to the servant as to the master. But we think neither of these rules applies to this case. Plaintiff knew that a barrier had been erected by the defendants or their foreman. Although he knew there was danger where no barrier was constructed, he had a right to assume that the master had erected a sufficient barrier, and to rely upon the master performing the duty which had been undertaken and which the master owed to him.

In McLeod v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 65 Wash. 62, 117 Pac. 749, we said: The servant "assumes the risk of such dangers only as are necessarily incident to the work. The difference is not in the rule, but in the greater number of dangers incident to the work. The real question in any case is as to what constitutes reasonably careful conduct on the part of the master looking to reasonable safety for the men. . . . If the place was made unnecessarily dangerous through the negligent act of the master or its vice principal, the master is liable for injury resulting therefrom." In Campbell v. Jones, 60 Wash. 265, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 110 Pac. 1083, where the servant was placed to work on a hillside and was injured by a stump which was loosened from its place by the foreman in charge, we said: "But we think the court erred in sustaining the challenge to the evidence made on behalf of the defendants Jones & Onserud. They were the appellant's employers, and owed to him the duty of furnishing him with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and the duty of keeping the place reasonably safe as long as they required him to work therein. This duty was nondelegable, and when they intrusted it to another, they became responsible for the negligent performance of the duty by that other. . . . The duty of the respondents to oversee the appellant's place of work was a continuing duty, obligatory upon them at all times; that while the work itself may have been servant's work, the duty to see that its performance did not result in injury to the servants working elsewhere was the master's duty. This duty, as we say, could not be delegated, and, if the injury to appellant was caused by its negligent performance, the master is liable. This principle was announced by this court in the case of Creamer v. Moran Bros. Co. 41 Wash. 636, 84 Pac. 592." In Howland v. Standard Mill. & Logging Co. 50 Wash. 34, 96 Pac. 686, we said: "Nor do we think the act which rendered the place unsafe was the act of a fellow servant of the respondent. It is the fundamental duty of the master to make and keep safe the place in which he requires his servants to work, and this duty cannot be delegated so as to relieve the master from liability for a negligent performance of the duty. . . . But it is not the rule that a servant who goes into a dangerous situation assumes the risk of all dangers surrounding the place. He assumes those dangers only which are inherent in and which exist from the nature of business,—those dangers against which there is no absolute protection, not those caused by some negligent act of the master, and which would not exist but for such negligent act."

In this case the master had undertaken to protect the plaintiff and those working with him in the excavation for the foundation by erecting a barrier above to prevent the earth and rock from rolling down upon the plaintiff and those associated with him. It was not the duty of the plaintiff to inspect this barrier to see that it was safe, but he had a right to rely upon the master in that respect. And, when he went to work at his place at the drill, he did not assume dangers which were not incident to the work in which he was engaged. He no doubt assumed whatever risk there was in connection with his fellow workmen striking the drill and things of that character. But he might rest assured that the master had protected him against the workmen above, as the master had attempted to do. The master's neglect in this respect was not one of the risks which the plaintiff assumed. We are satisfied for these reasons that there was no question of the assumption of risk by a fellow servant, and that the evidence was sufficient to go to the jury upon the question of "safe place." The laws of Idaho, where this action arose, are substantially the same as our own upon this question. Maloney v. Winston Bros. Co. 18 Idaho, 740, — L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 111 Pac. 1080; Craesafulli v. Winston Bros. Co. 18 Idaho, 158, 108 Pac. 740; Knauf v. Dover Lumber Co. 20 Idaho, 773, 120 Pac. 157.

By the special verdicts hereinbefore quoted, the jury found that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of Mr. Franz. As we have seen, Mr. Franz was the foreman of the men employed in the work where plaintiff was working, and also foreman of the men employed in the work above upon the mountain side. His negligence as such foreman in not constructing a sufficient barrier was, of course, the negligence of the defendants, and the special verdicts are consistent with the general verdict.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant damages in the sum of $1,032 for injury to his hotel business by noise, smoke, and vibration, which he claims resulted from the operation of the defendant's cars and engines upon a temporary trestle in the street in front of the hotel building occupied by him in Seattle. A trial before the court and a jury resulted in verdict and judgment against the defendant in the sum of $250, from which it has appealed.

Respondent is the proprietor of a hotel business located in the building at the southwest corner of Lenora street and Westlake avenue in the city of Seattle. Appellant is a contracting company, and from November 1, 1910, to June 1, 1911, was engaged in the execution of two large street improvement contracts for that city. One of these, referred to as the Denny Hill improvement, called for the excavation and removal of a very large quantity of earth; while the other, referred to as the Westlake avenue improvement, called for a very large quantity of earth filling. It was evidently desirable on the part of the city, as well as the appellant, that the earth taken from the Denny Hill improvement should be placed in the Westlake avenue improvement. To this end, the city granted to appellant the privilege of constructing in certain streets leading from the Denny Hill improvement to the Westlake avenue improvement a small railway, upon which to run dump cars and a small locomotive engine for the purpose of transferring the earth from the Denny Hill improvement to the Westlake avenue improvement. The city not only granted this privilege, but directed what streets should be used, and also directed the manner of constructing the track. The route thus selected by the city passed along Lenora street in front of respondent's hotel. At this point it was necessary, and the city so directed, that the track be elevated so as to permit street cars and other traffic to proceed uninterrupted on that avenue. The track was so constructed, which brought it at no point nearer than 38 feet to respondent's hotel building, and from 10 to 18 feet above the surface of the street along in front of the building. Upon the track thus constructed, appellant operated its cars and engines during the period mentioned from November 1, 1910, to June 1, 1911, when the work was finished. There is no allegation or proof whatever of negligence on the part of the city or appellant in the prosecution of this work, nor as to unreasonableness of the time occupied in its prosecution. We assume for argument's sake that during this period respondent suffered some appreciable inconvenience and damage to his business by noise, smoke, and vibration occasioned by the operation of appellant's cars and engines, though, as we have noticed, it was undisputed that such annoyance and damage was not the result of negligent operation of the cars and engines.

It is contended by counsel for appellant that its challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain any judgment against it made by request for an instructed verdict in its favor and for motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict should have been sustained by the trial court, and that it is now entitled to a reversal of the judgment and a dismissal of the action upon that ground. We are constrained to agree with this contention. Upon the holding of this court in Lund v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 31 Wash. 286, 290, 61 L.R.A. 506, 96 Am. St. Rep. 906, 71 Pac. 1032, it seems plain the fact that appellant was doing public improvement work for the city, which, though appellant was an independent contractor, was under the direction and control of the city, places appellant in the same position that the city would be in had it been prosecuting the work itself, so far as liability for damages to respondent flowing therefrom is concerned; that is, if the city was not liable for consequential damages, upon the same principle appellant would not be. It seems to us that our recent decisions in Stern v. Spokane, — Wash. —, 131 Pac. 476, and Hieber v. Spokane, — Wash. —, 131 Pac. 478, are decisive of this case in appellant's favor upon the question of the damages claimed being consequential. This is the theory upon which counsel for appellant insists that it is not liable. We are constrained to so hold. It being plain that the city was engaged in a perfectly lawful undertaking, and to that end was temporarily causing its streets to be used by appellant, neither was liable to respondent for damages other than those which were the result of negligence.

It is apparent to the most casual observer that property and business locations in our centers of population are desirable, and derive well-known advantages from being so situated. The density of population which renders such locations valuable also renders the more necessary public improvements of the nature here involved, to the end that such advantages may be more fully enjoyed. The making of such public improvements necessarily results in more or less temporary inconvenience and even damage to property and business in their neighborhood while being constructed. Aside from acts of negligence on the part of the public authorities in constructing such improvements, owners of property and business so temporarily inconvenienced or even damaged must bear such burdens as an incident to the enjoyment of the advantages which their locations give them.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the Superior Court to dismiss the action.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No 2.)

J. M. JORGUSON, Appt.,
v.
APEX GOLD MINES, Respt.
(— Wash. —, 133 Pac. 465.)

Corporation — contract to pay dividends — enforcement.

1. A contract by a corporation to pay a certain amount in dividends on stock within a specified time cannot be enforced if the dividends have not been earned; at least, where the statute forbids the payment of capital to stockholders.

Same — contract to return subscription.

2. A contract by a corporation to return to a subscriber within a certain time the amount paid for his stock, which he is permitted to keep, is, in the absence of earnings sufficient to justify dividends of that amount, in contravention of a constitutional provision that corporations shall not issue stock except to bona fide subscribers therefor, nor issue any obligations for the payment of money except for money or property received or labor done.

(July 8, 1913.)

Note. — Validity of guaranty of dividends.

It is not intended to discuss the right of preferred stockholders to a preference upon the dissolution of the corporation, either as to the payment of dividends that may have accumulated or as to payment of capital stock. As to the latter question, see note to Field v. Lamson & G. Mfg. Co. 27 L.R.A. 136, as to preferred guaranteed and interest-bearing stock, and notes to Lloyd v. Pennsylvania Electric Vehicle Co. 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 228, and Rider v. John G. Delker & Sons Co. 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1007, as to the right of preferred stock to preference as to capital.

As stated in JORGUSON v. APEX GOLD MINES, dividends can only be paid out of profits or surplus earnings. It follows that APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in defendant's favor in an action brought to compel performance of a contract to pay dividends on the stock of a corporation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Milo A. Root for appellant.

Messrs. Frank A. Steele and Harrison Bostwick, for respondent:

No recovery under the facts can be had upon the contract in suit.

Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 76, 18 Am. Rep. 156; Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Allegheny County, 63 Pa. 126; Painesville & H. R. Co. v. King, 17 Ohio St. 535; 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 698.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 22, 1909, appellant purchased from the respondent 2,000 shares of its capital stock for the sum of $1,000. As a part of said transaction it was agreed that the corporation should guarantee that the dividends upon such stock would amount to $1,000 within the next eighteen months, and that the corporation would pay to the plaintiff the sum of $1,000 as dividends within that time. Pursuant to this agreement the respondent, acting under a resolution unanimously adopted by its stockholders, executed and delivered to appellant a bond, the condition of which was that if, within the period of eighteen months, the corporation a contract which attempts to bind the corporation to pay certain dividends in any event, while it may not always be regarded as void, cannot be enforced in the absence of such profits or earnings.

In National Salt Co. v. Ingraham, 58 C. C. A. 326, 122 Fed. 40, certificates of indebtedness given to the stockholders of a corporation which in effect guaranteed to them certain dividends whether or not the earnings were sufficient to pay dividends were held void and unenforceable.

The case of Smith v. Alabama Fruit Growing & Winery Asso. 123 Ala. 538, 26 So. 232, holding void a guaranty of dividends, is sufficiently set out in JOHNSON v. APEX GOLD MINES.

Corporations frequently issue preferred stock and guarantee a dividend on it. Where such stock partakes of the nature of a debt, and is not solely of the character of stock, such a guaranty is valid.

Thus, under the provisions of a special act authorizing a corporation to issue preferred stock to a certain amount, giving its guaranty that each share of said stock shall receive semiannual dividends of a certain amount, it was held in Williams v. Parker, 136 Mass. 204, that the legislature, not having expressed any intention to limit the payment of the dividends, the stockholder was absolutely entitled to receive them, and having received them, the same could not be recovered by a receiver of the corporation.

So, under a statute authorizing the issuance of preferred stock with the assent of at least three fourths of the stockholders in interest in such corporation, and making it lawful for the corporation to guarantee the holders of such stock certain dividends, and providing that the holders of such stock shall not have the right to vote, nor be liable for the debt of the corporation, the corporation may issue preferred stock and guarantee the payment of a certain dividend thereon, since the intention of the statute was to make such holders of preferred stock creditors, and not stockholders, in the true sense of that term. Burt v. Rattle, 31 Ohio St. 116.

debtor and creditor, dividends cannot be made absolutely payable, even under a positive guaranty. Kidd v. Puritana Cereal Food Co. 145 Mo. App. 502, 122 S. W. 784. See infra, discussion as to construction of such guaranty to prevent holding contract void.

The holder of preferred stock, payment of the dividends on which is guaranteed, cannot maintain an action at law against the corporation for failure to declare and pay the dividend as provided. Williston v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. 13 Allen, 400.

In certain cases what is in terms an absolute guaranty of dividends is construed to be only one for the payment of dividends in case profits are made so that a fund is created out of which such dividends can lawfully be paid. In certain of these cases the decision is based in whole or in part on the theory that an absolute guaranty of the dividends is void; and to prevent holding the contract void, the contract will be held a conditional one, as above stated.

Thus, the guaranty on a certain class of stock known as prepaid stock, in Bingham v. Marion Trust Co. 27 Ind. App. 247, 61 N. E. 29, was absolute that a certain dividend would be paid, and provided that the dividend mentioned was in full of the stockholders' proposition of the profits arising from the business; but the court construed the guaranty as not an absolute liability that such dividend would be paid, but that, as a matter of law, such dividend would be paid if there were at the time of maturity funds available and applicable to the payment of the same. In this case the corporation had paid certain dividends after it had become insolvent, and upon the settlement of the affairs of the corporation by a receiver, the funds so paid were allowed as an offset against the claim of the stockholders receiving them upon a distribution of the property of the corporation.

So, in Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 76, 18 Am. Rep. 156, where the guaranty was in terms absolute of a certain semi-annual dividend, the court held that if the contract be construed to mean that the dividend was payable in all events it would be void; and to prevent this result any should pay to appellant, his heirs, personal representatives, or assigns, the sum of $1,000 in cash as dividends on the stock so purchased, then the obligation should be void; otherwise it should remain in full force and effect, and the appellant should, in addition to holding his shares of stock as fully paid up, be entitled to receive from the corporation the sum of $1,000, less any amount which he should have received in dividends on the stock during the time. The eighteen months having expired and the corporation having failed to pay to the appellant any sum in dividends upon his stock, and having otherwise failed to comply with the obligations of its bond, appellant brought this action upon the bond, in which he sought to recover from the corporation the sum of $1,000. Upon a hearing it was found by the court that, since the execution of the bond, the net earnings of the corporation had not been sufficient to declare any dividends upon its capital stock, and that no dividend had been so declared. The court thereupon dismissed the action, and the case is brought here on appeal.

Upon these facts we think the judgment must be sustained. The bond sued upon obligated the company to pay $1,000 in dividends within eighteen months, or, if such sum be not paid as dividends, the same should be paid in any event.

The courts have uniformly held that dividends can be declared and paid only out of other reasonable construction of which the words were capable would be given it, and as they would bear the construction that the preferred stockholders should be entitled to the semiannual dividends when there were profits to pay them, this construction would be given.

So, in Kidd v. Puritana Cereal Food Co. 145 Mo. App. 502, 122 S. W. 784, the holder of preferred stock under a certificate binding the corporation to pay a certain semiannual dividend thereon was held to sustain the relation of stockholder toward the corporation, and not a creditor, and therefore, her right to dividends depended upon whether the receipts of the company justified the directors in paying them. It seems to have been admitted in this case that if the preferred stockholder sustained the relation of a stockholder to the corporation, her right to dividends depended upon whether the earnings were sufficient to pay them; but it was claimed by her that she sustained the relation of creditor, and therefore the dividends were payable in any event.

A similar construction was put upon such a guaranty in Feld v. Roanoke Invest. Co. 123 Mo. 603, 27 S. W. 635, and in an obiter statement in Miller v. Ratterman, 47 Ohio St. 141, 24 N. E. 496.

While holding such a guaranty valid in some cases, the decision is limited to the payment of such dividends as do not impair the capital stock.

Thus, an agreement contained in the original by-laws of a law library association, guarantying to the stockholders a certain dividend, and providing that the board of directors shall fix the annual dues of members at such an amount as may be necessary to pay the dividends and other necessary expenses, is not invalid except in so far as it provides for the payment of dividends before the payment of necessary expenses, or prevents the keeping of the capital intact. Cratty v. Peoria Law Library Asso. 219 Ill. 516, 76 N. E. 707.

An agreement on the part of a railroad company to pay a certain per cent semiannually upon stock issued by it under express power from the legislature to issue such stock was held valid in Gordon v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. 78 Va. 501. The real controversy in this case, however, was over the further provision in the stock certificates granting the holders of such preferred stock participation in dividends on the common stock in addition to the preferred dividends, and not as to the right to the guaranteed dividends.

Cases in which a guaranty of dividend by a corporation is construed by the courts to be a pledge of a fund legally applicable for the purposes of a dividend, without reference to the power of a corporation to make a pledge absolute in all cases, such as Taft v. Hartford, P. & F. R. Co. 8 R. I. 310, 5 Am. Rep. 575, have in general been excluded.

In Windmuller v. Standard Distilling & Distributing Co. 106 App. Div. 246, 94 N. Y. Supp. 52, an agreement executed by one corporation at the time of a purchase by it of the stock of another corporation which it had the power to purchase, binding it to pay a certain dividend on the stock of the corporation which it purchased, was construed to be only a method of paying a part of the purchase price of the stock, and not as an agreement to pay dividends whether any profits were actually earned or not. This decision was affirmed in 186 N. Y. 572, 79 N. E. 1119.

That dividends can only be paid out of net earnings or profits even where the stock is issued under an agreement or guaranty that a dividend of a fixed sum shall be paid on it annually is the opinion of the court in McGregor v. Home Ins. Co. 33 N. J. Eq. 181.

Corporations frequently provide for the payment of interest on paid-in capital stock, especially for the period previous to the operation of the corporation. Where it results in impairing the capital stock, such a contract is void.

Thus, a railroad corporation has no power to provide in a subscription contract for the payment of interest upon all sums assessed and paid in, from the day of such payment until the proposed railroad is completed and put in operation, since this enables stockholders to draw a dividend the profits or surplus earnings of the corporation. "The rule of law that requires corporations to preserve their capital intact is alone sufficient to prevent the corporation from paying dividends except out of profits." Thomp. Corp. § 5305.

It being established in this case that there were no profits out of which this dividend could be declared, it follows that, if the bond be enforced against the corporation, payment must be made out of its capital, which the law will not permit, upon the ground that any contract whereby a corporation seeks to diminish its capital stock, except in some way permissible by statute, contravenes public policy and is unenforceable. Section 3697, Rem. & Bal. Code, contains provisions that it shall not be lawful to declare dividends except from the net profits arising from the business of the corporation; nor in any way pay to stockholders any part of the capital stock or reduce the same except in the manner thereafter provided. Under this section it has been held that a corporation could not reduce its capital stock by paying any portion of it to the stockholders. Tait v. Pigott, 32 Wash. 344, 73 Pac. 364; Tacoma Ledger Co. v. Western Home Bldg. Asso. 37 Wash. 467, 79 Pac. 992; Tait v. Pigott, 38 Wash. 59, 80 Pac. 172. Counsel for appellant contends this section has no application, and that the only question to be determined is whether or not the contract is ultra vires. We think, however, it is clear that, since there are no profits nor surplus out of which this dividend can be paid, payment must be made, if at all, from the capital of the corporation, which is a direct violation of the statute. In Lockhart v. Van Alstyne, 31 Mich. 70, 18 Am. Rep. 156, a corporation guaranteed a semiannual dividend of 5 per cent upon its preferred stock, and it was held that, when it appeared there were no profits from which the dividends could be made, the guaranty became in the name of interest, although the corporation may not be in a position to pay the same. Troy & B. R. Co. v. Tibbits, 18 Barb. 297.

A contract made by a railroad company, binding itself to pay interest upon subscriptions to stock until the road is completed, cannot be enforced against the corporation while it is largely indebted for work done and materials furnished for the construction of the road, and there are no funds for the payment of the same except the capital stock of the corporation. Painesville & H. R. Co. v. King, 17 Ohio St. 534.

And a contract by a corporation organized for the maintenance of a college for instruction in dental surgery, binding it to pay interest on its capital stock, is a nullity where the corporation has no means for the payment of interest except its capital stock. Ohio College of Dental Surgery v. Rosenthal, 45 Ohio St. 183, 12 N. E. 665.

In the absence of an express statute authorizing it, a railroad company has no power to enter into an agreement with a county under which it agrees to pay interest on the stock subscribed for by the county equal to and at the same time and place as interest falling due on the bonds issued by the county in payment of its subscription, where there are no earnings from which such interest can be paid. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. v. Alleghany County, 63 Pa. 126.

On the contrary, a railroad corporation which is constructing a road was held to have power to contract to pay interest on the stock subscribed until a completion of the road in M'Laughlin v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 8 Mich. 100. "The stipulation in the certificate for the payment of interest," says the court, "constituted a contract between the company and the plaintiff as an individual; it created the relation of debtor and creditor to the extent of the semiannual 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

interest." It does not appear, however, that the power of the company to issue stock with such a stipulation for interest was very strongly contested. The action in this case was to recover the interest, and a recovery was allowed.

In Ohio v. Cleveland & T. R. Co. 6 Ohio St. 490, under an express statute authorizing the payment of interest, a railroad company which by resolution directed the interest to be paid was held bound to pay it. Neither does it appear that the power of a corporation thus to contract was questioned in this case.

In Rutland & B. R. Co. v. Thrall, 35 Vt. 536, an agreement in the subscription contract of a railroad company to pay interest on all sums assessed and paid from the time of payment until the railroad should be put in operation was held to be a valid agreement, and not to invalidate the subscription contract so that no recovery could be had thereon, but this holding was based upon the construction of the contract that no time was fixed for the payment of interest, and therefore it could be paid out of the earnings of the company when those materialized.

So, in Richardson v. Vermont & M. R. Co. 44 Vt. 613, an agreement to pay interest on all sums paid by the stockholders up to the time that the road shall be completed and put in operation was held to be payable whenever the surplus earnings should enable the corporation properly to do so.

An agreement to pay interest is not invalid, so that it can be taken advantage of by a stockholder in a suit against him upon his subscription. Evansville, I. & C. Straight Line R. Co. v. Evansville, 15 Ind. 395; Racine County Bank v. Ayres, 12 Wis. 513. But the contrary was held in Troy & B. R. Co. v. Tibbits, supra, which was an action on a subscription. W. A. E.

wholly inoperative for want of something to which it was applicable, and was void as opposed to public policy; and that the extent to which the law would permit a corporation to go in guarantying dividends would be to guarantee the payment when there were profits to pay them; or, if profits were not realized to the necessary amount in any one year, the stockholder would be entitled when they were realized to have all arrears paid up. In Pittsburg & C. R. Co. v. Allegheny County, 63 Pa. 126, the railroad company guaranteed the payment of interest on county bonds given to it as a subsidy, and it was held that the payment of such interest out of the capital before earnings were made was within the prohibition of the charter against paying dividends out of the capital. Similar rulings have been made in Bingham v. Marion Trust Co. 27 Ind. App. 247, 61 N. E. 29; Painesville & H. R. Co. v. King, 17 Ohio St. 534; Ohio College of Dental Surgery v. Rosenthal, 45 Ohio St. 183, 12 N. E. 665; Troy & B. R. Co. v. Tibbits, 18 Barb. 297; Memphis Grain Elevator Co. v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 85 Tenn. 703, 4 Am. St. Rep. 798, 5 S. W. 52.

We have found one case where the facts are so similar that it would be useless to attempt to distinguish them: Smith v. Alabama Fruit Growing & Winery Asso. 123 Ala. 538, 26 So. 232. The corporation there sold to the plaintiff $1,500 worth of its capital stock, and executed its bond with sureties that it would return the $1,500 in four semiannual dividends. These dividends were not paid, and action was brought upon the bond. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint upon the grounds: (1) That the contract was illegal and void in that it undertook to indemnify plaintiffs against loss for a purchase of stock, making issue thereof fictitious and without consideration; (2) that the contract was in violation of the Constitution prohibiting corporations to issue stock or any bond for the payment of money except for money, labor done, or property actually received, and declaring void all fictitious increase of stock; (3) that it appeared from the complaint that the contract sued upon was illegal, without consideration, and void. This demurrer was sustained and on appeal the court, in affirming the judgment, said: "It requires little, if indeed anything, beyond this statement of the case, to demonstrate the correctness of the city court's ruling. The contract sued on is, of course, executory, and its enforcement is sought in this action in furtherance and completion and consummation of a fictitious subscription to the capital stock of a corporation,—a transaction prohibited by the organic law of the land and frequently denounced as vicious and incapable of conferring or passing any rights. The jurisdiction of our courts cannot be invoked to enforcement and execution of such undertakings. In substance the contract is for the payment back by the corporation to the subscriber for its stock of the money he subscribes, thus leaving the issuance of the shares to him wholly unsupported by any consideration, fictitious, and void; and the action upon the contract is an invocation of the powers of the courts to the accomplishment of this end expressly forbidden by the Constitution of the state. If this could be done, an easy road would be opened to the utter emasculation of this most just and necessary provision of the Constitution by evasions so palpable as to be little, if at all, short of avowed and direct attempts to defy and override it."

We have a like provision in our Constitution, found in article 12, § 6: "Corporations shall not issue stock, except to bona fide subscribers therefor, or their assignees; nor shall any corporation issue any bond or other obligation for the payment of money, except for money or property received or labor done. The stock of corporations shall not be increased, except in pursuance of a general law, nor shall any law authorize the increase of stock without the consent of the person or persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock, nor without due notice of the proposed increase having been previously given in such a manner as may be prescribed by law. All fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void."

The bond in suit provides that, in case the full sum of $1,000 be not paid as dividends within eighteen months, the purchaser of the stock shall, in addition to holding his stock as fully paid, be entitled to receive from the corporation $1,000 in cash, less any amount received in dividends. This would mean, as said in the Alabama Case, the payment back to the stockholder of the money he paid for his stock, while permitting him to retain his stock as fully paid, thus leaving the issuance of the stock wholly unsupported by any consideration,—a direct conflict with the constitutional provision. See also Thomp. Corp. § 5354; Cook, Corp. § 544.

The judgment is affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

JOE ROMANO et al., Appts.,
v.
BIRMINGHAM RAILWAY, LIGHT, & POWER COMPANY.

(— Ala. —, 62 So. 877.)

Injunction — to restrain nuisance — protection of vacant property.

1. That lots in a residence section of a municipal corporation are vacant does not deprive their owner of a right to an injunction to restrain the pollution of the air passing over them by illuminating gas escaping from a reservoir on neighboring property.

Evidence — injunction — judicial knowledge.

2. The court cannot refuse an injunction against the maintenance of a gas holder in a residence section of a municipal corporation, which is operated in such manner as to constitute a nuisance to neighboring property, upon its own knowledge that it may and will be rendered impervious to the escape of gas, but those questions must be determined from the evidence offered to establish them.

(June 5, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Chancery Court for Jefferson County, in defendant's favor, in a suit to enjoin the maintenance of a nuisance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — Vacancy of property as affecting right to enjoin nuisance affecting it.

The few cases passing directly upon this question sustain the position taken in ROMANO v. BIRMINGHAM R. LIGHT & P. Co. that the fact that property is vacant will not prevent equity from enjoining a nuisance affecting it.

Thus, in Busch v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 34 N. Y. S. R. 7, 12 N. Y. Supp. 85, it is held that the fact that land adjacent to defendant's tracks, along which water was permitted to accumulate in borrow pits and become stagnant, was vacant, would not prevent the courts from enjoining the nuisance, the land in question being platted and laid out in building lots, and they being depreciated in value and their sale prevented by such nuisance.

It appears from a footnote to Peck v. Elder, as reported in 3 Sandf. 126, that the chancellor, in granting a temporary injunction against the maintenance of a fat-boiling works, which was made permanent by the superior court, said it was of no consequence whether complainants reside on their property or not, it being sufficient that the nuisance tended to diminish its value, by preventing it being occupied by complainants or good tenants, or by destroying its value as building lots.

Messrs. J. A. Mitchell and Samuel B. Stern, for appellants:

The bill clearly shows that the gas reservoir or gas holder, erected in a residence section of the said city, is a nuisance.

30 L. J. Ch. N. S. 25, 6 Jur. N. S. 1109, 5 L. T. N. S. 342, 9 Week. Rep. 30, which was a suit to restrain the erection of a building which would interfere with windows in property owned by plaintiff, it was contended that an injunction should not be granted, inasmuch as plaintiff did not occupy or intend to occupy the houses affected, and the only injury he could sustain was diminution of their value, for which compensation could be recovered at law. The court overruled this objection, however, saying that plaintiff should not be denied the remedy afforded by the court in case of nuisance because there was no present interference with his personal comfort, inasmuch as he might afterward wish to reside in the house; and further, the court would sustain the plaintiff's legal right simply on the ground of the damage which might be produced to property.

But in Edwards v. Allouez Min. Co. 38 Mich. 46, 31 Am. Rep. 301, 7 Mor. Min. Rep. 577 when it appeared that plaintiff purchased bottom lands below defendant's stamp mill, not to use, but for speculative purposes, and then sought to sell them to defendant at an enhanced price, and, on failing to do so, brought this suit to enjoin defendant from causing sand to be deposited on the land, the court refused to grant the injunction, but left plaintiff to his remedy at law by way of damages. W. 786; Kingsbury v. Flowers, 65 Ala. 479, 39 Am. Rep. 14.

Sayre, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants filed this bill for an injunction to abate a nuisance. The averment is that appellants own four adjacent lots at the corner of Pratt boulevard and Twentieth street in the residence section of that part of the city of Birmingham, formerly known as Ensley. The lots are vacant, but are being held for sale or future use as places of residence. Within a year, and since complainants acquired their property, defendant has constructed on a lot immediately across the street from appellants' property a large gas holder or reservoir in which illuminating or fuel gas is kept for distribution to its customers in the neighborhood. It is averred that "said gas reservoir or gas holder is continuously emitting fumes and gases, polluting the air in that vicinity with unpleasant and unwholesome odors which are deleterious to the health and comfort of persons living and residing in that vicinity, and particularly to persons who might reside on the real estate of complainants." To show their own injury, appellants aver that the sale of their property for any reasonable price has been and is now being prevented, the value thereof as a place of residence is "absolutely ruined, and its value is greatly depreciated."

For the chancellor's opinion, written in explanation of the grounds upon which his decree proceeded, it is to be observed that two concurring considerations operated to bring about his conclusion against the equity of the bill. Other objections were taken to the bill, but they have not appeared to us to contain merit, and, inasmuch as we have been unaided by a brief for appellee, we have assumed that it is willing to rest its case upon the grounds which were sustained in the court below, and shall confine the statement of our views to those points.

1. It did not appear to the chancellor that the structure in question, or defendant's use of it, constituted a menace to the future use of complainants' lots as vacant property. There has been no physical invasion of that part of the solid earth over which complainants have acquired exclusive ownership and dominion; but their ownership extends usque ad cælum, and within the limits of that ownership they are entitled to the flow of pure air. The right is incident to the ownership of land, and must be protected as well as any other valuable right. No man has a right to interfere with the supply of pure air that flows over another's land any more than he has to interfere with the soil itself. Savile v. Kilner, 26 L. T. N. S. 277; Wood, Nuisances, 2d ed. § 544. It is not denied, therefore, that any sensible pollution of the air which flows over complainants' property, to a degree in excess of such pollution as is fairly incident to the ordinary use of land in that neighborhood, would constitute an actionable injury; but the proposition of the decree is that complainants shall have no relief in equity by way of injunction, but should be remitted to their action at law for damages, because the property is vacant, and complainants' comfortable enjoyment thereof has not been invaded or diminished. Of course, it does not follow that, because complainants might have an action at law, they cannot resort to equity. The remedy at law must be adequate to redress the particular injury complained of. An owner is entitled to be secured in the full beneficial use of his property and his complete dominion over it so long as his use and dominion do not invade the corresponding legal rights of his neighbors. The Code of 1907 has defined a private nuisance as one which may injure either the person or property of another. Section 5198. In adjusting rights and remedies between parties in respect of the uses to which real property may be devoted, regard must be had for the future. It is to secure the future that equity intervenes. Complainants and defendant alike, when they acquired property in a neighborhood set apart to residential purposes, took it with certain implied restrictions on their use of it. Complainants are also entitled to be secured in the peculiar present and future advantages of the neighborhood. This was clearly recognized by this court in the case of Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Johnson, 147 Ala. 384, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 226, 119 Am. St. Rep. 89, 11 Ann. Cas. 285, 41 So. 907. Complainants ought not to be required to submit to a use of defendant's property—a use hurtful to complainants and others, though valuable to defendant—which a court of equity would deny to complainants in respect to their own property on the application of other neighbors. A court of equity interposes by injunction to prevent future injury in respect of a legal right attaching to land simply on the ground of the damage it will produce to the land and its ownership; and in a case like this it is of no consequence whether complainants reside on their property or not. Wilson v. Townsend, 1 Drew. & S. 324, 30 L. J. Ch. N. S. 25, 6 Jur. N. S. 1100, 3 L. T. N. S. 342, 9 Week. Rep. 30; Peck v. Elder, 3 Sandf. 126.

2. Assuming, as a matter of common knowledge, to know in a general way, at least, the processes involved in the manufacture, storage, and distribution of artificial gas, because those processes are very old, the chancellor, in the absence of averments that gas was manufactured on defendant's named premises, and that its escape resulted from an irremediable defect in defendant's holder or reservoir, assumed to know that the trouble of which the bill complained could be remedied by calking the seams of the reservoir, or by tightening its rivets at the point of escape, and that there was nothing inherent in the structure and use of such reservoirs to render the escape of gas irremediable, as might be the case if gas were manufactured on the premises.

We do not feel that confidence in the completeness of our knowledge of such things which would justify our denial of complainants' right to relief on this ground taken by the chancellor. While it is held that gas works—places where gas is manufactured—are not nuisances per se, they are placed in the class of erections which are not within the ordinary purposes to which real estate is applied, and, although operated under statutory authorization, are to be regarded as actionable nuisances whenever they injuriously affect the use and enjoyment of property in the vicinity. 20 Cyc. 1180. For aught we know, gas holders or reservoirs, constructed for the storage and distribution of gas at points remote from the place of manufacture, may be assigned to the same class. Nor do we feel safe in assuming to know whether the injury stated in the bill results from remediable negligence in the construction, maintenance, or operation of defendant's gas holder, or whether the consequences complained of are so unavoidably incident to constructions of the sort as to render them nuisances in neighborhoods which have been set apart and occupied as places of residence. The injury here may be temporary, or it may be permanent. That question should be determined upon the evidence to be heard, and the decree granting relief, if relief shall finally appear to be proper, may be accommodated to the fact. If the structure is a nuisance, and will necessarily continue to be a nuisance, and is incapable of remedy by alteration, repair, or change of process, which would effectually correct the evil of its presence, it ought not to be allowed in the neighborhood where it has been set up. A like result would follow upon proof that the emission of noxious gas and odor has injuriously affected the value of complainants' property for residential purposes, and will continue to do so, even though it may be correctable in the manner suggested by the chancellor, unless the defendant should evince a willingness and ask for an opportunity to apply that remedy. The proper practice in that event would be to retain the bill until that relief can be tested and the result ascertained. Wood, Nuisances, § 823.

Our conclusion is that the bill is not open to the objection sustained to it in the Chancery Court. On the facts stated in the bill complainants are entitled to relief. The decree will be reversed.

Reversed and remanded.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Sayre, J., on June 30, 1913, handed down the following response:

Counsel for appellee must be acquitted of any neglect in the matter of furnishing a brief. It now appears that a brief was furnished, but that it was mislaid by the clerical department of the court. Upon consideration of the application for rehearing in connection with the original brief now before us, we are of opinion that they furnish no sufficient reason for disturbing the conclusion heretofore reached. IOWA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE STREVER, Appt.,

v.

JOHN WOODARD.

(— Iowa, —, 141 N. W. 931.)

Evidence — opinion as to cause of injury.

1. A physician who has attended a person injured by another's alleged negligence may, in an action to hold the latter liable for the injury, testify as to what might have been the cause of headache from which the injured person suffers.

Note. — Precautions to be observed when about to stop vehicle in highway.

As to duty of driver to guard against persons coming in contact with rear or sides of wagon, see note to Stuart v. Holyoke Street R. Co. 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094.

As to rule of the road governing vehicles proceeding in the same direction, see note

Highway — stopping vehicle — duty towards following vehicle.

2. One driving along a highway is not bound to look or listen for vehicles which may be approaching from behind before stopping his vehicle, nor is he bound to give warning of his intention to stop; his stopping being negligent only when he is aware of the presence of another vehicle, with which his act may cause a collision.

Damages — personal injury — nominal.

3. A verdict for nominal damages should be set aside in favor of one injured by another's negligence, where he has been compelled to pay a substantial sum for medical attendance, and there is evidence tending to show that he suffered physical pain and impaired health because of the injury.

to Hackett v. Alamito Sanitary Dairy Co. 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 332.

As to rules of the road governing vehicles proceeding in opposite directions, see note to Smith v. Barnard, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 323.

As to rules of road governing vehicles at intersection of streets and when turning across street, see note to Molin v. Wark, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 346.

This note does not deal with rights and liabilities arising by reason of vehicles standing in the highway, but is confined strictly to the question of the precautions to be observed when about to stop a vehicle.

Upon this question there is little authority, although it is likely to become a practical question, especially in connection with automobiles. While it is probably true as held in STREVER v. WOODARD, that a traveler is not bound to look or listen for vehicles which may be approaching from behind, or give warning of his intention of stopping, where he has no knowledge of the presence of another vehicle, yet where he has such knowledge it has been held that he is bound to use ordinary care with respect to such vehicles.

Thus, in Maas v. Fauser, 36 Misc. 813, 74 N. Y. Supp. 861, a driver who had just passed a wagon, apparently on the wrong side, and was confronted with a passing car, was held bound to give such attention to the situation as a man of ordinary intelligence would give; and where he decided suddenly to stop in order to escape the car it was held that he was bound to remember that the horse and wagon were coming behind, and that he could not recover for damages resulting where the wagon following unavoidably collided with his.

And in Bierbach v. Goodyear Rubber Co. 14 Fed. 826, where the plaintiff's vehicle had been run into by the defendant's, which was following, and the plaintiff claimed that the defendant was negligent in not properly turning and passing, and the plaintiff was charged with contributory negligence in suddenly stopping the speed of his horses and beginning to turn, it was held that each was bound to use ordinary 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Wright County in his favor for $1 only in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. C. Chase, for appellant:

The power to set aside the verdict of a jury when manifestly inconsistent with the evidence and the result of a misconception of their powers and duties is as fully recognized where the verdict is inadequate as where it is excessive.

Hackett v. Pratt, 52 Ill. App. 346; Platz v. Cohoes, 8 Abb. N. C. 392; Henderson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 52 Minn. 479, 55 N. W. 53; Tathwell v. Cedar Rapids, 122 Iowa, care in view of the surrounding circumstances of the case. The court said: "The collision occurred on a public thoroughfare, where teams have a right, in the course of business, to follow each other, turn about, pass and repass. Upon both of the parties there was devolved the duty of exercising reasonable care to avoid doing each other injury. It was the duty of the defendant's servant to observe, with ordinary care and diligence, the movements of the vehicle in advance of him, as it was the duty of the plaintiff, in turning his horse and wagon about at that place, to observe with the same kind of care and watchfulness the presence and movements of any vehicle in proximity to his. Ordinary care and caution, as mentioned in these instructions, mean that degree of care and caution which would reasonably be expected of an ordinarily prudent person in the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time of the alleged injury."

In Delfs v. Dunshee, 143 Iowa, 381, 122 N. W. 236, the evidence was such that the jury might have found that after the defendant's automobile had passed and frightened the plaintiff's horse, his driver regained partial control so as to direct the horse's course, when the defendant, hearing its approach, stopped his machine some 30 feet ahead of the horse, and thereby added to its fright, and caused it to turn and run into a pole. It was held that the court was justified in calling the jury's attention to this evidence in connection with the circumstances, and instructing that it was for them to say "whether the defendant, in thus stopping his car, was guilty of negligence," it having, in another instruction, correctly defined negligence. The court said: "In undertaking to stop, he was aware that the horse had become frightened by the automobile, and had not recovered therefrom, and it was for the jury to say whether, as an ordinarily prudent man, he ought not to have known that in bringing the vehicle, which had scared the horse, to a stop but a short distance in front of the frenzied animal approaching directly from behind, he would increase its fright and Gipe v. Lynch, — Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 715; Weber v. Swallow, 136 Wis. 46, 116 N. W. 844.

It is for the jury to determine whether a person lawfully using a public highway is guilty of negligence in failing to look or listen for approaching vehicles, or to do what a reasonably prudent person should have done under like circumstances.

render it more difficult to control; if so, in what he did the jury might have found him to have been negligent. Had the horse been given the street, it would seem that the driver might have regained control, at least the jury might so have found. The natural effect of stopping the thing which had frightened it but a short distance away was to furnish an obstacle to his progress which it naturally would attempt to avoid, and this might have been found to have turned the horse from its course, and therefore to have contributed to its injury. Ordinarily a person may stop at any point on the street where he chooses, provided he does not unduly obstruct the way; but in an emergency like this the safety of property and person is involved, and that course is exacted which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise for their protection. Having passed the horse immediately before, and being aware of the fright caused thereby, and that the horse was then running toward the receding automobile, with the driver still in the cart, it was incumbent on him to exercise care commensurate with the situation in which he found himself, to the end that no act of his should interfere with the efforts to regain control and save the horse and driver from injury. Whether he so did was fairly an issue for the jury to decide."

road to a bridge, diminished the speed of his automobile, and that the plaintiff, who was some distance behind in an automobile, did likewise, and blew his horn; that at the crest of the incline the defendant's car suddenly stopped when the plaintiff's car was about 6 feet in its rear, and that the brakes were applied to the latter's car, but notwithstanding this a collision occurred which caused damage. Earle v. Pardington, 116 N. Y. Supp. 675. The court said: "It is undisputed that both parties were masters of the art of running their automobiles, and that plaintiff's was a 25-horse power machine. He claimed that by the custom of the road defendant, knowing that plaintiff's machine was not far in the rear, should have given a warning signal of an intention to stop on the bridge, either from volition or necessity; also that by turning about 2 feet more to one side a sufficient space would have been left for plaintiff's machine to pass and escape the collision. In Kettle v. Turl, 162 N. Y. 258, 56 N. E. 627, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 482, the court said: 'The cases are exceptional where it can be held that contributory negligence was so conclusively established that nothing was left, either of inference or of fact, to be determined by a jury.' This principle applies as well to freedom from negligence. The exceptional feature of this case is that two experienced automobilists should each charge negligence against the other, a rare, though proper, opportunity for the delectation and wisdom of a jury." Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was on his way to Woolstock in a single-seated, one-horse buggy going south, on December 29, 1910. His horse was trotting along when an automobile operated by Robinson approached from the opposite direction, and passed at a distance of between 16 and 20 feet as estimated by Robinson, or 30 or 40 feet as testified by plaintiff. The defendant with his automobile, containing four or five passengers, came up behind plaintiff's rig, and when Robinson was about opposite, turned his car to go between, when the fender struck the back wheel of the buggy, lifting that side up, and caused plaintiff, with the cushion and blanket, to slip or fall out on the ground, and the horse, becoming frightened, went on to Woolstock. The plaintiff testified that he did not stop but had slowed up, and was corroborated by the testimony of Robinson. The defendant testified that plaintiff stopped his vehicle suddenly, as though to converse with Robinson, and his testimony is corroborated by that of the persons riding with him. In this action, recovery is sought on the ground that defendant was negligent (1) in running his car at an excessive rate of speed, (2) in failing to give warning of his approach, and (3) in not keeping far enough from plaintiff's vehicle to safely pass it without a collision; and that the injury occurred without fault on the part of the plaintiff contributing thereto. The defendant denied having been guilty of any negligence, and alleged that the collision was due to the carelessness of plaintiff in suddenly stopping his horse without any notice or warning to the defendant. The evidence was such as to carry these several issues to the jury. This is apparent from even a casual examination of the record, and for this reason it is not necessary to review the evidence.

II. The plaintiff was attended by Dr. McCauliff.

He testified that upon examination made January 3, 1911, he discovered a contusion on the left side of plaintiff's head, immediately above the temple, with swelling 1½ inches in diameter, somewhat discolored and sensitive to the touch, and also a darkening or contusion of the left lip without much swelling, and that the patient said he suffered from a severe headache and was troubled with insomnia; that he called on him eight or nine times during that month, and that the headaches became more severe in a few days after his first call and the insomnia more difficult to overcome; that he was of opinion that the witness suffered severe pain from his injuries, and that after the time mentioned he was consulted by the plaintiff about once a week for another month; that he complained of pains in his head during the entire time and of impairment in his hearing and sight.

He was then asked "whether or not a violent blow upon the head or concussion from falling, such as would produce this swelling that you speak of on the head, might or might not have any effect upon the hearing, or the head itself, of a permanent nature."

A. It might.

Q. To what did you ascribe professionally the continuance of these headaches described that Mr. Strever complains of.

An objection as incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant was sustained.

Q. Considering the history of the case as detailed to and what you observed of those injuries in January, what would you say was the cause of these headaches?

A like objection was sustained.

Q. State whether or not a violent blow on the head in the place where you saw his injury would cause continual headache such as Mr. Strever had or not.

An objection as leading and suggestive, incompetent, and immaterial was sustained.

Q. I wish you would now state from your knowledge of the history of the case and physical condition of Strever as a physician, whether these pains that you have described or the headaches were or were not the result of injury upon his head, that you have referred to in your testimony.

Same objection was sustained.

Q. I now refer to all of this.

A like objection was sustained, and the court remarked: "This is a question for the jury; they must draw that conclusion, or they must fail to draw it."

Exceptions were saved to each of the above rulings, and all were erroneous. They called for opinions which it was competent for an expert, if possessed of sufficient information, to answer. The witness had fully qualified, and the rule is well established that though a physician may not testify what the cause of an injury actually was, his testimony as to what might have, within reasonable probability, caused it, is received. Thus as to whether an injury might have resulted from an alleged concussion by being thrown from a carriage (Quinn v. O'Keeffe, 9 App. Div. 68, 41 N. Y. Supp. 116), or from a blow (12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 447). In Barker v. Ohio River R. Co. 51 W. Va. 423, 90 Am. St. Rep. 808, 41 S. E. 148, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 580, testimony of a physician that the plaintiff's condition might have been caused by shock, a fall, or anything that produces a shock to the spinal column, was held admissible. See also Bennett v. Fail, 26 Ala. 605; Thompson v. Bertrand, 23 Ark. 730; Missouri, P. R. Co. v. Lovelace, 57 Kan. 195, 45 Pac. 590; Oliver v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co. 65 S. C. 1, 43 S. E. 307; Matteson v. New York C. R. Co. 62 Barb. 364. The subject was one not familiar to the jury, and it was competent to call for expert opinion to aid in tracing the casual connection between plaintiff's ailments and the efficient cause; and, as a nervous temperament and a fall from a load of tile nearly four months previous were suggested in cross-examination as such cause, the testimony of the physician who attended him during his illness as to what might have occasioned his suffering was material, and should not have been excluded. The inquiries were not vulnerable to the objection as leading, nor did they call for an opinion as to the ultimate issue to be determined by the jury. Whether he was in fact injured by the fall from the buggy would necessarily be included in the verdict of the jury, but was not determinative of the case.

III. In an instruction otherwise unexceptionable, the court told the jury that if an ordinarily careful and prudent man, situated as plaintiff was and in like circumstances, would "have looked and listened or given warning of his intention to stop in the highway, or would have driven out of the beaten track before stopping, and you further find that the plaintiff did suddenly stop in the highway, but did not look, listen, or give warning to the defendant of his intention to stop, and the collision of which he now complains was thereby occasioned, then the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and he cannot recover." The converse also was stated. The plaintiff testified that he drove out to the side of the road, and that he did not stop, but merely slowed up. For this reason the instruction might be improved by mentioning these matters hypothetically. Nor are we content with the suggestion of an obligation on the part of a traveler that he must, Janus-like, keep an outlook in the rear, or have driven from the portion of the highway along which his vehicle was moving. He was under no obligation to yield any portion of the highway to allow defendant to pass. Elenz v. Conrad, 123 Iowa, 522, 99 N. W. 138. Only to avoid a collision reasonably to be apprehended is the foremost traveler bound to turn to one side. His duty is to keep a lookout ahead, and only when he is aware of a vehicle coming up from the rear, and near that which he is driving, is he charged with duty of exercising ordinary care in the management of his own, so as not to injure that behind. Delfs v. Dunshee, 143 Iowa, 381, 122 N. W. 236. "If there be not sufficient room it is said to be 'the duty of the foremost traveler to afford it, on request made, by yielding an equal share of the road, if that be adequate and practicable; if not, the object must be deferred till the parties arrive at ground more favorable to its accomplishment.' But it is perhaps doubtful if such duty can be deemed an absolute legal duty, and even if it should be so considered, the failure of the leading traveler to perform it by turning out to one side will not justify the other in purposely running into him or attempting to pass at all hazards. The only rule of general application that can be laid down is that he who attempts to pass another going in the same direction must do so in such a manner as may be most convenient under the circumstances of the case, and if negligent, and damage results to the person passed, the former must answer for it, unless the latter by his own recklessness or carelessness brought the disaster upon himself." 2 Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 1084. The party coming up from behind must exercise reasonable care to keep his vehicle under control, and far enough in the rear to avoid the contingencies of decreasing speed, stopping and the like. He is in a situation to do this, and the law casts their burden upon him. Whether plaintiff knew defendant was immediately behind his buggy with his automobile, and so close that if he stopped it would likely run into his vehicle, was an issue to be submitted to the jury; and if such was the situation and plaintiff was aware of it, undoubtedly he took the risk in suddenly stopping, if he so did, and cannot recover; but if he was not aware that defendant was in such proximity, or if he merely slowed down the speed at which he was driving, then he was not negligent, regardless of whether he looked back or listened. Though the reference to looking and listening, guarded as it is in the instruction, may not constitute reversible error, it may as well be avoided on another trial.

IV. The jury failed to answer one of the special interrogatories submitted, and error is predicated on the court receiving the verdict without exacting an answer. As plaintiff does not appear to have insisted on an answer being required, he cannot be heard to complain. Huss v. Chicago, G. W. R. Co. 113 Iowa, 343, 85 N. W. 627; Mayo v. Halley, 124 Iowa, 675, 100 N. W. 529; Andrews v. Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. 77 Iowa, 669, 42 N. W. 513.

V. The jury returned a verdict of $1, and the plaintiff asked that his be set aside as inadequate. If there were proof of substantial damages, uncontroverted, the motion for a new trial should have been sustained. Tathwell v. Cedar Rapids, 122 Iowa, 51, 97 N. W. 96; Ward v. Marshalltown, Light, Power & R. Co. 132 Iowa, 581, 108 N. W. 323. That plaintiff was injured was uncontradicted. He was precipitated from his buggy to the ground, and taken immediately to Dr. Smith's office and examined. He found no bones broken, and did not remember of any contusion of the skin, but testified that he "was in a dazed condition. The man undoubtedly had had a fall, but I did not discover any lesions."

Upon calling on him a week or two later, the witness said: "All that was wrong was an intense headache and considerable nervousness. I do not know what caused those conditions. . . . The nervousness that I discovered on my call to his place might have been due to a number of different causes. I thought he was suffering from grippe and the shock or contusion of this accident." The witness then explained that there might be concussion without external evidence of it; that the time of the examination in his office he complained of his chest, head, and back, that he "attributed part of his grief to the accident, but he could have had very much the same condition without any accident at all. It was impossible to tell the real cause of the headache and nervousness,"—and explained that he had complained of sleeplessness a year or two before. The testimony of Dr. McCauliff concerning his condition has been stated. He testified further that he attributed his nervousness and sleeplessness to the injuries he found when called to treat him. That plaintiff was confined to his house a part of the time, requiring the care of a nurse for several weeks, was testified by plaintiff, his wife, a son and daughter, and an employee. Indeed there is no controversy on this point, though two physicians, Carver and Sams, examined him at the instance of defendant, October 25, 1911, and discovered no trouble with him save a catarrhal condition of the middle ear. He had fallen from a load of tile in September previous, but his testimony that he had recovered therefrom was not disputed. For medicine and medical attendance as a result of this injury he had paid $106.75. There is no room in this record for saying that he did not suffer substantial injuries in falling from the buggy, and that this expense was occasioned thereby, and for this reason, if entitled to anything, he should have been allowed substantial damages. On this ground the motion for a new trial should have been sustained. Reversed.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Iowa to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover back money advanced as margins in certain stock transactions. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Hook and Smith, Circuit Judges, and Van Valkenburgh, District Judge.

Messrs. Moritz Rosenthal, Henry H. Kennedy, Joseph W. Moses, Julius Moses, Hamilton Moses, Walter Bachrach, N. T. Guernsey, W. E. Miller, and A. C. Parker, for plaintiffs in error:

The laws of Illinois have no extra territorial force or effect, and hence do not govern contracts made and to be performed in the state of Iowa, and create no rights growing out of such contracts which are enforceable in the courts of Iowa.

Note. — Conflict of laws as to gambling contracts.

The present note is a continuation of a note on the same subject appended to Winward v. Lincoln, 64 L.R.A. 160.

In determining the place where the contract was made, the court in LAMSON BROS. v. BANE relied on cases involving insurance contracts. On that point, see notes in 63 L.R.A. 834, and 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 968.

The principles, and rules for the determination of the governing law of contracts are discussed in various other aspects and in relation to many different subjects in annotation referred to in the Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Conflict of Laws."

Public policy of forum.

As shown in the earlier note, the prevailing tendency, in this country though there is a conflict upon the point, seems to be to regard statutes declaring gambling contracts and transactions illegal

v. Reichart, 103 Iowa, 430; 72 N. W. 490; Sutterley v. Fleshman, 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 131.

The Federal court sitting in Iowa is bound to uphold the policy of that state, and will, therefore, not enforce the Illinois statute, its enforcement being contrary to such policy.

Parker v. Moore, 53 C. C. A. 369, 115 Fed. 799, 111 Fed. 470; Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974.

The provision in the Illinois statute allowing six months during which the loser may sue the winner for moneys lost at gambling operates as a bar to the institution of any suit by the loser after six months from the time that the money is lost and paid.

Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1909, § 132, p. 38; Holland v. Swain, 94 Ill. 154; Kizer v. Walden, 198 Ill. 274, 65 N. E. 116; Johnson v. McGregor, 167 Ill. 350, 41 N. E. 558; Bartlett v. Slusher, 215 Ill. 348, 74 N. E. 370; Gibb v. Dorniny, 164 Ill. App. 74.

Messrs. Jerry B. Sullivan and John B. Sullivan, for defendant in error:

Purchase and sales made with the understanding that the contract will be settled by paying the difference between the contract and the market price are void.

or void as embodying a distinctive public policy, which requires the courts of the state in which they are enacted to refuse to recognize or enforce any contract or transaction in violation of their terms, even though such contract or transaction may have had its situs outside of the forum, and therefore does not come within the direct operation of the statutes.

So, in the subsequent case of Burrus v. Witcover, 158 N. C. 384, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1005, 74 S. E. 11, it was held contrary to the public policy of North Carolina to permit recovery upon a draft drawn to furnish margins, or to pay debts for margins, on future contracts which would be illegal according to the law of North Carolina, even upon the assumption that they would not be illegal according to the law of the place where the transactions took place.

And, in Thomas v. First Nat. Bank, 213 Ill. 261, 72 N. E. 801, holding that an assignee of a certificate of deposit issued by an Illinois bank to a resident of Illinois could not recover thereon against the bank, it appearing that the assignment was a part of a transaction by which the proceeds thereof were to be employed in gambling, it was declared to be contrary to the public policy of Illinois to maintain the action, even if it were to be assumed that there was no law of the District of Columbia, where the assignment was made, or in the state of Missouri, where the gambling transactions were mainly to be conducted, prohibiting the making of gambling contracts.

Nor will a court of Pennsylvania the law of which denies the right of a loser in a gambling transaction to recover back the money enforce a cause of action for the recovery of such losses, created by a statute of another state where the gambling transactions took place. Sutterley v. Fleshman, 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 131.

In Ross v. Green, 4 Harr. (Del.) 308, recovery by the loser from a stakeholder of money deposited in pursuance of a bet made in Maryland upon a horse race to be run there was denied, although horse racing and betting on horse racing in Delaware was prohibited by statute in that state. But see Tarleton v. Baker, 18 Vt. 9, 44 Am. Dec. 358, cited in the earlier note.

In England, however, it is held not contrary to public policy to enforce a contract growing out of gambling transactions, valid by its proper governing law, though it would be invalid and unenforceable if governed by the law of England. See English cases subsequently cited. As pointed out in the earlier note, some of the American cases also take this position; and there are other cases which have applied the law of another state with the result of upholding the contract in question; though it would have been illegal according to the law of the forum. See A. G. Edwards Brokerage Co. v. Stevenson, 160 Mo. 516, 61 S. W. 617 (cited at page 164 of the note in 64 L.R.A.). In commenting upon this case the St. Louis court of appeals, in Atwater v. A. G. Edwards Brokerage Co. 147 Mo. App. 436, 126 S. W. 823, calls attention to the failure of the supreme court to notice the question of public policy of the forum as distinguished from the question as to the proper governing law of the contract.

In some cases which apparently apply the law of another state upholding the contract, it does not appear that the contract would have been illegal even according to the law of the forum. In Conrath v. Lepper, 13 Wyo. 473, 81 Pac. 307, 82 Pac. 2, where the law of another state upholding the contract was applied, it was apparently assumed that the contract in question would have been valid according to the law of the forum.

In some cases, e. g., Bearse v. McLean, 199 Mass. 242, 85 N. E. 462, infra, the action was not to enforce the contract, but to recover back losses sustained thereunder. Obviously the refusal to permit a recovery of losses incurred under a contract valid by its proper law, but invalid by the law of the forum, would be entirely consistent with the refusal to enforce such a contract, upon the ground that it would be contrary to the public policy of the forum.

Governing law when public policy of forum does not interfere.

Assuming that there is no objection arising from the public policy of the forum against entertaining the action, the question in relation to conflict of laws generally resolve itself into the inquiry whether the case is governed by the law of the place where the contract was made or that of the place where the transactions in pursuance of it were conducted, in other words the law of the place of performance. As stated in the earlier note, the weight of authority seems to favor the law of the place where the contract is to be performed, rather than that of the place where it is made. However, there are so many variations in the essential features of the different cases that it is unsafe to make any sweeping generalizations on the point. As indicated in the earlier notes, in cases involving transactions in "futures," a material inquiry in determining the governing law is whether it is the contract between the customer and broker, or the transaction conducted by the latter, that is to be regarded.

In LAMSON BROS. v. BANE, however, as pointed out by the court, according to the plaintiff's own theory, the transaction between defendant and himself amounted to mere wagers, and there was therefore no place of performance outside of Iowa, in which state, upon the facts before the court, the contract was assumed to have been made. In this respect the LAMSON CASE is to be distinguished from A. G. Edwards Brokerage Co. v. Stevenson, 180 Mo. 510, 61 S. W. 617, which is set out in the note in 64 L.R.A. at page 166. The doctrine of the Edwards Case was followed upon a substantially similar state of facts in Atwater v. A. G. Edwards Brokerage Co. 147 Mo. App. 436, 126 S. W. 823. In the Atwater Case the court observed that "if the legality or illegality of the agent's advances for, and commissions on the account of, his principal [to which the counterclaims in question related], were to be tested by the contract of agency out of which the transactions grew in the first instance, it would seem that even the matter set forth in the counterclaims before us would fall within the inhibition of our statute, as both of the parties were residents of this state and the contract of agency entered into here. But our supreme court in [the Edwards Case] saw fit to omit to notice the question sug-

The form of the contract is unimportant, the actual intention of the parties at the time of making the contract is the absolute test.

Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, 28 L. ed. 225, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160; Jamieson v. Wallace, 167 Ill. 388, 59 Am. St. Rep. 302, 47 N. E. 762; Pratt v. Ashmore, 224 Ill. 587, 79 N. E. 952.

It makes no difference if a debt or wager is made and assumes the form of a contract, gambling is none the less such because it is carried on in the form or guise of legitimate trade.

Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, 28 L. ed. 225, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 160; Weare Commis- gested, and treated the suit by the agent against his principal for advances and commissions, as though the validity of the subject-matter should be ascertained and determined by reference to the law of the state where the purchases and sales were actually made by the agent, or by another agent at its instance and request. The doctrine of that case is therefore to be interpreted, notwithstanding the fact the agent's claim against his principal for advancements and commissions, as here must essentially rest, in the first instance, on the contract of agency, [as ruling] the legality or illegality of the subject-matter for which the recovery is sought is to be determined by reference to the law of the state where the agent actually conducted purchases and sales on his principal's account, and not by that of the state where the agency was created."

The Edwards Case was also followed in Gaylord v. Duryea, 95 Mo. App. 574, 69 S. W. 607, upon a substantially similar state of facts.

In Willhite v. Houston, 118 C. C. A. 542, 200 Fed. 390, an action by a broker to recover disbursements and commissions on sales and purchases of grain, defended on the ground that the transactions out of which the account arose were gambling transactions, the plaintiffs were brokers at Kansas City, Missouri, and acted almost entirely upon telegrams and letters from defendant and his agent; the orders for sales and purchases of grain being executed, according to instructions, on the board of trade at Kansas City and Chicago. It was held that as regards their legality the sales and purchases of grain on the Chicago market were governed by the law of Illinois, by which the contract is void if both parties intend it as a wager upon the market movements to be settled by differences, but not if only one of them has that intention, and transactions on the Kansas City market were governed by the law of Missouri, by which the contract is void if either party intends a mere wager on market movements, though the other does not. The court cites the Edwards Case as authority, pellant will be entitled to the reward. The appellant discovered the criminal. He was unauthorized, either by himself or by his agent, to arrest or to convict, but he did all that was possible for him legally to do. The officers of the law did their bounden duty, and the arrest and conviction followed. He caused both. This is all the contract contemplated any citizen could do. Haskell v. Davidson, 91 Me. 488, 42 L.R.A. 155, 64 Am. St. Rep. 254, 40 Atl. 330; 34 Cyc. 1747. The offer was not made to police officers alone, but to citizens generally. If it were made to officers only, no one officer could, either by himself, or his agent, meet the requirements of the offer with the strict construction thereof which is urged upon this court. Many conflicting authorities are cited to sustain the contentions of the respective parties. A careful reading of them all and others indicates that each case, as to the circumstances and the object sought to be obtained in offering the reward, must in a measure be considered by itself. If, for instance, great danger is from the known facts to be anticipated in making the arrest, the reward should be construed as intended for those who should brave the danger and effect the arrest. In other cases, as in this, detective ingenuity is demanded. In every case the accomplishment of the desired result, the bringing of the criminal to justice, is the object of the proffered reward. He who accomplishes that which really effectuates such result is entitled to the reward. That the services of a sheriff, a county attorney, twelve jurors, and a judge, in their respective official capacities, are necessary to consummate the arrest and conviction, detracts not from his right. Their duties are incident to their respective offices for which the law provides compensation. His is an extraordinary employment, and for compensation he looks to the contract. From all the circumstances the prime object in this case was the apprehension or discovery of the criminal. The rest followed by the orderly discharge of their duties by different officers. So far as the evidence demurred to discloses, the language employed in Stone v. Dysert, 20 Kan. 123, may be applied to appellant. It was said: "It is sufficient, if acting on the knowledge that a reward had been offered, and with a view to obtain it, they performed substantially the service proposed in the advertisement." P. 125.

The ruling on the demurrer and the judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded for new trial.

Petition for rehearing denied.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ABILENE STATE BANK, Appt.,
v.
JAMES STRACHAN.

(89 Kan. 577, 132 Pac. 200.)

Corporation — stockholders' liability — assignment.

1. To effect an assignment and disposition of shares of capital stock in a bank so as to release the assignor from the superadded liability of shareholders, fixed by law, he must procure a transfer of the stock on the books of the bank, in accordance with the provisions of the banking act.

Same — transfer on books.

2. Such a transfer is essential to a release from liability of a shareholder who sells and assigns his stock to the bank itself, in payment of a previously contracted debt owing by him to the bank.

(May 10, 1913.)

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

Note. — Failure to register transfer, due to fault of corporation, as affecting continued liability of assignor of stock.

The general rule is that every person whose name, by his authority, has been placed on the books of a corporation as a shareholder, remains liable as such both to corporation and to its creditors so long as his name remains there. 10 Cyc. 714.

But there is an important exception to this general rule, recognized by some of the courts, i. e., where the transferrer has done all that can be required or expected of a reasonably careful and prudent business man to secure the registry of the transfer upon the books, but a failure has resulted by reason of the negligence, carelessness, or illegal refusal of the company to make the proper entry.

The scope of this note is confined strictly to the exception, and does not include cases such as Plumb v. Bank of Enterprise, 48 Kan. 484, 29 Pac. 699; Giesen v. London & N. W. A. Mortg. Co. 42 C. C. A. 515, 102 Fed. 584; and Van Tuyl v. Robin, 80 Misc. 360, 142 N. Y. Supp. 535, where the facts clearly show that the case could not possibly be within the exception, and the court did nothing more than apply the general rule.

Neither are cases like Johnston v. Laffin, 103 U. S. 800, 26 L. ed. 532, where the transfer had actually been made and entered upon the books, but was attacked upon other grounds, within the scope of the note.

There are also a great many cases where the recovery was sought from the transferee, such as Chambersburg Ins. Co. v. Smith, 11 Pa. 120; Upton v. Burnham, 3 Biss. 431, Fed. Cas. No. 16,798; Brown v. Artman, 166 Fed. 485 (both the transferrer and transferee may be liable); Hamilton v. Loeb, 108

The same rule was held to apply in St. James v. Erskine, 155 Mich. 606, 119 N. W. 897, where the deed gave the right to enter upon the land and cut and remove the timber "at any time thereafter."

In Wait v. Baldwin, 60 Mich. 622, 1 Am. St. Rep. 551, 27 N. W. 697, where a deed contained the words "excepting timber therein," it was held that the right of the grantor of the land in the timber was not revocable, nor could it be terminated at the will of the owner or grantee of the land, nor by notice to remove the timber. But in Huron Land Co. v. Davison, supra, the court said that they did not feel bound by the language used in the foregoing opinion.

In Wood v. Elliott, 51 Mich. 320, 16 N. W. 666, where the grantee of certain wood and timber was "to have his own time to remove" the same, it was held that a subsequent grantee of the land at the most could only by giving notice to the grantee of the timber require him to remove it within a reasonable time.

Unlimited time inferred from terms of contract.

In a few cases arising in jurisdictions asserting the rule that ordinarily the term of a reasonable time for removal will be inferred, it has been held that the terms of the contract are such that the parties must have contemplated that the owner of the timber should not be limited to a reasonable time to remove the same.

Thus, in Baker v. Kenny, 145 Iowa, 638, 139 Am. St. Rep. 456, 124 N. W. 901, the court held that the language of the contract clearly indicated that the parties intended a perpetual right of entry upon the land for the removal of the timber and "growth of timber thereon," although the contract itself was labeled "bill of sale," and a part of the description in the warranty was of "goods and chattels," and the instrument itself was recorded in the chattel mortgage record. 46 L.R.A. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 578, 9 C. C. A. 659, 27 U. S. App. 1, 61 Fed. 993; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 90,

The court said: "The language of the instrument before us indicates that the parties contemplated the right on the part of defendant and his administrator or assigns to take timber and growth of timber from the described land. There is not only a failure to fix a time limit, but the habendum clause expressly describes the right as one which is to exist forever. It is true in neither the granting clause nor the habendum are the heirs of the grantee mentioned, and at common law the grant would be construed to be for life only. But in this state 'the term "heirs" or other technical words of inheritance are not necessary to create and convey an estate in fee simple.'"

So, in Baxter v. Mattox, 106 Ga. 344, 32 S. E. 94, the deed conveyed the timber and growing trees "suitable for sawmill purposes and being manufactured into lumber now upon, or that may hereafter grow upon," the land, and also conveyed to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, the right and privilege "now and at any and all times hereafter" to enter upon the land for the purpose of cutting such timber. It was held that the terms of the deed clearly manifested an intention on the part of the grantor to convey to the grantee a perpetual right to enter upon the land and cut and remove the timber and trees. The court said: "If it be possible to convey such a license in perpetuity, it would be difficult to conceive how such an intention could be more clearly expressed than it is in this deed."

A deed conveying certain marked and described trees to the grantee, "his heirs and assigns forever," with the full and unreserved right of way over and through the land of the grantor, or any other lands which might thereafter be owned or controlled by him, for the manufacture and removal "at any time" of the grantee's timber, and with the further right of cutting and using "at any time" all timber necessary for the manufacture or removal of the timber purchased, has been held to convey an estate in fee which is not terminated and forfeited by the lapse of a reasonable time before the removal thereof. Georgia Co. v. Bebee, 128 Ga. 563, 57 S. E. 873. The court said: "The grantee's right of entry for the purpose of manufacturing or removing the timber was not limited, but the privilege was indefinite; or, to use the words of the grantor, he could exercise this right 'at any time.' Likewise, the grantee was not in any manner restricted to the time in which he could use other timber belonging to the grantor necessary to manufacture and remove the trees purchased from the grantor's land. If it be possible to frame a conveyance creating an estate in trees with a perpetual right of entry to cut and remove them from the land, this deed has that effect. It may bear harshly upon the owner of the soil, but as it was competent for him to make such a contract as this, he must abide the consequences of his own deed."

And in Cawthon v. Stearns Culver Lumber Co. 60 Fla. 313, 53 So. 738, it was held that as the conveyance was of "all the pine timber suitable for saw logs that there is now or may be hereafter" on the land, "with privilege of free ingress and egress at any and all times" for the purpose of removing the timber, the mere lapse of sixteen years does not terminate the grantee's right to take the timber, no other circumstances of injury or undue advantage being shown. The court said: "While, in a conveyance of growing timber intended to be removed from the land, where no time is specified for the removal, a reasonable time may be implied, to be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the particular case, yet where the conveyance contemplates future growth of at least some of the trees before their removal, and an indefinite right to remove is given, even though an intention to remove the timber appears by the conveyance, the mere passage of time without removal may not of itself, in the absence of injury or undue advantage, terminate the vendee's right to take the timber from the land."

In still other jurisdictions it is held that a conveyance or reservation of timber without condition vests absolute title in the trees, and the courts will not import a provision that the same is to be removed in a reasonable time.

So, in Butterfield Lumber Co. v. Guy, 92 Miss. 361, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1123, 131 Am. St. Rep. 540, 46 So. 79, it was held that where standing timber is real estate, no implied contract of removal within a reasonable time arises from an absolute conveyance of it, noncompliance with which will result in a forfeiture. The court said: "The interest of the purchaser of this timber under his deed has no less claim to the protection of the law than the interest which the seller retains in the soil. The seller of this timber seeks to have the court do that which is in plain conflict with the rights which he has conveyed. By warranty deed he has sold this timber, received money for it, and now seeks to breach his own warranty by a proceeding in an equity court to cancel his deed, and declares that his vendee did not get what he warranted him he would convey. There is no justice nor equity in the contention. If he desired to limit the title which he conveyed, he should have placed it in the contract. If it had been his purpose to grant him a license merely to enter the land and cut the trees, his contract should have been drawn so as to express this intention. Not having done so, it is not for use, at his instance, to give to this contract an intention which deprives the vendee of his property, and is contradictory of the terms of the deed made by the vendor."

In a sale of timber where no time is fixed for its removal, the law implies that it shall be removed within a reasonable time.

In Kentucky, it has been held that it is the law that if timber be excepted in a deed the title remains in the grantor, and if the deed is silent as to the time of removal, and there is nothing in the other provisions of the deed, or the situation of the parties, or the circumstances surrounding them when the deed was executed, to show that a severance of the timber from the land was contemplated, the grantor's title to the timber is not lost or defeated by his failure to remove it in a reasonable time. Ford Lumber Co. v. Cornett, 146 Ky. 457, 142 S. W. 718. It should be noted that this case was an action for the value of the timber.

So, in Hicks v. Phillips, 146 Ky. 305, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 142 S. W. 394, it was held that a grantor who, in conveying his real estate, reserved certain described timber growing upon the property, does not, unless there is something to show that the parties intended that it should be severed from the land, lose his title by failure to remove it within a reasonable time. This was an action by the grantee of the land to quiet title.

But if the timber is sold or reserved in a deed in contemplation of its immediate severance from the soil, then it must be removed within a reasonable time.

What is a reasonable time for the removal, see Morris v. Sanders, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1433, 43 S. W. 733; Gay Mfg. Co. v. Hobbs, 128 N. C. 46, 83 Am. St. Rep. 661, 38 S. E. 26; Hill v. Hill, 113 Mass. 103, 18 Am. Rep. 456.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In July, 1874, John D. Spencer and his wife signed and acknowledged the follow

115 S. W. 794; Hicks v. Phillips, 146 Ky. 305, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) —, 142 S. W. 394; Ford Lumber Co. v. Cornett, 146 Ky. 457, 142 S. W. 718; EASTERN KENTUCKY MINERAL & TIMBER CO. v. SWANN-DAY LUMBER CO.; Hounshell v. Miller, 153 Ky. 530, 155 S. W. 1148; Kentucky Coal & Timber Development Co. v. Carroll Hardwood Lumber Co. 154 Ky. 523, 157 S. W. 1109.

Thus, where the grantor of land reserves to himself all the chestnut oak bark "now growing upon the land," the law will imply an intention to remove the same within a reasonable time, and failure to remove it within fifteen years will forfeit the right thereto. Morris v. Sanders, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1433, 43 S. W. 733.

So, where a deed reserving the timber on the land conveyed provides that the grantor shall have "sufficient" time to remove it, "unavoidable circumstances considered, be what they may," it was held that a reasonable time would be inferred. Siler v. Louisville Property Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 911, 107 S. W. 266.

And where the sale was of all of the timber suitable for staves, and the grantee agreed to cut a certain amount of staves each year, it was held that the contract clearly implied that all the timber would be cut within a reasonable time. Evans v. Dobbs, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 1053, 112 S. W. 667.

In Asher Lumber Co. v. Cornett, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 602, 63 S. W. 974, the grantee of certain timber was given five years in which to remove it, but in case he desired a longer time he would have a right to let the trees stand on the land "until he shall desire to remove them." Such a contract was held to imply that the parties intended that the timber should remain on the land an indefinite time, as it did not contemplate an immediate severance from the soil.

The position of the Minnesota court is not clear.

In Mathews v. Mulvey, 38 Minn. 342, 37 N. W. 794, the court quotes with approval the following statement from an earlier case: "It would be an anomaly in the law that one man should own standing timber on the land of another with no right of ing paper, which for convenience we will call a "deed," and it was duly recorded in the clerk's office of Wolfe county: "Know all men by these presents: That John D. Spencer, of the county of Wolfe, and state of Kentucky, and Rebecca Spencer, wife of John D. Spencer, for and in consideration of \$1, and other considerations hereinafter mentioned, to be paid by Henry C. Howard, W. E. McKinney, A. L. Greer, and John W. Greer, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, do hereby grant, bargain, sell, and convey to the said Howard, McKinney, Greer, and Greer, their heirs and assigns forever, the undivided seven eighths ($\frac{7}{8}$) of the minerals and timber, with the right of way to timber and minerals when the same are being mined and worked. Said tract of land is bounded and described as follows, to wit: . . . The grantor reserves one-eighth interest in the minerals and timber of said land, outside of the seven eighths conveyed, and is to share with grantees, as above mentioned. That is to say, the grantor is to receive one eighth of the net profits of all minerals and timber taken from said tract, so soon as mining operations commence, said grantor also reserving of the timber herein conveyed a sufficient quantity for mill, fuel, and fencing, for his own use on his farm. This deed is not to embrace, or intended to convey, anything but the minerals and timber as stated, and not to interfere with the farming interest of said territory, only so far as is necessary to work and mine minerals and getting out entry to cut and take it away." The decision in this case turns upon other points, but it was said that a sale of all of the pine timber, the grantee "to have as long as he wishes to cut the same, provided he pays the taxes on said land," vests the title at once in the grantee, and the latter would have a right to enter upon the land and cut and remove the timber, "certainly for a reasonable time." The language used would seem to imply that the grantee had a right in perpetuity.

In Texas, contracts for the sale of standing timber which are in the form of a deed, without any reference as to the cutting of the timber, have been held to be conveyances of the timber with an interest in the land with a right to cut at any time, and there will not be imported into the deed the requirement that it shall be cut within a reasonable time. Lodwick Lumber Co. v. Taylor, 100 Tex. 270, 123 Am. St. Rep. 803, 98 S. W. 238; Jones v. Lodwick Lumber Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 99 S. W. 736.

But if the contract deals with the timber as personalty, with provisions in respect to the cutting, etc., it has been held in that state that the purchaser must remove it within a reasonable time, which is to be determined with reference to the circumstances of the particular case.

Weaver v. King, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 98 S. W. 902; Beauchamp v. Williams, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 115 S. W. 130; Montgomery County Development Co. v. Miller-Vidor Lumber Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 139 S. W. 1015.

And this is true although the contract may contain some phrase such as, "as much time as he needs," or "as is convenient."

Houston Oil Co. v. Boykin, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 153 S. W. 1176; Houston Oil Co. v. Hamilton, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 153 S. W. 1194.

How reasonable time is determined.

In determining what would be a reasonable time to be allowed for the removal of the timber from the land, all the facts and circumstances of the case, and the conditions surrounding the parties at the time 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the execution of the contract, should be considered.

Heflin v. Bingham, 56 Ala. 566, 28 Am. Rep. 776; Liston v. Chapman & D. Land Co. 77 Ark. 116, 91 S. W. 27; Garden City Stave & Heading Co. v. Sims, 84 Ark. 603, 106 S. W. 959; *Fletcher v. What is a reasonable time is dependent altogether upon the local condition and the peculiar circumstances of each case. Cherry Lake Turpentine Co. v. Lanier Armstrong Co. 10 Ga. App. 339, 76 S. E. 610.

In Heflin v. Bingham, 56 Ala. 566, 28 Am. Rep. 776, the court, in discussing what is a reasonable time, said: "What is a reasonable time is necessarily dependent on the nature of the service, and is generally a question of fact. It is so in the present case. Still, there are certain rules not to be lost sight of. The use for which the timber is known to be wanted; the custom and rule, if such there be, of felling and removing the timber as the capacity of the mill may require it, if kept reasonably employed,—are among the inquiries which should be made in determining the question of reasonable time. The accident of a failing market, or undue delay in rebuilding the mill after its destruction,—these, and similar disturbances, should exert no influence with the jury. But when the mill was destroyed by fire, a reasonable time was allowed for its reconstruction."

"The facts are to be ascertained by an inquiry into the conditions of the land and timber, the obstacles opposing, and the facilities favoring, and the conditions surrounding, the parties at the time the contract was made. When all the circumstances are considered, and the facts are timber." By regular conveyances, whatever right, title, and interest the grantees had under this deed came into the ownership of the appellant company. John D. Spencer died in 1883, and in 1887-88 his children and heirs at law conveyed a fee simple title to all the land embraced in the boundary mentioned in the above instrument to remote vendors of the appellee company, and by regular conveyance the estate so conveyed came into the possession of appellee. About 1902, the appellee commenced to cut and remove timber from the land, and in 1904 this action was brought by the appellant for an accounting, and to recover from appellee the value of the timber so cut and appropriated. The master commissioner to whom the case was referred reported that determined, the law will declare whether reasonable time has expired for cutting and removing the timber conveyed." Liston v. Chapman & D. Land Co. 77 Ark. 116, 91 S. W. 27.

There should be taken into consideration the terms of the contract and the ascertained intention of the parties (Union Tanning Co. v. Shug, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 647); the character and location of the land, and the accessibility of the land and timber (Earl v. Harris, 99 Ark. 112, 137 S. W. 806; Hall v. Eastman, G. & Co. 89 Miss. 588, 119 Am. St. Rep. 709, 43 So. 2; Union Tanning Co. v. Shug, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 647; Carson v. Three States Lumber Co. 108 Tenn. 681, 69 S. W. 320); the kind and quality of timber (Earl v. Harris, 99 Ark. 112, 137 S. W. 806; Patterson v. Graham, 164 Pa. 234, 30 Atl. 247; Union Tanning Co. v. Shug and Carson v. Three States Lumber Co. supra); the facilities for cutting and removing the timber (Earl v. Harris; Carson v. Three States Lumber Co.; and Patterson v. Graham, supra); the custom or rule for removing the timber according to the capacity of the mill (Heflin v. Bingham, 56 Ala. 566, 28 Am. Rep. 776); and the seasonableness of the weather during the time that has elapsed (Earl v. Harris, supra).

Evidence of sickness and high water is admissible. Jenkins v. Lykes, 19 Fla. 148, 45 Am. Rep. 19.

And the purchaser of the timber is entitled to have taken into consideration the slashy character of the land, wet seasons, and the difficulty of securing workmen, as having prevented a prompt removal of the timber. Garden City Stave & Heading Co. v. Sims, 84 Ark. 603, 106 S. W. 959 (three years held not unreasonable in this case).

No account should be taken of the time elapsing between a conveyance of timber and a subsequent conveyance to a third person of the land subject to the timber deed, in determining whether a reasonable time has elapsed since the execution of the timber deed, as against a successor in interest of the grantee in such subsequent deed. Liston v. Chapman & D. Land Co. 77 Ark. 116, 91 S. W. 27.

the appellant was entitled to recover $4,852, as the value of seven eighths of the timber cut and appropriated by appellee. Afterwards, upon considering the case on exceptions to the commissioner's report, the lower court entered a judgment dismissing the petition, and as a result this appeal is prosecuted.

A number of reasons are advanced by counsel for the contesting parties in support of and in opposition to the judgment of the lower court; but we have reached the conclusion that the controlling decisive question in the case is whether the deed executed by Spencer should be treated, as contended by counsel for appellant, as conveying to the grantees therein an unconditional fee simple interest in the timber and min-

Likewise, the time during which the grantee of the timber has by injunction been prevented from operating upon the premises should be excluded. Carson v. Three States Lumber Co. 108 Tenn. 681, 69 S. W. 320.

But no consideration should be given to the convenience or inconvenience, the ability or inability, of the grantee, caused by or resulting from the magnitude and extent of its business, and numerous other contracts for timber to which the grantor is not a party. Young v. Camp Mfg. Co. 110 Va. 678, 66 S. E. 843.

And the nonconstruction of a proposed railroad in contemplation of which one purchased certain timber and mineral rights near the proposed line does not relieve the grantee from the consequences of failing to remove the timber and materials within a reasonable time. EASTERN KENTUCKY MINERAL & TIMBER CO. v. SWANN-DAY LUMBER CO.

What is a reasonable time, the facts being agreed, is within the province of the court to determine. Gilmore v. Wilbur, 12 Pick. 120, 22 Am. Dec. 410.

A witness will not be allowed to give his opinion as to what is a reasonable time. Brinson v. Kirkland, 122 Ga. 486, 50 S. E. 369.

Where a contract of sale of standing timber expressly gives a reasonable time to cut the same, parol evidence is not admissible to show that by "reasonable time" was meant the time which might elapse before a sale of the land by the grantors, the possibility of the sale having been mentioned between the parties before the timber contract. Jenkins v. Lykes, 19 Fla. 148, 45 Am. Rep. 19.

Inasmuch as the question of what is a reasonable time for exercising the privilege granted in a deed of timber not specifying any time for its removal is one of fact to be determined in the light of all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, and inasmuch as these will necessarily be widely variant in different cases, it cannot be determined with reference to any local custom of usage, unless such cuserals, or, as insisted by counsel for appellee, as only conveying to the grantees the right to the timber and minerals upon the condition that they commenced within a reasonable time to convert it into salable or manufactured products. If the deed conveyed the fee absolutely, the appellant should succeed; but if it only granted the fee with the condition annexed that the grantees should begin operations within a reasonable time, the judgment below was correct.

Having this view of the question of law that controls the case, it is important at the outset to get a clear understanding of the facts, not only in their relation to the parties at the time the contract was executed, but subsequently, as these facts will furnish valuable aid in getting at the intention of the parties, and assist materially in the proper construction of the deed. And it is a well-settled principle in the law of contracts that, when the instrument in question is fairly susceptible of more than one construction, it is admissible to have the aid of all pertinent extrinsic facts and circumstances that will throw light on the intention of the parties in its execution, and enable the court to carry out their purpose as expressed in the writing. As was said in Lexington & B. S. R. Co. v. Moore, 140 Ky. 514, 131 S. W. 257: "In the construction of all contracts, the intention of the parties making the contract, if it can be arrived at from a consideration of the instrument, must control, and in aid of what tom or usage is so general and universal as to have become necessarily by implication a part of the contract, which will not arise unless the custom is one which can be reasonably applied to the particular transaction under investigation. Goette v. Lane, 111 Ga. 400, 36 S. E. 758.

What constitutes a reasonable time is not to be determined by the will of the grantor. McNair & W. Land Co. v. Adams, 54 Fla. 550, 45 So. 492; Patterson v. Graham, 164 Pa. 234, 30 Atl. 247.

A contract for the sale of timber which stipulates that the vendee shall cut and remove the same as expeditiously as possible requires that he begin to cut and remove the timber promptly after the contract is made, and that he continue to cut and remove the same expeditiously from that date until it is all cut and removed; and a further provision of the contract that he shall pay the taxes if he fails to remove the timber within five years does not relieve him from the consequences of failing to start and continue the work with due expedition. Earl v. Harris, 99 Ark. 112, 137 S. W. 806.

If there are any special extrinsic facts or circumstances tending to limit the period within which the trees should be removed in order to take them within a reasonable time, the burden of proving them is upon the party asserting a termination of the estate. Shippen Bros. Lumber Co. v. Gates, 136 Ga. 37, 70 S. E. 672.

So, where a defendant claiming timber privileges produces the oldest recorded deed conveying such privileges, the burden is on the opposite party to show that such interest has terminated, unless the period which the grantees had for removing this timber is so short or so long as to warrant the court in saying as a matter of law whether a reasonable time for its exercise has not expired. Brinson v. Kirkland, 122 Ga. 486, 50 S. E. 369.

And the court cannot determine as a matter of law whether a reasonable time has expired or not, except in extreme cases where the period is very short or very long. Brinson v. Kirkland, 122 Ga. 486, 50 S. E. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

369. Ordinarily the question is for the jury. Earl v. Harris, 99 Ark. 112, 137 S. W. 806; Jenkins v. Lykes, 19 Fla. 148, 45 Am. Rep. 19; Goette v. Lane, 111 Ga. 400, 36 S. E. 758; Allison v. Wall, 121 Ga. 822, 49 S. E. 831; Shippen Bros. Lumber Co. v. Gates, 136 Ga. 37, 70 S. E. 672; Snyder v. East Bay Lumber Co. 135 Mich. 31, 97 N. W. 49; Beauchamp v. Williams, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 115 S. W. 130.

In Boults v. Mitchell, 15 Pa. 364, the court, in an obiter statement which recognizes the right of the owner of the land to take trees under a conveyance by giving a reasonable notice, said that whether or not a notice is reasonable is a question for the jury under all the circumstances of the case, taking into consideration the contract, the intention of the parties at the time they entered into it, the kind, quality, and quantity of timber; its locality and proximity to a stream of water; the quantity of land from which it is to be removed; and in fact all the circumstances that surround the transaction at the time it occurred.

What constitutes reasonable time.

The right of a parol licensee to remove timber from a tract of 8 acres is lost by a failure to remove the same within three years, where the contract specified no time for removal. Hill v. Hill, 113 Mass. 103, 18 Am. Rep. 455.

A grantee of timber above a certain size, by a contract giving him five years to remove the same, "said term to commence from the time said party of the second part begins to manufacture said lumber into wood or lumber," loses his right by failing for thirteen years to begin cutting. Gay Mfg. Co. v. Hobbs, 128 N. C. 46, 83 Am. St. Rep. 661, 38 S. E. 26 (obiter), followed in Bunch v. Elizabeth City Lumber Co. 134 N. C. 110, 46 S. E. 24.

A delay of thirteen years in starting to cut and remove was held in Dolan v. Baker, 10 Ont. L. Rep. 259, to be unreasonable, and to warrant an injunction against cutting after that time.

the parties intended it is admissible in the construction of many contracts that are on their face free from ambiguity, to consider their situation and the circumstances and conditions surrounding them at the time the contract was entered into,—not for the purpose of modifying or enlarging or curtailing its terms, but to shed light upon the intention of the parties. And the intention of the parties thus gathered will prevail unless it does violence to the meaning of the contract as written. Page, Contr. § 1123; Kauffman v. Raeder, 54 L.R.A. 247, 47 C. C. A. 278, 108 Fed. 171; Smith v. Kerr, 108 N. Y. 31, 2 Am. St. Rep. 362, 15 N. E. 70; Hildrith v. Forrest, 4 J. J. Marsh. 217. In other words, if a written contract, when viewed from the standpoint of the parties at the time it was executed, can be made to carry out their intention as expressed in the writing, the court will adopt the construction that will accomplish this end."

Fortunately there is little dispute about

A license to cut wood upon the lot of another, when not acted upon within fifteen years, is not taken advantage of within a reasonable time, and will not authorize the person to whom it is given thereafter to cut down and carry away wood. Gilmour v. Wilbur, 12 Pick. 120, 22 Am. Dec. 410.

Where a grantor of land reserved to himself all the chestnut oak bark "now growing upon the land," it was held that the grantor's failure to remove the same for fifteen years forfeited the right. Morris v. Sanders, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1433, 43 S. W. 733.

Where a reservation of timber gives the grantor of the land a sufficient time to remove the same, "unavoidable circumstances considered, be what they may," a delay of sixteen years to take any steps toward removing the timber, after the grantor of the land had secured a right of way by which to remove it, forfeits the right. Siler v. Louisville Property Co. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 911, 107 S. W. 266.

Twenty years is an unreasonable time where there has been no effort made to remove the timber. Ward v. Moore, — Ala. —, 61 So. 303.

So a delay of fifty years has been held to be unreasonable. Goodson v. Stewart, 154 Ala. 660, 46 So. 239.

Where the purchaser's agent testifies that he told the vendor at the time of making of the deed of standing timber, that the vendee would operate the timber as soon as he could get railroad facilities, eight years after a railroad was built near the property, the same having been built two years after the contract was made, afforded the purchaser a reasonable time to exercise his right, and having failed to do so, he forfeited it. McNair & W. Land Co. v. Parker, 64 Fla. 371, 59 So. 959.

A purchaser who five years after the contract enters and commences cutting and removing the timber, continuing to do so for 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the material facts. The land described in the deed was at the time of its execution practically all wild, uncultivated, uninclosed mountain land. The nearest railroad was some 40 miles away, and there were no navigable streams convenient that would lend any assistance in the transportation of timber or minerals that might be obtained. The mountainous condition of the surrounding country, the great distance from railroad facilities, and the lack of water means of transportation, produced a present condition that made the timber and minerals on the land of little or no value for commercial purposes, or indeed for any purpose. There was no local demand for timber or minerals, and in the absence of transportation facilities no incentive to attempt to put these products on the market. Spencer, the grantor, was a man of intelligence and good business capacity, and although he lived some nine years after the instrument was executed, it does not appear that he

three years, when he stops and removes his mill, even if he does not thereby abandon his right, loses the same by failure within eleven years thereafter to remove the timber. Patterson v. Graham, 164 Pa. 234, 30 Atl. 247.

Eleven years will be held an unreasonable delay in beginning to cut timber, where it appears it was 3½ miles from the railroad, and that for three of the eleven years there has been a sawmill at a like distance; that no local demand would have ever exhausted the lumber; and that three years before the expiration of the eleven years a near-by mill owner offered to purchase the timber and cut it immediately. Houston Oil Co. v. Boykin, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 153 S. W. 1176.

Thirteen years was declared to be an unreasonable length of time in Gay Mfg. Co. v. Hobbs, 128 N. C. 46, 83 Am. St. Rep. 661, 38 S. E. 26, where the price for the timber was but $200 and the grantor was to pay all of the taxes upon the land.

Delay for thirty years to remove timber and coal, as a matter of law, forfeits the right thereto under a grant the consideration for which moving to the grantor was a specified share of the net profits of working the timber and mines. EASTERN KENTUCKY MINERAL & TIMBER CO. v. SWANN-DAY LUMBER CO.

But it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that fifteen years is an unreasonable time, where the deed shows an intention not to require the removal of the timber as early as it could be removed in the ordinary course of business, by its recital that a part of the consideration is to be paid when the second party removes the timber, and that there may be a delivery of the timber by loading the logs upon the cars of a certain railroad, "or upon any other railroad that may hereafter be built," and that the grantor will make deliveries to the grantee made any complaint of the failure of the grantees to begin the development of the natural resources that they had purchased. At the time the writing was executed, there were strong indications that a railroad would be constructed through or in the immediate vicinity of the land. A route was then being surveyed, and the grantees, who were interested in building the road, doubtless believed, as did Spencer, that it would only be a short time until a railroad would be in operation to this body of land. But, for reasons not necessary to notice, the contemplated railroad was abandoned, and it was not until some sixteen years afterwards, or about 1890, that a railroad was built by other parties on the route that was being surveyed in 1874, and then for the first time the timber and minerals, particularly the timber, became valuable. For the reasons suggested, during the sixteen years, from 1874 to 1890, no steps whatever of any kind or character were taken by appellant or its vendors to sell or manufacture any timber from the land or develop its mineral resources. It is a further admitted fact that, although the railroad was opened in 1890, neither the appellant nor any of its predecessors in title made any effort to take possession of the property that it claims was granted by the instrument, or to do anything towards converting into money the timber and minerals conveyed. Indeed, not until 1904, when this suit was brought, thirty years after the deed was executed, did the appellant or any of its vendors take any action in relation to the property, or exercise any acts of ownership whatever over the property, or pay any taxes on it, or take any steps towards asserting right, title, or interest in it. The delay in failing to take any action before 1890 is excused upon the ground that, as no railroad was built until then, nothing could have been done towards the development of the property, and, as it remained undisturbed,

"at such times and in such quantities as the second party may direct." Shippen Bros. Lumber Co. v. Gates, 136 Ga. 37, 70 S. E. 672.

A finding that two years and a half was a reasonable time for the removal of white oak timber standing on 60 acres of land will not be disturbed on appeal, where it is based on evidence on the one hand that there was so much rain during those years that the ground was kept in such a soft condition that the timber could not be hauled from the land, there being only two or three months in each of these years that any hauling could be done, and on the other hand that all the white oak timber on the land could have been cut and hauled away with one set of hands and one team within four or five months, and that there were that many months in each of the years suitable for hauling. Oates v. Yeargin, — Ky. —, 115 S. W. 794.

And three years is not an unreasonable delay in removing 150,000 feet of timber from a 7-acre tract, where it appears that the purchaser's mill has a capacity of five or six thousand feet per day, and that the tract of land was located in a river bottom and was accessible only during a small part of each year. Beauchamp v. Williams, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 115 S. W. 130.

And where a deed provides that the grantee shall have a certain time to remove the timber after beginning to cut the same, but that he shall not be limited as to the time in which he shall commence to cut, a delay of seven years in beginning operations after the expiration of the specified time will not be held to work a forfeiture, where the grantor made no effective protest or complaint concerning the delay until the bringing of the suit. Brown v. Surry Lumber Co. 113 Va. 503, 75 S. E. 84. In this case the court allowed one year after the termination of the suit for the removal of the timber.

Where the grantors stipulated in their conveyance that the purchasers of the timber and mill should have a lease of the mill site for five years, and longer if necessary, but were to pay a reasonable rental after five years, such stipulation affords a clear inference that the parties estimated a reasonable time within which to cut and remove the timber would not be less than five years. Warren v. Ash, 129 Ga. 329, 58 S. E. 858.

In Carson v. Three States Lumber Co. 108 Tenn. 681, 69 S. E. 320, it was held that ten years should be deemed a reasonable time to remove fifteen to eighteen million feet of timber, where the land was low and swampy and subject to overflow from the Mississippi river, and the only practical means of getting the lumber out at the time was to take advantage of periodic overflows, and such overflows occasionally failed to be sufficient to float the lumber, and the evidence of witnesses qualified as having long and large experience in such work varied from six to thirteen years as a reasonable time to remove the lumber. The court called attention to the fact that there were some cases which held that the title remains in the grantee after the time of limitation has passed, though without legal right on his part to enter; and that there were other cases which simply announced that mere lapse of time does not affect the title of the grantee, his right of entry not being involved in litigation; and, on the other hand, that there were cases holding that the title of the grantee terminates with his right of entry. But the court did not have to pass upon this question in the Carson Case, since it was determined that a reasonable time for the removal of the lumber in question had not at that time expired.

W. M. G.

there was no occasion for assertion of interest or title upon its part. The inaction after 1890 is attempted to be justified upon the theory that in 1887-88 the Spencer heirs sold the property, and so there was no reason for asserting ownership until some overt act of trespass was committed; and it is said that the appellee did not commence to appropriate the timber until 1902, and that, within a reasonable time thereafter, this action was brought to assert its rights.

It is not controverted that the predecessors in title of the appellee company, and the purchasers from the children and heirs of John D. Spencer in 1887-88, knew of the existence of the writing he had executed in 1874. It had been put to record, and whether the purchasers from the Spencer heirs or their vendees had actual notice of it or not, they were charged with the constructive notice arising from the fact that it was of record, and so there is no claim on the part of the appellee that it was a purchaser without notice of the previous sale by Spencer. With this statement of the facts, let us now see whether the deed should be treated as vesting in the grantees of John D. Spencer an absolute or only a conditional title.

It will be noticed that Spencer conveyed to the grantees seven eighths of the mineral and timber on the land, reserving to himself one eighth, and that the only consideration Spencer was to receive for the conveyance of this large estate was one eighth of the net profits of all minerals and timber taken by the grantees from the land. It is true there is a consideration of $1 acknowledged by Spencer; but this is a mere nominal consideration, and entitled to no weight in determining the amount of the consideration that it was contemplated by the parties should be paid by the grantees for the valuable interests granted. The real, and indeed only, consideration was the obligation upon the part of the grantees to give to Spencer one eighth of the profits. This was the only material inducement that could have influenced Spencer to enter into the contract. While not doubting that the owner of land has a right to dispose of it or any severable interest therein as he pleases, and for what he pleases, and to take such consideration as he chooses to accept, whether it be great or small, or payable in cash or in instalments or in royalties, it is nevertheless a matter of first importance, in the construction of contracts like this, to understand the real consideration to be paid for the property conveyed. In an attempt to ascertain whether a deed like this was intended by the parties to be conveyed in fee simple, or only a contract or lease under which the grantees must begin operations within a reasonable time, there is no feature entitled to more weight than the one relating to the consideration and the manner of its payment. There is and should be a marked difference between the construction and effect of a conveyance of timber and minerals, or indeed any interest in land, for a stipulated consideration, payable in cash or in secured notes or in some other valuable property, and the construction and effect of a conveyance in consideration of a royalty or per cent, to be paid out of the income derived by the grantees from the property conveyed. In other words, if Spencer for a recited consideration of $1,000—assuming that to have been adequate—had conveyed to the grantees all the timber and minerals in the tract of land, he would have parted by this conveyance with all right, title, and interest in the timber and minerals, and no delay in the development of the property on the part of the grantees would have conferred upon Spencer or any person claiming under him the right to forfeit the contract, or to insist that it had been abandoned. Nor would any effort to convert such a conveyance into a license or lease be approved by the courts. Such a contract would be a fully executed instrument. Nothing would remain to be done by either of the parties. All the title and interest that Spencer had would have passed out of his control, and the grantees would have the right to do with the property as they pleased, or as any other owner of the whole estate would have the right to do with it. When the consideration has been fully satisfied, and the grantor has parted with his estate, the transaction between the parties is a closed incident. The grantor has no further interest or concern in the property conveyed. But a very different situation is presented when the only consideration the grantor is to receive is a per cent of the profits the grantee may realize from the development of the estate. Under such a contract the consideration is a continuing one, to be paid only by the labor of the grantee in the development of the property. The grantor has a continuing interest in the estate conveyed, the transaction between the parties is not a closed incident, and the grantee is not at liberty to do with the property as he pleases. He cannot use or fail to use it to the prejudice of the grantor, who has rights that must be respected.

Looking now at the instrument in question, in connection with the situation of the parties, the circumstances surrounding them at the time it was executed, and the subsequent conduct of the grantees, it is obvious that it was an implied condition of the contract that the grantees should within a reasonable time begin operations so that the grantor might receive some consideration for the estate he had parted with. To adopt the view of this contract insisted on by counsel for appellant would be to place it absolutely and without limitation in the power of the grantees to hold the property for an indefinite time or forever without paying to the grantor anything whatever for the privilege. In other words, the grantor would be placed in the attitude of having conveyed to the grantees all the timber and minerals on seven eighths of a large body of land, without receiving any consideration until it might suit the convenience or interest of the grantees to undertake the development of the property, and this they might delay for ten, twenty, fifty, or even one hundred years. In the meantime, pending this inaction, the grantor would be deprived of the right to use or control the property conveyed, or realize anything from it, as well as denied the right to dispose of it. We do not think any court should give to a contract like this such a construction as would place it in the power of the grantee, without any loss, outlay, or disadvantage, to take, keep, and hold indefinitely valuable property rights in the manner attempted in this case.

It is strongly insisted, however, that this deed conveyed the fee in the timber and minerals described, and as there is no stipulation in the instrument as to when the grantees shall commence the development of the property, and no condition reserving to the grantor the right to re-enter or enforce a forfeiture for inaction on the part of the grantees, however long it may continue, the grantor must be left without remedy or redress. It is true that the contract does not expressly or in terms impose any conditions upon the grantees, or mention when, if at all, the development of the property is to begin. But the court will not be hindered in its purpose to give to a contract like this a construction that will carry out the manifest intention of the parties by the mere omission of conditions that perhaps would have made plainer the purpose of its execution. We will read into the contract such terms and conditions as the contract and the circumstances surrounding its execution warrant us in assuming were in the minds of the parties when it was entered into. So interpreting it, we are well satisfied that it should be read as if there had been inserted in it, in apt terms, a condition imposing upon the grantees the duty of beginning within a reasonable time, under pain of forfeiture or abandonment, the development of the estate 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) granted. Nor is there anything novel to the law in this method of interpretation. The books are full of cases in which the courts, to prevent gross injustice, have gathered from the contract and the circumstances surrounding its execution the intention of the parties, and construed it to carry out their purpose, although in so doing it was found necessary to supply omissions. In a note to Chauvenet v. Person, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 417, the editor, in a review of the cases upon this subject, states the result of his investigation as follows: "Generally, all leases of land for the exploration and development of minerals are executed by the lessor in the hope and upon the condition, either express or implied, that the land shall be developed for minerals; and it would be unjust and unreasonable, and contravene the nature and spirit of the lease, to allow the lessee to continue to hold under it any considerable length of time without making any effort at all to develop it according to the express or implied purpose of the lease; and, in general, while equity abhors a forfeiture, yet, when such a forfeiture works equity, and is essential to public and private interests in the development of minerals in land, the landowner, as well as the public, will be protected from the laches of the lessee, and the forfeiture of the lease allowed, where such forfeiture does not contravene plain and unambiguous stipulations in the lease."

In Shenandoah Land & A. Coal Co. v. Hise, 92 Va. 238, 23 S. E. 303, the court, in a case very similar to this, said in substance that, although there was no covenant in a mining lease on the part of the lessee to mine the minerals in the land thereby conveyed, yet where, by the terms of the lease, the only compensation the lessor received was a portion of the minerals mined, in order to give effect to the lease, it would be so construed that the acceptance of it by the lessee would constitute an agreement on his part to mine the minerals to be found in the property within a reasonable time, and if he failed to do this, equity would, at the instance of the lessor, cancel the agreement. To the same effect are Bay State Petroleum Co. v. Penn Lubricating Co. 121 Ky. 637, 87 S.W. 1102; Berry v. Frisbie, 120 Ky. 337, 86 S. W. 558; Breckenridge Asphalt Co. v. Richardson, 147 Ky. 834, 146 S. W. 437; Aye v. Philadelphia Co. 193 Pa. 451, 74 Am. St. Rep. 696, 44 Atl. 555, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 177; 2 Page, Contr. § 1123; Hawkins v. Pepper, 117 N. C. 407, 23 S. E. 434; Tennessee Oil, Gas & Mineral Co. v. Brown, 45 C. C. A. 524, 131 Fed. 696; Adams v. Gre Knob Copper Co. (C.

In Snyder on Mines, vol. 2, § 1136, the author states that in the construction of mining deeds and contracts, "the intent of the parties is generally to govern, where that can be gained either from the instrument itself and the surrounding circumstances, or from parol testimony admitted within the general rules." And it is further said that "the consideration is important as governing the intention of the parties."

Nor do we find anything in Hicks v. Phillips, 146 Ky. 305, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 142 S. W. 394, in conflict with the view we have expressed. In that case, after a full review of the authorities, we held that where the grantor in a deed conveying land reserved the timber on a specified part of the land, and there was nothing in the other stipulations of the contract, or in the situation of the parties or the circumstances surrounding them at the time the contract was executed, to show that a severance of the timber from the soil was contemplated, the title to all the timber then standing on the land specified remained in the grantor, and was not lost or defeated by his failure to cut and remove it within a reasonable time. The essential difference between that case and this is that there the grantor did not sell or convey the timber in question. Undoubtedly, the grantor of the fee has the right to sell so much of the estate as he pleases, and retain so much of it as he pleases; and it is no concern of the grantee what the grantor does with the estate that he has not conveyed. In such a state of case, the contract is fully executed by both parties. Nothing remains to be done by either. But, even where there is a reservation such as existed in the Hicks Case, there might be, as we said in the opinion, extrinsic facts and circumstances indicating that it was contemplated by the parties that the timber should be removed within a reasonable time, so that the grantee might get the full benefit of the land he had purchased.

Assuming, now, that the grantee in contracts like the one we are considering is to begin operations within a reasonable time, and that in the absence of any express condition to this effect such an agreement will be implied, the question of what is a reasonable time is not really involved in this case. It is obvious that a reasonable time in which operations should have commenced had expired many years before any action was taken by the appellate company, and that, under a fair and just construction of the contract, the grantee must be deemed to have abandoned its rights under the lease long before the institution of this action. When the grantee in a contract like this will be deemed to have abandoned his rights is generally a question of fact to be determined by the circumstances of each particular case. But if the reasonable time doctrine is to be applied in any case, it would be difficult to conceive of a case presenting stronger reasons than this one does for its application.

We do not regard the conveyance by the Spencer heirs as a matter of any importance in determining the principles that must control this case. The case might well be treated as if John D. Spencer was yet living, and in 1902 had cut and removed the timber, and this action had been brought against him. In this contest with the vendee of Spencer, the appellant occupies no better position than it would in a contest with Spencer himself, and the appellee holds the same place as Spencer would if living, and he had done as it is claimed it did.

Of course, if the grantees had taken the fee, no question of abandonment could arise. The unconditional owner of the fee cannot be divested of his estate merely by nonuser. There is no such thing known to the law as nonuser of the fee amounting to an abandonment in the sense that the owner will lose his estate. The owner of the fee has the right to use or not use it as he pleases. He is not required to exercise any acts of physical ownership to hold or preserve his title. And, if the grantees in the Spencer deed had acquired the unconditional fee, we would have no difficulty in sustaining the contention of the appellant.

It is further insisted that, if the contract obliged the grantees to begin operations within a reasonable time, the remedy of the grantor upon their failure was a suit for damages, or for specific performance, or to forfeit the lease. We readily admit that the grantor in contracts like this has the option to resort to these remedies or any of them; but the fact that he does not resort to either does not preclude him from relying upon an abandonment of the contract by the grantee. In other words, where nonuser or inaction has worked an abandonment, the grantor may re-enter and take possession of the premises as if no conveyance had been executed. There is no sound reason why he may not peaceably obtain possession of his property without resorting to other remedies given by the law. He has the right to peaceably and quietly do that which the judgment of the court would give him the right to do. His entry does not prejudice the rights of the grantee; as, if it is wrongful, he may be successfully proceeded against as a trespasser.

We may with much propriety consider the sale of the property by the heirs of Spencer as an entry upon their part, indicating a purpose to take possession upon the theory that the grantees had abandoned whatever rights they acquired under the deed. The title and possession of the property upon the death of Spencer came into the possession of his heirs, and at the time it was sold by them the long nonaction of the grantees in the Spencer deed had worked a forfeiture of any title or interest they may have had in the estate.

It is also suggested that, as the railroad contemplated in 1874 was not built, the doctrine of reasonable time should not be applied, as under the admitted facts the property conveyed could not be developed. But if the belief that the road would be built was one of the moving causes that induced the execution of the contract, the fact that it was not built furnishes strong reason why the contract should be treated as abandoned. Manifestly the grantee in a case like this should not be allowed to postpone beyond a reasonable time the performance of implied conditions upon the ground that a prospective railroad had not been built. If a contrary rule was adopted, the grantor would be made the victim of conditions that he did not make and could not control, and the grantee become the sole beneficiary of a situation that put it out of his power to perform the conditions that influenced the grantor in making the contract.

Upon a consideration of the whole case, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

FRED A. BURKHART.

(154 Ky. 92, 157 S. W. 18.)

Conflict of laws — action on foreign statute — limitation period.

The statute of limitations of the forum

Note. — Law governing limitation where action is brought in one state upon a cause of action created by a statute of another.

As to duty of Federal courts to follow state decisions as to the effect and construction of state statutes of limitation, see note in 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 421.

governs in an action in one state for a personal injury based on a statute of another state, which does not prescribe the limitation period.

(May 28, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henderson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Yeaman & Yeaman and C. H. Moorman, for appellant:

In respect to limitations of actions the law of the forum governs.

Minor, Conf. L. § 210; 25 Cyc. 1018; Lewis's Sutherland Stat. Constr. § 668; Graves v. Graves, 2 Bibb, 209, 4 Am. Dec. 697; Bennett v. Devlin, 17 B. Mon. 358; Farmers' & T. Bank v. Lovel, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 261, 1 S. W. 426; Templeton v. Sharp, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 499, 9 S. W. 507, 696; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Pointer, 113 Ky. 960, 60 S. W. 1108; McArthur v. Goddin, 12 Bush, 275; Adams Exp. Co. v. Walker, 119 Ky. 126, 67 L.R.A. 412, 83 S. W. 106; The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 214, 30 L. ed. 362, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140.

Mr. Benjamin D. Warfield also for appellant.

Messrs. F. J. Pentecost and J. W. Johnson for appellee.

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Fred A. Burkhardt, a bridge carpenter, while in the employ of the appellant, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and at work upon one of its railroad bridges in Vanderburgh county, Indiana, fell therefrom a distance of 14 feet to the ground below, whereby his collar bone was broken and back strained, resulting in serious and permanent injury to his person.

The accident occurred September 1, 1910, and on August 23, 1912, this action to recover damages therefor was brought by him against appellant in the Henderson circuit court; it being alleged in the petition that both appellant and appellee are residents of Kentucky; appellee being a citizen of the city of Henderson and appellant having been incorporated under the laws of Kentucky.

Many states have enacted statutes on the question as to the effect that foreign statutes of limitation shall have in suits within their respective jurisdictions; see note in 48 L.R.A. 625; and as to the construction of such statutes when they permit the lex loci to be pleaded in bar of the action, see notes to Doughty v. French, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1029, and to Bruner v. Martin, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.)

having its chief office in the city of Louisville, and owning a railroad running from the city of Louisville through the county and city of Henderson to Evansville, Indiana. It is alleged in the petition that appellee's injuries were caused by the negligence of appellant and its bridge foreman in furnishing him a defective jackscrew not reasonably safe for use, the rod of which slipped from its place while he was using it to raise a bridge timber, causing him to lose his equilibrium and fall to the ground.

The action was based upon a statute of Indiana which makes the employer liable in damages to the employee for an injury sustained by the latter by reason of the employer's negligence in furnishing him a defective tool or machinery for use in work required of him. Yet another statute of that state, also pleaded by appellee, provides that an action to recover damages for personal injuries may be brought at any time within two years next after the cause of action accrues. The answer traversed the affirmative matter of the petition, except its averments as to appellant and appellee being residents of Kentucky, alleged contributory negligence on the part of appellee, and pleaded the statute of limitations of Kentucky which bars an action for the recovery of damages for a personal injury, unless brought within a year after the injury is received. The issues were completed by the filing of a reply which controverted the pleas of contributory negligence and limitation. The trial resulted in a verdict award-

776. Cases determined by reason of such statutes are not included in the present note.

The general rule is that where the lex loci i. e., the limitation statute of the state where the cause of action arose, simply bars the right of action, only the remedy is affected; hence the lex fori, i. e., the limitation statute of the jurisdiction where suit is brought, will govern; but, with an exception as to residence, if the lex loci avoids the liability, then the substance of the cause is affected; hence the lex loci will govern. See notes in 48 L.R.A. 625, and 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 658.

It will be seen by the cases cited infra that this general rule, in the absence of a statute changing it, applies where the cause of action is created by a statute of the state where it arose, and is not confined to causes of action arising by virtue of the common law. An apparent exception exists in cases where the same statute that creates a cause of action not known to the common law, also imposes the time limitation; but it will be seen infra that the exception is only apparent, for the reason that such limitations affect more than the remedy.

The holding in LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co. v. BURKHART is in harmony with this general rule. The lex loci simply created a bar to the right of action in general terms, but did not destroy the cause of action. Although the cause of action was created by a statute of the state in which it arose, yet it was governed as to enforcement by the lex fori just as if it had been a common-law action. This holding is supported by the following cases in which the cause of action was also created by a statute, which did not impose a limitation operating as a condition of the right of action. O'Shields v. Georgia P. R. Co. 83 Ga. 621, 6 L.R.A. 152, 10 S. E. 268; Montague v. Cummings, 119 Ga. 139, 45 S. E. 979; Pulsifer v. Greene, 96 Me. 438, 52 Atl. 921; Hurley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 675; Williams v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 123 Mo. 573, 27 S. W. 387; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Sizemore, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 491, 116 S. W. 403; Morgan v. Camden & A. R. Co. 18 W. N. C. 128; Boyd v. Clark, 8 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

St. Rep. 725, 57 Pac. 171, the question was as to what law governed the time when the limitations begin to run, but they indirectly lend support to the proposition here considered.

But a limitation prescribed by a statute creating a cause of action not known to the common law will govern wherever the action is brought under the statute, as against the lex fori; at least when the period prescribed by the foreign statute is shorter than the period prescribed by the lex fori, since the limitation is a condition upon which the right of action is given, and by necessary implication affects the substance of the cause. This principle is supported by Selma, R. & D. R. Co. v. Lacey, 49 Ga. 106; Eastwood v. Kennedy, 44 Md. 563; Ross v.

ing appellee $200 damages, and from the judgment entered thereon this appeal is prosecuted.

The record does not contain the evidence nor instructions, and the single question presented for decision by the appeal is, Do the pleadings support the judgment? In other words, does the limitation of two years, prescribed by the statute of Indiana, or that of one year, prescribed by the statute of Kentucky, apply? If the latter statute should control, it is manifest that the trial court erred in refusing the peremptory instruction directing a verdict for appellant, which was asked by its counsel at the conclusion of appellee's evidence and again after all the evidence was introduced.

As previously stated, it appears from the petition that the action was instituted only seventeen days short of two years after appellee's injuries were received, and it is therein alleged that "the law of the state of Indiana also provides that a suit for damages resulting from said injury may be instituted at any time within two years from the date of said injury." The answer of appellant denies the applicability of the Indiana statute of two years, and, in the third paragraph, pleads the Kentucky statute of one year; therefore the question of limitation was one upon which the evidence threw no light, but a question of law, to be determined from the admitted facts presented by the pleadings. Waiving the question whether the Indiana statute of limitations was sufficiently pleaded by ap-

This doctrine, although the facts did not necessitate a holding thereon, was recognized in O'Shields v. Georgia P. R. Co. 83 Ga. 621, 6 L.R.A. 152, 10 S. E. 268; *Montague v. Some courts have reached the same result by holding that in such case the limitation in the statute is a method of procedure prescribed by the state where the action is given; that in order to enforce such law the court enforcing it must follow the procedure prescribed in the statute; and that such statutes are not properly classed with limitation statutes. See Grove Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Stockton, 148 Pa. 146, 23 Atl. 1063; Hutchinson v. Ward, 192 N. Y. 375, 127 Am. St. Rep. 909, 85 N. E. 390; Dennis v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 70 S. C. 254, 106 Am. St. Rep. 749, 49 S. E. 869; Hudson v. Bishop, 32 Fed. 519, s. c. on rehearing in 35 Fed. 820.

The rule that the time limitation contained in a statute creating a cause of action will be applied in another jurisdiction, being only a rule of construction under the general rule stated at the beginning of this note, cannot be a hard-and-fast rule, decisive in all cases. Hence, it has been held that even though the limitation is contained in a separate section of the statute that creates the cause of action, it will not be applied in a foreign jurisdiction if evidently it is not specifically directed to the cause of action therein created (Gregory v. Southern P. Co. 157 Fed. 113); but if it is so directed, it will be applied even though it is contained in another section (Negaubauer v. Great Northern R. Co. 92 Minn. 184, 104 Am. St. Rep. 674, 99 N. W. 620, 2 Ann. Cas. 150; Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 48 L.R.A. 625, 40 C. C. A. 22, 99 Fed. 635, writ of certiorari denied in 178 U. S. 611, 44 L. ed. 1215, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1029), or even in another statute (Davis v. Mills, 194 U. S. 451, 48 L. ed. 1067, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 692).

With the exception of the cases subsequently discussed, it appears in the cases applying to the limitation prescribed by the statute of the state where the cause of action arose, that the period prescribed by that statute was shorter than the period prescribed by the law of the forum; so that the application of the general rule that limitation is governed by the lex fori would have resulted in the enforcement of a cause of action that had been extinguished by the lapse of time prescribed by the statute of pellee, it can have no effect in this state. It is a well-recognized rule that statutes of limitation are of state regulation and founded on state policy. Such statutes, therefore, have no extraterritorial force or operation, for which reason foreign jurisdictions are not bound by them; hence the doctrine in respect to limitations of actions is that the law of the forum governs; and this is true whether the action is ex contractu or ex delicto. Minor, Conf. L. § 210; 25 Cyc. 1018.

The doctrine is thus stated in Lewis's Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 668; "And ordinarily courts disregard the limitation fixed in the contract or tort, and enforce only the lex fori."

Necessarily statutes of limitation affect the remedy, and not the right; and, as argued by counsel for appellant, they are as much a part of the remedy as are our forms of pleading, our rules of evidence, and our manner of conducting trials; hence the Indiana statute of limitations can have no more operation in this state upon the one than upon the other.

The rule to which we refer has always been the law in Kentucky, and, among the earlier cases approving it, is that of Graves v. Graves, 2 Bibb. 209, 4 Am. Dec. 697, in the opinion of which it is said: "The statute of limitations does not affect the validity of the contract, but the time of enforcing it; or, in other words, it does not destroy the right, but withholds the remedy. It would seem to follow, therefore, that the lex fori, and not the lex loci, was to prevail with respect to the time when the ac-its creation. In this connection the interesting question arises whether the limitation prescribed by the foreign statute creating the cause of action will govern to the exclusion of a shorter limitation prescribed by the law of the forum. As the exception to the general rule referring the question of limitation to the lex fori rests upon the ground that the prescription of the foreign statute does not relate to the remedy merely, but imposes a condition upon the cause of action itself, whereby it is extinguished when the prescribed period has run, it may be doubted whether the exception should apply if the period prescribed by the foreign statute has not expired, but the shorter period prescribed by the law of the forum has expired.

Upon this hypothesis the question presented seems to be merely one as to remedy, and therefore to fall within the general rule that the lex fori governs as to limitation as a part of the remedy. Concededly this general rule will apply and prevent an action at the forum upon a cause of action which would be barred by the statute of limitations of the forum, although it would not by that of the state where it arose, if it is a common-law cause of action, or even a cause of action created by a statute which does not prescribe any special limitation. It is one thing to hold that a cause of action cannot be enforced in any jurisdiction after the expiration of the time limited by the statute creating it, even though it would not be barred by the statute of limitations of the forum, and quite another to hold that the court of the forum will entertain an action upon a cause of action not barred by the statute of its creation, if it would be barred by the statute of limitations of the forum. It is not apparent that there is any greater obligation under the principles of comity resting upon the court of one jurisdiction to enforce a cause of action created by a statute of another, which prescribes a limitation that has not yet expired, if the action would be barred by the law of the forum, than there is in case of a concededly existing cause of action at common law, or under a statute of another jurisdiction which prescribes no special limitation.

It may be that when the law of the forum is consulted, the limitation prescribed by the statute of the forum in relation to causes of action like the one involved in this case will be found inapplicable because it relates only to causes of action arising at the forum. But even so, it is still possible that there may be a general statute at the forum applicable to foreign as well as domestic causes of action, which prescribes a shorter period than that fixed by the foreign statute. If there is no general or special limitation at the forum applicable to foreign causes of action of the kind involved, the action may doubtless be entertained, assuming that the cause of action has not been extinguished by the expiration of the period prescribed by the foreign statute. But that result upon the present hypothesis may be attributed to the fact that there is no limitation at the forum applicable to the case, rather than to the predominance of the lex loci over the lex fori.

The view that the general rule which refers the question of limitation to the lex fori will apply if the cause of action would be barred by the law of the forum, but not by the foreign statute, even assuming that the limitation prescribed by the foreign statute would prevail if it were shorter than that prescribed by the law of the forum, was adopted, argumentatively at least, in Weaver v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 21 D. C. 499. The court in that case, while conceding that if the time limited by a foreign statute creating a cause of action for death has expired, no action can be maintained, although the statute of the forum allows a longer period, nevertheless stated, in effect, that if the forum has a statute of limitations, properly so called, that fixes a shorter period, the action cannot be maintained after the expiration of that period, although the period fixed by the foreign statute has not expired. It was held in this case, however, that the limitation prescribed by the statute of the forum creating a right of action for death only applied to causes of tion should be commenced." The later cases show no departure from this rule; among these are the following: Bennett v. Devlin, 17 B. Mon. 358; Farmers' & T. Nat. Bank v. Lovel, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 261, 1 S. W. 426; Templeton v. Sharp, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 499, 9 S. W. 507, 696; John Shillito Co. v. Richardson, 102 Ky. 52, 42 S. W. 847; Labatt v. Smith, 83 Ky. 599,—in each of which it was held that the statutory bar of the state where the remedy is sought to be enforced by action, and not of the state where the contract was made, governs. In a more recent case (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Whitlow, 114 Ky. 470, 43 S. W. 711), quoting with approval from Herrick v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 13, 47 Am. Rep. 771, 16 N. W. 413, we said: "The statute of another state has, of course, no extraterritorial force, but rights acquired under it will always, in comity, be enforced, if not against the public policy of the laws of the former. In such cases the law of the place where the right was acquired, or the liability was incurred, will govern as to the right of action, while all that pertains merely to the remedy will be controlled by the law of the state where the action is brought; and we think the principle is the same, whether the right of action be ex contractu or ex delicto."

In the still more recent case of Adams Exp. Co. v. Walker, 119 Ky. 126, 67 L.R.A. 412, 83 S. W. 107, we find this expression of the same conclusion: "It is insisted for appellant that, the contract here having been made in Wooster, Ohio, it must be governed by the laws of Ohio; and that by action arising at the forum, and that if there was any statute of limitation of the forum applicable to the case, it was the general statute which allowed a period exceeding that fixed by the foreign statute.

It may be observed that in the cases cited at the beginning of the note which apply the general rule that the lex fori governs where the foreign statute creating the cause of action does not prescribe a special period of limitation, the courts must have found, either in the general statute of limitation of the forum, or in the special statute of the forum relating to similar causes of action, some limitation applicable to the cause of action in question, notwithstanding its foreign origin.

The view now under consideration is also sustained, argumentatively at least, in Hutchings v. Lamson, 37 C. C. A. 564, 96 Fed. 720, an action brought in Illinois to enforce a stockholder's liability under the Kansas statute, where the court said: "The general rule is that, in respect to the limitation of actions, the law of the forum governs; and while the courts will enforce a limitation established under the law of another state, when applicable, it does not do so to the exclusion of the law of the forum. It would involve serious and possibly absurd consequences if it were established that a right of action created and governed by the law of Kansas could be enforced in Illinois after the time when, by the law of the latter state, the action had been barred. The cases cited show that the law of Kansas, if applicable, will be enforced in Illinois, but they do not say nor imply that a like or different limitation by the statute of Illinois may not apply." The apparent assumption in this case that the period fixed by the Kansas statute, if shorter than that fixed by the statute of Illinois, would control, was probably unwarranted in view of the express decisions to the contrary in other cases, resting upon the ground that the limitation is one prescribed by the general statute, and not by the statute creating the cause of action (see Dexter v. Edmonds, 89 Fed. 467; Whitman 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Citizens' Bank, 49 C. C. A. 122, 110 Fed. 503; Schiffer v. Columbia College, 87 Fed. 166). However, that fact does not materially affect the intrinsic force of the distinction made by the court. See also Platt v. Wilmot, 193 U. S. 602, 48 L. ed. 809, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 542, where the court, applying the general principle that the lex fori governs as to the limitation, without discussing the question whether or not the limitation prescribed by the Kansas statute should be regarded as a condition of the cause of action, held that the three-year period prescribed by the New York Code of Civil Procedure for actions against directors or stockholders to enforce a common-law or statutory liability was applicable to an action to enforce the double liability of stockholders under the Kansas statute.

However, it has been expressly held that the limitation prescribed by a statute creating a cause of action will govern when it prescribes a longer as well as when it prescribes a shorter period than that fixed by the statute of the forum. Thus, in Theroux v. Northern P. R. Co. 12 C. C. A. 52, 27 U. S. App. 508, 64 Fed. 84, it was held that an action for death under a Montana statute could be brought in a Federal court sitting in Minnesota at any time within three years, the period allowed by the Montana statute, although the limitation prescribed by the Minnesota statute for similar actions is two years. The court, in support of its decision, said: "To refuse to entertain such a suit within three years would be to subtract from the liability, and to impair the right intended to be conferred by the laws of Montana; for the period allowed in which to enforce the liability, as we have before shown, is a substantial part of the liability imposed and of the right intended to be created." It may be suggested in reply to this argument that the refusal to entertain the cause of action, conceding that it was still an existing one under the statute by which it was created, would no more subtract from the liability or impair the right intended to be conferred by the foreign statute, than the application of the limitation the laws of Ohio such a limitation is valid. Limitation is governed by the law of the forum in which the suit is brought, and the courts of this state will not, as a matter of comity, enforce a contract made in Ohio as to the time when the suit shall be brought, for this is regulated by our statutes."

Section 2516, Kentucky Statutes, fixes the limitation in such a case as the one at bar and is quite emphatic in its declaration that "an action for an injury to the person of the plaintiff . . . shall be commenced within one year next after the cause of action accrued, and not thereafter."

It is true, as argued by appellee's counsel, there are some exceptions to the limitation it declares, but they have no application to this case; the exceptions are found, however, in § 2541 (misnumbered 2451) and § 2542.

prescribed by the law of the forum subtracts from the liability or impairs the right intended to be conferred by a statute of another state, which does not prescribe any period of limitation at all; in which case it is conceded that the limitation prescribed by the lex fori governs.

In Negaubauer v. Great Northern R. Co. 92 Minn. 184, 104 Am. St. Rep. 674, 99 N. W. 620, 2 Ann. Cas. 150, it was also held that the Montana limitation of three years rather than the Minnesota limitation of two years governed a cause of action for death arising under the Montana statute. Apparently, however, the distinction now under discussion was not urged, the defendant relying upon the contention that the Montana statute did not itself fix the time within which the action must be brought. Moreover, the court in this case took the position that the limitation prescribed by the Minnesota death statute was necessarily inapplicable to a cause of action originating in another state, since the limitation was confined to causes of action originating in Minnesota. It may be, therefore, that in spite of the statement in the opinion that the limitation fixed by the statute of Montana applied to the cause of action, the decision should be really regarded as resting upon the ground that there was no limitation at the forum applicable to the case, or at least, none that prescribed a period of less than three years. See Weaver v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 21 D. C. 499.

In Brunswick Terminal Co. v. National Bank, 48 L.R.A. 625, 40 C. C. A. 22, 99 Fed 635, it was also assumed, but without discussion, that the principle applied conversely, so as to permit the action to be maintained if the time limited by the foreign statute has not expired, though the time limited by the law of the forum has expired. As in the Negaubauer Case, however, the question discussed was merely whether the principle applied where the limitation was not incorporated in the statute which created the right, but in a stat-

Section 2541 provides: "When, by the laws of any other state or country, an action upon a judgment or decree rendered in such state or country cannot be maintained there by reason of the lapse of time, and such judgment or decree is incapable of being otherwise enforced there, an action upon the same cannot be maintained in this state, except in favor of a resident thereof, who has had the cause of action from the time it accrued." Obviously this section has no application to the case in hand, for it is not an action upon a judgment or decree.

Section 2542 provides: "When a cause of action has arisen in another state or country between residents of such state or country, or between them and residents of another state or country, and by the law of the state or country where the cause of action accrued an action cannot be maintained ute of limitations directed to the right of action; and the distinction under discussion was apparently not suggested.

In view of the comparatively few reported cases in which the courts have had occasion to pass upon the question when the limitation prescribed by the foreign statute was longer than the period prescribed by the law of the forum, and of the failure of some of those cases to recognize the possibility of a distinction, the point can hardly be regarded as settled. As already stated, it is not apparent why the doctrine that the limitation prescribed by the foreign statute which creates the right of action is a condition of the right of action, so that the latter is extinguished when the time so prescribed has expired, and will not thereafter sustain an action anywhere, should exclude the operation of the general rule which refers the question of limitation to the lex fori if the period prescribed by the foreign statute has not expired. The reason for the departure from that rule when the foreign statute creating the cause of action prescribes a period shorter than that fixed by the statute of the forum, namely, that the limitation is a condition of the cause of action, so that the latter is extinguished when the period has run, seems entirely lacking when the statute of limitations of the forum prescribes a shorter period than the foreign statute; and the court is merely called upon to apply the general rule that it will not entertain an action which is barred by the statute of the forum, although an action is not barred by the law of the state where the cause of action arose. Such an application of the rule does not impair or affect the cause of action itself, but merely withholds the remedy in the particular jurisdiction, leaving the parties free, at least, apart from the possible effect of res judicata, to enforce the cause of action in the state of its creation, or in any other state where limitation has not run.

J. W. M.; G. H. P.

thereon by reason of the lapse of time, no action can be maintained thereon in this state." It is equally obvious that this section can afford appellee no relief, for it only applies to a case where the action is barred by the law of the state where it arose; as held in Labatt v. Smith, 83 Ky. 599, it has no reference to residents of this state, but to those who are nonresidents of the state and come into it in order to enforce their rights; the object of the statute being to prevent one of them from having an advantage over the other.

Nor do we think the case of John Shillito Co. v. Richardson, 102 Ky. 51, 42 S. W. 847, relied on by appellee, has any application. The parties were both nonresidents of Kentucky; the plaintiff residing in Ohio and the defendant in New York, to which state he had removed from Ohio. The action was brought in Kentucky, but the cause of action arose in Ohio. The defendant answered, pleading the statute of limitations of Kentucky, but by reply the plaintiff pleaded the Ohio statute of limitations which had not barred the cause of action when the defendant removed from Ohio to New York, and, under the laws of Ohio, did not run while he remained in New York. So, as the case was one between citizens of other states, upon a cause of action which arose in Ohio and had not been barred by the statute of limitations of that state, and the statute would have interposed no bar if the action had been brought in Ohio, it was properly held that the action could be maintained in Kentucky. In other words, the case was one to which § 2542, Kentucky Statutes, was clearly applicable.

The case at bar, however, is wholly different, for both appellant and appellee were, when the cause of action arose, and have since remained, residents of this state; hence, although the cause of action arose in Indiana, § 2542 does not apply, but the case must be controlled by § 2516, Kentucky Statutes, which requires such an action to be brought within a year next after the cause of action arose. If the statute of Indiana, which gives the right of action attempted to be asserted by appellee, had prescribed the time within which the action to enforce the right must be brought, quite a different question from the one we have would have been presented, for in that case the limitation as to time would have to be treated as a part of the right, and be governed by the same law that creates the right. But the Indiana statute in question does not prescribe the period of limitation; it is instead found in another and general statute of that state; therefore it has no force outside of that state, and such limitation cannot be applied in Kentucky.

As said by Mr. Minor in his Conflict of Laws, § 210: "But if the period of limitation is not prescribed by the same statute which confers the right, but is found in a general statute, the general principle applies, and it becomes a law relating to the remedy, which will have no extraterritorial force. In such case the law of the situs of the remedy (lex fori) again becomes the 'proper law.'" Cooley, Const. Lim. 3d ed. 361; The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 30 L. ed. 358, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140; McArthur v. Goddin, 12 Buah, 274.

This question was considered and elaborately discussed in O'Shields v. Georgia P. R. Co. 83 Ga. 621, 6 L.R.A. 152, 10 S. E. 268, and by the Georgia supreme court held that, where a right of action is given by a statute of another state, and no period of limitation is prescribed otherwise than by the general law of limitation prevailing in that state, the lex fori, not the lex loci, applies on the subject of limitation.

Here the appellee's petition shows a common-law right of recovery; the fact that he needlessly set forth a statute of Indiana, which does not prescribe the period of limitation, will not enable him to evade the Kentucky law as to the limitation, which necessarily controls; therefore the peremptory instruction asked by the appellant should have been given.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with the opinion.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

HANNAH E. PIERCE, Admr., etc., of Hannah T. Baker, Deceased,
v.

STATE NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON.

(215 Mass. 18, 101 N. E. 1060.)

Limitation of action — certificate of deposit — demand.

Demand must be made for payment of a certificate of deposit payable without interest on return of the certificate properly indorsed, within the time limited for bringing an action upon such certificate.

(May 24, 1913.)

Note. — The question when limitation begins to run against an action on a certificate of deposit is considered in the note to Re Gardner, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 685.

Generally as to when limitation begins to run against an action on a contract payable on demand, see the note to Fallon v. Fallon, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 486.

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for the opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to enforce payment of a certificate of deposit. Bill dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Eugene B. Jackson for complainant.

Messrs. H. M. Aldrich and Edwin G. McInnes, for respondent:

The certificate is presumed to have been paid.

A demand must be made within a reasonable time.

The obligation in suit is not an evidence of indebtedness issued by a bank; it is, at most, an obligation to assume and pay such an indebtedness. The statute applicable is therefore the ordinary six-year statute.

Hinsdale v. Larned, 16 Mass. 65; Baker v. Atlas Bank, 9 Met. 182; Com. v. Co-chituate Bank, 3 Allen, 42; Stebbins v. Scott, 172 Mass. 356, 52 N. E. 535.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity to collect the amount of a certificate of deposit issued in 1850, on which a demand for payment was made thirty-six years later (to wit, on November 27, 1895), but not before, and where the suit to collect was begun forty-seven years later (March 7, 1906). The present suit had its origin in a writ dated March 7, 1906, which by leave of court was amended into this bill in equity. It is based on the claim that the State Bank which issued the certificate (by name The Hide and Leather Bank) was reorganized under the same name as a United States bank (and so liable for the debts of the state bank under the rule applied in Atlantic Nat. Bank v. Harris, 118 Mass. 147), and that later the National Hide and Leather Bank became consolidated with the defendant bank on terms which made that bank liable for its debts.

The certificate is in the following words:

Certificate of Deposit. $1,324.

Boston, July 19, 1859.

Jacob Chase, Esq., has deposited in the Hide and Leather Bank thirteen hundred twenty-four no/100 dollars payable on the return of this certificate, to his order indorsed on the same.

[Signed] J. S. March, Cashier.

The word "Original" appeared printed or written across the face of the certificate.

It was decided in Shute v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 136 Mass. 487, that while a certificate of deposit has for the most part the incidents of a promissory note it differs from a promissory note payable on demand in at least one respect; namely, it is not overdue until after a demand for payment is made, and so it is not subject in the hands of a subsequent holder to a set-off of notes due from the original payee, under Gen. Stat. chap. 53, §10. For subsequent cases as to certificates of deposit, see Hunt's Appeal, 141 Mass. 515, 6 N. E. 554; Schmidt v. People's Nat. Bank, 153 Mass. 550, 27 N. E. 595.

The purpose and use of certificates of deposit (using that term in the proper sense) is to transmit funds and make payments. In this respect certificates of deposit are like certified checks. See for example Merchants' Nat. Bank v. State Nat. Bank, 10 Wall. 604, 648, 19 L. ed. 1008, 1019, where the two are classed together. An example may be found in a case where a person has occasion to make a payment in his own city or town, or to transmit funds to another city or to another country. He does not want to carry or send gold or notes which are a legal tender. Again, he cannot expect his own check to be taken in payment. Under these circumstances he deposits in a bank the sum to be paid or transmitted, and procures a certificate of deposit (in the form set forth above), or he draws his check and procures it to be certified by the bank, or he procures a cashier's check on a bank in the place where the payment is to be made. Then, by indorsing the certificate of deposit, the certified check, or the cashier's check, to the person to whom he wishes to make the payment or transmit the money, he effects his object with ease and safety. It is apparent from this that the function performed by a certificate of deposit is one which contemplates a presentation of it for payment within a short time. The bank has the use of the money deposited so long as the certificate is outstanding, while the person who holds the certificate gets no interest on the sum it represents. The general rule, therefore, is applicable; namely, that the time within which a demand must be made is the time limited for bringing an action. Campbell v. Whoriskey, 170 Mass. 63, 67, 48 N. E. 1070; Downer v. Squire, 186 Mass. 189, 71 N. E. 534;

Whitney v. Cheshire R. Co. 210 Mass. 263, 96 N. E. 676. The plaintiff has contended that the period of limitation applicable to a certificate of deposit issued by a bank is fixed by Rev. Laws chap. 202, § 1, at twenty years, and not by Rev. Laws chap. 202, § 2, at six years. It is not necessary to decide whether this be so or not; no demand was made until thirty-six years after the date of the certificate; in either event the demand was too late.

There are to be found in the books instances where instruments have been issued in the form of certificates of deposit payable on demand, which serve a different purpose and are subject to a different rule. These are certificates which are issued for money borrowed and which carry interest. An instance is to be found in McGough v. Jamison, 107 Pa. 336. There the deposit was made in "Parker's Savings Bank," and a certificate like the certificate here in question was issued, which bore interest at 5 per cent "if left six months." The purpose of a negotiable receipt for money borrowed is a continuing loan of money. Although the paper issued in that and similar instances is in its terms like a certificate of deposit, it is, speaking with accuracy, a negotiable receipt for money borrowed, and not a certificate of deposit. The transaction is in substance the same as that in Campbell v. Whoriskey, 170 Mass. 63, 67, 48 N. E. 1070, and the result to be reached is not affected by the fact that the person with whom the deposit was made as an investment issued a negotiable receipt payable with interest, in place of a non-negotiable one, as was done in Campbell v. Whoriskey. For these reasons the same conclusion was reached in McGough v. Jamison that was reached in Campbell v. Whoriskey; namely, that the general rule did not apply, and consequently that it was not necessary to make a demand within the statutory period for bringing an action. Finkbone's Appeal, 86 Pa. 368, on the authority of which McGough v. Jamison was decided was in substance a similar case.

It follows that the bill must be dismissed, with costs.

zen of that state from prosecuting a suit against another citizen of the same state in the courts of another state, if necessary to prevent an inequitable advantage; but litigants are seldom restricted to the courts of their own state, and, to justify enjoining the prosecution of a foreign suit, begun before any proceedings were taken in the home courts, it must appear that the foreign suit will result in evading the effect of some local law, or in securing some other inequitable advantage, or in imposing some inequitable disadvantage.

(May 29, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Rock County, enjoining the prosecution of an action in another suit upon certain promissory notes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. A. J. Daley, for appellant:

The general allegation in the complaint, that plaintiff's witnesses live in Minnesota, is wholly insufficient to call for the injunctive order of the court.

White v. Caxton Book-Binding Co. 10 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 146; Durant v. Pierson, 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 203, 12 N. Y. Supp. 145.

All the complaint really alleges is that it would be more convenient for plaintiff to try his case here. That is no cause for an injunction.

Bank of Bellows Falls v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 28 Vt. 470; Donnelly v. Morris, 27 Jones & S. 557, 36 N. Y. S. R. 78, 13 N. Y. Supp. 427.

A mere difference in the rules of evidence in the two states is not cause for injunction.

Edgell v. Clarke, 19 App. Div. 199, 45 N. Y. Supp. 979; Carson v. Dunham, 149 Mass. 52, 3 L.R.A. 203, 14 Am. St. Rep. 397, 20 N. E. 312.

Mr. E. H. Canfield for respondent.

Taylor, C., filed the following opinion: According to the complaint, one Kubach, in September, 1908, by a fraudulent trick, induced plaintiff to write his name upon four pieces of paper, which now appear as promissory notes. The complaint is drawn to bring the case within the provisions of § 2747, Rev. Laws, 1905, and sets forth facts which, if true, show that, by virtue of that section of the Code, plaintiff has a complete defense against the notes, even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser. It is not claimed that defendant, the present owner of the notes, at the time he obtained them, had any knowledge of the fraud by which they were originally procured. It further appears from the complaint that the notes were signed at Luverne, Minnesota, and by their terms are payable at that place; that both plaintiff and defendant have been residents of Minnesota for many years, and reside at Luverne; that plaintiff made a visit to Germany in the latter part of the year 1911, and on returning from such visit in February, 1912, he landed in the state of New Jersey; that immediately after he had landed, defendant commenced a suit against him in the state to recover the amount of these notes; that plaintiff answered in the New Jersey action, and it is liable to be brought on for trial at any time; that any judgment that may be rendered against plaintiff in New Jersey cannot be collected there, for the reason that he has never had any property in that state; and that nearly all his property is in Rock county, Minnesota. The complaint also asserts that the witnesses necessary to establish plaintiff's defense reside in Rock county, Minnesota; but no witnesses are named, and no facts are stated to which they will testify. The complaint further asserts that the action is brought in New Jersey to deprive plaintiff of the benefit of § 2747, Rev. Laws, 1905, and to prevent him from making his defense; but no facts appear, other than the distance between Minnesota and New Jersey, from which such an inference may be drawn. The judgment asked is that the notes be surrendered for cancelation, and that defendant be enjoined from further prosecuting any action upon them in the courts of New Jersey or elsewhere.

Note. — For injunction against action or proceeding in foreign jurisdiction, see notes to Thorndike v. Thorndike, 21 L.R.A. 71, and O'Haire v. Burns, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 267, and other annotation referred to in the later note. See also the later case of Jones v. Hughes, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 502.

Upon the complaint, without any other affidavits or evidence upon either side, the trial court granted a temporary injunction restraining defendant from further prosecuting the New Jersey action until the termination of this action. From the order granting this injunction, defendant appeals.

That the courts of a state may, in a proper case, enjoin one citizen of the state from prosecuting a suit against another citizen of the state in the courts of a sister state, is well settled, and is supported by numerous authorities. Hawkins v. Ireland, 64 Minn. 339, 58 Am. St. Rep. 534, 67 N. W. 73; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269, 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 421; Rader v. Stubblefield, 43 Wash. 334, 86 Pac. 560, 10 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Ann. Cas. 20, and note at page 27. "The question is, Under what circumstances will a court of equity restrain a party from invoking the aid of the courts and processes of another state? It certainly will not do that simply to compel him to carry on his litigations at home. It will not act upon the basis of any distrust of the courts of a sister state." Brewer, J., in Cole v. Young, 24 Kan. 435.

To warrant such an injunction, some sufficient ground for the interposition of a court of equity must be shown. Perhaps the most common ground for such action is that the prosecution of the foreign suit, if permitted, would result in evading some law that applies in the state in which the parties reside. Courts will intervene where a suit is brought in a foreign court to evade exemption laws, or where a creditor, proceeding in the foreign jurisdiction, would secure a preference forbidden by the state of his residence, or perhaps where an action in the state of residence was prior in time, or, as said in Hawkins v. Ireland, 64 Minn. 339, 58 Am. St. Rep. 534, 67 N. W. 73, "whenever the facts of the case make such restraint necessary to enable the court to do justice, and prevent one citizen from obtaining an inequitable advantage over other citizens." Ordinarily the court that first obtains jurisdiction retains it, and other courts will not interfere. That it may be inconvenient to go to the foreign state to try the suit does not justify such interference. Donnelly v. Morris (Super. N. Y.) 27 Jones & S. 557, 13 N. Y. Supp. 427. "To justify equitable interposition, it must be made to appear that an equitable right will otherwise be denied the party seeking relief." Royal League v. Kavanagh, 233 Ill. 175, 84 N. E. 178; Thorndike v. Thorndike, 142 Ill. 450, 21 L.R.A. 71, 33 Am. St. Rep. 90, 32 N. E. 510; Carson v. Dunham, 149 Mass. 52, 3 L.R.A. 203, 14 Am. St. Rep. 397, 20 N. E. 312; Wyeth Hardware & Mfg. Co. v. H. F. Lang & Co. 54 Mo. App. 147, affirmed by supreme court in 127 Mo. 242, 27 L.R.A. 651, 48 Am. St. Rep. 626, 29 S. W. 1010; Boyd v. Hawkins, 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 329. See also Bank of Bellows Falls v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 28 Vt. 470; Spreckles v. Hawaiian Commercial & Sugar Co. 117 Cal. 377, 49 Pac. 353; Burgess v. Smith, 2 Barb. Ch. 276; Home Ins. Co. v. Howell, 24 N. J. Eq. 238.

In the present case the New Jersey suit is prior in time, and plaintiff shows no equitable ground upon which the courts of Minnesota can intervene to stop the progress of that suit. The only basis for his application is that the notes are Minnesota contracts; that both parties and the plaintiff's witnesses, if he have any, reside in Minnesota; and that plaintiff has no property in New Jersey. There is nothing to show that the laws of New Jersey differ in any respect from those of Minnesota, or that he will not receive, in that state, the full benefit of the Minnesota statute upon which he relies. As said in Edgell v. Clarke, 19 App. Div. 199, 45 N. Y. Supp. 979: "Unless we are prepared to say that, in all cases where two residents of this state have a dispute, we will compel them to litigate questions at issue between them in the courts of this state alone, and prevent them by injunction from appealing to the courts of any other jurisdiction, we would not be authorized to interfere in this action." Had suit been brought in Minnesota in advance of the New Jersey suit, it might, perhaps, furnish a basis for an injunction. But the New Jersey suit was brought before the present action, and, so far as the record shows, is the only suit ever brought anywhere to enforce these notes or any of them.

Plaintiff had been abroad, and it is not shown that defendant knew he was returning to Minnesota. Plaintiff does not show that he has any witnesses in Minnesota who can testify to anything material at the trial. There is no showing that New Jersey is not the most convenient place of trial for defendant and his witnesses, if he have any, nor that other legitimate reasons do not exist for bringing the suit in that state. If the suit had been commenced in a remote county of the state of Minnesota, instead of in New Jersey, a motion for a change of venue, based on the ground of convenience of witnesses, would hardly be granted upon the showing here presented.

We are not to be understood as holding that an injunction may not issue where the facts presented show that a trial of the suit in the foreign court will impose an unreasonable burden upon the defendant, and that it is brought in a distant state for the purpose of compelling the defendant to forego his defense, or incur unreasonable and unnecessary expense, and not for any legitimate reason. But the burden is upon one who seeks an injunction to present facts which justify its issuance. No case has been cited by counsel in which an injunction has been issued upon such a state of facts as is here presented, and after a somewhat extended search we have been unable to find any such case.

Order reversed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

GULLEDGE BROTHERS LUMBER COMPANY, Resp't.,

v.

WENATCHEE LAND COMPANY, Appt.

(122 Minn. 266, 142 N. W. 305.)

Criminal law — penal statute — what is.

1. The question whether a statute of one state, which in some aspects may be called penal, is a "penal law" in the international sense, so that it cannot be enforced in the courts of another state, depends upon the question whether its purpose is to punish an offense against the public justice of the state, or to afford a private remedy to a person injured by the wrongful act.

Same — revenue act — enforcement out of state.

2. Plaintiff is a corporation created under the laws of the state of Washington. The statutes of Washington require corporations to pay an annual license fee, and provide as a penalty for nonpayment of such fee that no corporation in default thereof shall be permitted to maintain any action in the courts of that state. Plaintiff was in default of payment of such license fee when this action was brought. The supreme court of Washington has construed these statutes as revenue acts pure and simple, and has held that the provisions thereof are for the purpose of enabling the state to enforce the payment of its revenue, and that a corporation in default does not forfeit the right to exist, but continues to be a corporation until a forfeiture is adjudicated by proper proceedings in a proper court. Held, that the purpose of the acts is to punish an offense against the public justice of the state of Washington, that they are of the class of penal acts which will not be enforced outside of the state where they were enacted, and that plaintiff may maintain an action in this state.

Corporation — dissolution — action in other state.

3. The principle that a corporation which has been dissolved by proper proceedings in the state of its creation could not there-

Note. — GULLEDGE BROS. LUMBER CO. v. WENATCHEE LAND CO. seems to be a case of first impression as to the extraterritorial recognition of a statute of the domicile which prohibits a corporation from suing. The decision is in harmony with the general rule that a penal statute of one state will not be enforced by the courts of a sister state.

As to enforceability in Federal court or court of another state, of a contract made by a foreign corporation which has not complied with the conditions of doing business within the state, see note to Strampe v. Minnesota Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 999.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Arthur W. Selover and Brooks & Jamison, for appellant:

The act of counsel in commencing this action in the name of the corporation was a nullity, the corporation having lost its right and franchise to sue under the law of the state of its creation.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff was incorporated under the laws of the state of Washington in September, 1903. This action was commenced June 4, 1909, to recover damages for breach of a contract. The complaint states a cause of action. Gullede Bros. Lumber Co. v. Wenatchee Land Co. 111 Minn. 418, 127 N. W. 395, 923.

Defendant in its answer pleaded, by way of abatement, that plaintiff was incapacitated from commencing and maintaining this action by reason of its failure to pay an annual license tax imposed by the laws of the state of Washington. After plaintiff rested its case, the court heard defendant's evidence under its plea in abatement and plaintiff's evidence in reply. The court decided in defendant's favor on this plea and ordered the action dismissed.

The facts found by the court are, in substance, as follows:

That the statutes of the state of Washington have for some years contained a provision that every corporation incorporated under the laws of that state shall, on or before the 1st day of July of each and every year, pay to the secretary of state, for the use of the state, a license fee, and the further provision that "no corporation shall be permitted to commence or maintain any suit, action, or proceeding in any court of this state, without alleging and proving that it has paid its annual license fee last due," and that "it shall be the duty of the secretary of state to strike from the records of his office the names of all incorporations which have neglected for a period of two years to pay their annual license fees. . . ." Rem. & Ball. Code, §§ 3714, 3715.

It is further found by the court that plaintiff defaulted in the payment of said license fees for the years 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, and 1908, and was in default of the payment of said license fees at the time of the commencement of this action, June 4, 1909; that on account of nonpayment of said license fees plaintiff could not have commenced and could not have maintained this action in the courts of the state of Washington, and, as conclusions of law from these facts, the court found that plaintiff could not commence and maintain this action in Minnesota. A motion for a new trial was granted on the ground that the statute mentioned is penal in its nature and cannot be enforced in this state, and is therefore no defense to this action. Defendant appeals.

The order granting a new trial must be affirmed.

1. It is sometimes stated in general terms that the courts of one state will not enforce the penalties imposed by another state (Cook, Corp. § 223; Story, Conf. L. §§ 620, 621; Wharton, Conf. L. 3d ed. § 4); that penal laws are strictly local, and cannot have any operation beyond the jurisdiction of the state or country where they were enacted (Scoville v. Canfield, 14 Johns. 338, 340, 7 Am. Dec. 467). This is perhaps too broad a statement of the rule. A statute penal in its nature may create an obligation in favor of a private individual. Obligations of this sort will be enforced in any jurisdiction. Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 36 L. ed. 1123, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Fitzgerald v. Weidenbeck (C. C.) 76 Fed. 695; Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. § 4776.

The true rule, as we conceive it to be, is laid down in Huntington v. Attrill, supra. Mr. Justice Gray said: "The question whether a statute of one state, which in some aspects may be called penal, is a penal law in the international sense, so that it cannot be enforced in the courts of another state, depends upon the question whether its purpose is to punish an offense against the public justice of the state, or to afford a private remedy to a person injured by the wrongful act."

In harmony with the same principle, it was said in Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 32 L. ed. 230, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370: "The rule that the courts of no country execute the penal laws of another applies not only to prosecutions and sentences for crimes and misdemeanors, but to all suits in favor of the state for the recovery of pecuniary penalties for any violation of statutes for the protection of its revenue, or other municipal laws."

In that case a statute imposing a penalty upon any insurance company of another state doing business in Wisconsin without having deposited with the proper officer of the state a full statement of its property, and of its business done during the previous year, was held in the strictest sense a penal statute. See also Henry v. Sargeant, 13 N. H. 321, 332, 40 Am. Dec. 146.

The distinction above mentioned is further exemplified by the language of Lord Watson in Huntington v. Attrill, 8 Times L. R. 341, as follows: "In its ordinary acceptation, the word 'penal' might embrace penalties for infractions of general law, which did not constitute offenses against the state; it might, for many legal purposes, be applied with perfect propriety to penalties created by contract; and it, therefore, when taken by itself, failed to mark that distinction between civil rights and criminal wrongs which was the very essence of the international rule." It is there further said: "The rule had its foundation in the well-recognized principle that crimes, including in that term all breaches of public law punishable by pecuniary mulct or otherwise, at the instance of the state government, or of someone representing the public, were local in this sense, that they were only cognizable and punishable in the country where they were committed,"—cited with approval in Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 681, 36 L. ed. 1123, 1132, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224, 233.

2. Applying these principles, it seems clear that the statutes of Washington in question are of the class of penal acts which will not be enforced outside of the state where they were enacted. These statutes have been construed by the supreme court of that state. State ex rel. Preston Mill Co. v. Howell, 67 Wash. 377, 121 Pac. 861. That case arose as follows: The original act contained a provision that a corporation, whose name has been stricken from the records of the office of the secretary of state for failure to pay its license fee, may apply to said official for reinstatement at any time within six months thereafter, and upon payment of all license fees and of an additional penalty, it may be reinstated; but if such application is not made within such period of six months, the secretary of state shall enter upon his records a notation that such corporation is dissolved, and it shall thereupon be dissolved, and the trustees of such corporation shall hold the title to the property of the corporation for the benefit of its stockholders and creditors, to be disposed of under appropriate court proceedings. In 1911 this act was amended so that a corporation whose name has been so stricken may make application for reinstatement at any time after its name has been stricken from the records. It was contended that the act of 1911 violated a provision of the Constitution of Washington which prohibits the remission of a forfeiture. The court held otherwise, and in defining the meaning of the acts said: "These respective acts were not primarily directed against corporations; they were revenue acts pure and simple, and the provisions directed against corporations were for the purpose of enabling the state to enforce the payment of its revenue. . . . The corporation continues to exist until the sovereignty which created it shall, by proper proceedings in a proper court, procure an adjudication of forfeiture and enforce it. . . . The act of the secretary of state in striking the corporation from the records of his office, or in noting it as dissolved for failure to pay its license fees, was not a forfeiture of the corporation, so that any act of the legislature providing for a reinstatement of such corporation would be void as the remission of a forfeiture."

This construction placed by the supreme court of Washington upon the meaning of these acts is binding upon us. It clearly appears therefrom that the purpose of these acts is not "to afford a private remedy to a person injured by the wrongful act," but to "punish an offense against the public justice of the state;" that it is a statute imposing a penalty "for the protection of its revenue . . . laws," and is cognizable only in the state where made. In order to secure payment of a revenue license fee, the state of Washington denies to a corporation in default of such payment the right to sue in its courts; but that state still recognizes its existence as a corporation. So long as such a corporation is permitted to exist by the government of the state of its creation, this state will not, for the purpose of enforcing the revenue laws of that state, deny to such a corporation the right to sue in our courts.

3. We do not overlook the principle that the capacity of a corporation and the powers possessed by it are, in a general sense, primarily determined by the laws of the state or country in which it was created, and that it can exercise no powers except those derived from its charter or the laws of that state. Wharton, Conf. L. 3d ed. § 105a. If, under the laws of the state of its creation, it has no right to sell a particular commodity or enter into a particular class of contracts, such power cannot be conferred by the laws of another state. 19 Cyc. 1214; Citizens' Light & P. Co. v. Seattle Gas & Electric Co. 60 C. C. A. 686, 125 Fed. 1001; Myatt v. Ponca City Land & Improv. Co. 14 Okla. 189, 68 L.R.A. 810, 78 Pac. 185. If it is actually dissolved by proper proceedings in its home state, its existence is ended, and it could not thereafter commence or maintain an action or exercise any corporate functions anywhere. But these principles are not applicable here. We have here no question of the powers of this corporation to contract and to do business. Its powers in that particular are not questioned. We have no question of the dissolution of this corporation. It has not been dissolved. We have only the question whether we shall deny it the right to sue, as a penalty for its failure to contribute its share to the revenues of the state of Washington. On principle and authority we decline to do so, and we hold that plaintiff may maintain an action in this state.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down July 11, 1913:

Defendant, on petition for rehearing, cites the case of Soderberg v. McRae, 70 Wash. 235, 126 Pac. 538, to the effect that, when a corporation is dissolved under the statute cited in the opinion, the property of the corporation passes immediately to the trustees; and defendant urges that an action cannot accordingly be maintained by the plaintiff corporation. The decision above cited cannot affect the disposition of this appeal. The trial court did not find that the corporation had been dissolved. Perhaps the evidence received required a finding to that effect; but, if so, it further appears that evidence was offered and rejected to the effect that the corporation had been reinstated. This evidence should have been received. If not admissible under the pleadings as they stood, opportunity should have been given to amend. If this reinstatement is established on the trial, it is complete rebuttal of the defense in abatement. See Eastman & Co. v. Watson, 72 Wash. 522, 130 Pac. 1144.

Ordered, that the petition for rehearing herein be and the same hereby is denied and stay vacated.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

JUNIUS BROWN, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.

(— Miss. —, 62 So. 353.)

Weapons — razor.

A razor is not within a statute making it an offense to carry concealed any toy pistol, glass, or metallic knuckles, slung shot, or other deadly weapon of like kind or description.

(June 23, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Adams County convicting him of unlawfully carrying concealed a deadly weapon. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles F. Engle, for appellant: The term "weapon" itself indicates that it is for the offense or defense of a person, and that it cannot be extended to include ordinary instruments not used for any such purpose.

Note. — As to what are weapons within offense of carrying concealed weapons, see note to Mitchell v. State, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1174, and see also Burnside v. State, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 780.

Harris v. Cameron, 81 Wis. 239, 29 Am. St. Rep. 891, 51 N. W. 437; State v. Page, 15 S. D. 613, 91 N. W. 313; 40 Cyc. 852.

A razor is not a deadly weapon, the carrying of which concealed is prohibited.

State v. Nelson, 38 La. Ann. 942, 58 Am. Rep. 202; State v. Lowry, 33 La. Ann. 1224; Strahan v. State, 68 Miss. 347, 8 So. 844; State v. Williams, 70 Iowa, 52, 29 N. W. 801; State v. Larkin, 24 Mo. App. 410.

Criminal intent is an essential element of crime.

Miles v. State, 99 Miss. 165, 54 So. 946.

The defendant in this case was shown conclusively to be under the age of fourteen years.

He was therefore prima facie presumed to be incapable of entertaining criminal intent, incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong or good and evil.

Mr. B. W. Crawford also for appellant.

Mr. Frank Johnston, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Reed, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Junius Brown, a boy about thirteen years old, was charged with unlawfully carrying concealed "a certain deadly weapon, to wit, a razor." Upon the trial of the case in the circuit court on appeal from the justice of the peace court, where the charge was made, a demurrer to the affidavit was filed, on the ground that "a razor is not such a deadly weapon as is contemplated by §1103, Code of 1906." This demurrer was overruled. For the same reason, the appellant moved the court to exclude the evidence and give peremptory instruction for the defendant, after the testimony was all introduced. From conviction, appellant appeals, and assigns as error the action of the trial court in refusing to sustain the demurrer and to grant the peremptory instruction.

Section 1103 of the Code of 1906 provides that "any person who carries concealed in whole or in part, any bowie knife, dirk knife, butcher knife, pistol, brass or metallic knuckles, slung shot, sword, or other deadly weapon of like kind or description, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Is a razor a deadly weapon, in the meaning of the statute? It will be noted that the statute names certain weapons, and then includes "other deadly weapons of like kind or description."

A razor is defined in the Century Dictionary to be "a sharp-edged instrument used for shaving the face." In 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law 2d ed. p. 891, this definition is given: "A razor is a sharp instrument or tool used for shaving purposes." We taken the following definition from 33 Cyc. 1537: A razor is a sharp "instrument or implement pertaining to the toilet or shop, having a well-known and specific use, to which it is ordinarily applied." In State v. Nelson, 38 La. Ann. 942, 58 Am. Rep. 202, it is said: "A razor is an instrument or implement appertaining to the toilet or shop. It has a well-known and specific use, to which it is ordinarily applied. It is not known or usually sold in market as a weapon."

It was settled in State v. Nelson, supra, that a razor is not a "dangerous" weapon within the statute in Louisiana, which declares that "whoever shall carry any weapon or weapons concealed in or about his person, such as bowie knives, pistols, dirks, or any other dangerous weapons, shall, on conviction," etc. It will be noted that the Louisiana statute is similar to that in this state. We think it is broader in its inclusions. The statute in this state, after naming certain weapons, says, "Other deadly weapons of like kind or description." In Louisiana the statute says, "Or any other dangerous weapons." Referring to the razor as such a weapon, Watkins, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It may be quite as easily and conveniently carried in the pocket as a pen-knife, and when thus carried is effectually concealed from public open view. Under such circumstances the concealment of one would be just as pernicious as the other." Defining the difference between a razor as a dangerous weapon when used in a combat or assault, and instruments which are made to be used in fights, and which are ordinarily called arms or weapons, Judge Watkins said: "The lawmaker, in our view, . . . only denounced as a crime the carrying concealed dangerous weapons eo nomine, and not such articles or instruments as might be used in an assault."

It was decided in the case of State v. Iannucci, 4 Penn. (Del.) 193, 55 Atl. 336, that a razor is a deadly weapon within the meaning and conception of the statute of Delaware on the subject. We find, however, that the Delaware statute is quite different from that in this state. It provides that, "if any person shall carry concealed a deadly weapon upon or about his person other than an ordinary pocket knife, . . . shall upon conviction," etc. It will be seen that no weapons are specifically named in this statute, and that there is no limitation whatever as to the kind of instruments which are included as deadly weapons.

In deciding the case of State v. Larkin, 24 Mo. App. 410, the court indicates that, if a razor is carried as a weapon of offense, it might be termed a deadly weapon concealed. On the other hand, the court clearly states that it is not to be ordinarily denominated such weapon. In delivering the opinion of the court, Rombauer, J., said: "A razor is an article of common domestic use, and while no one could be held guilty of the offense of carrying a dangerous and deadly weapon concealed about his person, simply because he so carried a razor, yet, if surrounding circumstances would tend to show that he carried it as a weapon of offense, he might become liable to the charge, because a razor, when thus used, is notoriously a weapon dangerous to life."

The only testimony in the present case showing why appellant had the razor concealed on his person when the officer found it is his own statement, as follows: "My aunt give me that razor to have sharpened. She uses it to cut her corns with. I had it in my pocket." Though a razor is an article of ordinary domestic use, still it is well known that it can be used with deadly effect. This can also be said of an ordinary pocket knife, or other articles or instruments which are not classed as weapons. In some sections of the land it may be the habit or custom of a certain class of persons to carry a razor concealed for the purpose of using it in combat. The time may come when it will be so generally used as an instrument in combat as to cause the legislature to include it in the names of deadly weapons, which shall not be carried concealed. But we cannot decide that it is so included now.

We are construing the statute. The purpose thereof is to prevent the carrying concealed weapons; that is, instruments used in fights, or arms. Certain of the instruments well known to be weapons are named, and then it includes "other deadly weapons of like kind or description." We do not believe that we can list the razor in the class of instruments defined to be weapons of like kind and description to those designated in the statute.

Reversed, and defendant discharged.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES WALTERS, Resp't.,
v.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & PUGET SOUND RAILWAY COMPANY et al.,
Appts.

(— Mont. —, 133 Pac. 357.)

Evidence — weight — positive and negative.

1. Positive testimony by persons interested in knowing whether or not a signal was given for a train approaching a road crossing that it was not is sufficient to take the question to the jury, notwithstanding testimony by those in charge of the train that it was.

Railroad — street crossing — failure to stop — negligence.

2. Failure to stop an automobile and look and listen before crossing a railroad track is not negligence as matter of law.

Same — failure to look.

3. It is not negligence per se for one approaching a railroad crossing in a cut to fail to stop before attempting to cross, if, because of the narrowness of the cut and a curve near the track, he could not have seen along the track from a position of safety sufficiently far to be of any avail, and he could not have returned to his vehicle after leaving it to look along the track in the time in which a train would cover the space between the point where it would become visible on the curve, and the crossing.

Same — failure to look last in right direction.

4. It is not negligence per se to fail to Note. — Care required of driver of automobile at railroad crossings.

For a discussion of the general question of the duty of a traveler approaching railway crossings as to place and direction of observation, see note accompanying Wallenburg v. Missouri P. R. Co. 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 135.

As to conduct of flagman, or absence from his post, as affecting liability for injury at crossing, see note to Roby v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 355.

The question of the care required of the driver of an automobile at railroad crossings is covered in the notes to New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Maidment, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 794, and Brommer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 924, and the present note is only supplementary to those.

Stopping, looking, and listening—generally.

There appears to be some conflict upon the question whether a failure to stop an automobile and look and listen before crossing a railroad track constitutes negligence. In New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Maidment, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 794, 93 C. C. A. 413, 168 Fed. 121, and Brommer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 924, 103 C. C. A. 135, look last in the direction from which a train is actually approaching before entering a zone on a highway crossing a railroad track from which a view of the track could not be had.

Damages — award for personal injuries — excess.

5. $15,000 is not excessive to award to a man twenty-three years old, struck by a train at a railroad crossing and rendered unconscious for six or eight hours; his skull slightly fractured; his hip socket fractured so that he could not walk without help for a year; his nervous system shocked; his pelvic bone and lower spinal processes displaced, causing partial paralysis; and his ability to work at his trade, from which he was earning $125 a month, destroyed.

179 Fed. 577, such conduct was held to show contributory negligence on the part of the drivers of the machines. It will be noticed, however, that a contrary result was reached in WALTERS v. CHICAGO, M. & P. S. R. Co.

And in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hilgartner, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 1091, the court said that it was uniformly held error in Texas to charge that it is the duty of one approaching a railroad crossing to stop, look, and listen, and held that this rule was applicable to a traveler approaching such a crossing in an automobile.

But it was held that even if such a duty existed, it would be improper to instruct the jury that if the driver failed to observe such duty he could not recover, since such an instruction assumed as a matter of law that his failure was negligence which directly contributed to the accident. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hilgartner, supra.

In Lockridge v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. — Iowa, —, 140 N. W. 834, where an automobile had been run into at a railroad crossing at which a flagman was stationed, it was held that the rule that one must stop, look, and listen was not a hard-and-fast rule, and that the failure to observe the rule was not in itself, under all circumstances, such contributory negligence as would prevent a recovery. The court said: "This court, in Hartman v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 132 Iowa, 584, 110 N. W. 11, said: 'It is easy to say, and it is a correct proposition, that a person approaching a railway crossing must bear in mind that it is a place of danger, and he must be vigilant to discover the approach of trains, and use reasonable care to avoid injury therefrom.' But whether such reasonable care requires him to stop, look, and listen, whether he had a right to place reliance upon the absence of danger signals, or upon any other given fact or circumstance, depends so much upon the peculiar conditions by which he is surrounded that, save in cases exceptionally free from doubt, the question of contributory negligence must be left to the jury; and an instruction that the failure to stop, look, and listen at all points in his passage 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Silver Bow County in plaintiff's favor, and from an order denying a new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George F. Shelton, Fred J. Furman, and A. J. Verheyen, for appellants:

The driver of an automobile approaching a railway crossing cannot recover for injuries received in a collision between the automobile and a train, unless he proves that he stopped, looked, and listened.

Brommer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 924, 103 C. C. A. 135, 179 over railway crossings is contributory negligence is erroneous. In the case of Schulte v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 114 Iowa, 94, 86 N. W. 65, this court said: 'The traveler is held to the duty of looking and listening for approaching trains, within a reasonable distance from a crossing, and if this has been done, it is for the jury to say whether he was bound, in the exercise of ordinary care, to stop, look, and listen, or to look and listen without stopping at some other point nearer or farther.'

In Chase v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 208 Mass. 137, 97 N. E. 377, it was held that there was no evidence from which it could be found that a chauffeur operating a seven-passenger car was in the exercise of due care where it appeared that while driving along a country road at about noon on a bright day he approached a grade crossing with which he was familiar, and knew that trains might come from either direction at any moment, at a speed of from 12 to 15 miles an hour until he was very close to the track, when he reduced his speed to 8 miles an hour, and while crossing the track the machine was struck by a train proceeding at not more than 25 miles an hour, which he did not see until he was within 15 feet of the track. The court said: "The rules of law applicable to the driver of a horse-drawn vehicle approaching a railroad crossing have been laid down in many cases. He must look and listen in a reasonable way, so as, if possible, to secure his safety. The proper application of this rule for one driving an automobile is simple, and in concrete cases far less difficult than for the driver of horses. As was said in Hubbard v. Boston & A. R. Co. 162 Mass. 132, 38 N. E. 366; 'There are very few horses than can safely be stopped within 15 or 20 feet of a railroad track to await the passage of an express train. One driving there before the accident was obliged to choose between the risk of driving across and being struck by an express train whose approach he might fail to hear, and the risk of stopping to look so near the track as to expose him to great danger from the fright of his horse if an

The driver of any vehicle approaching a railway crossing must look and listen for an approaching train, and, where necessary, approaching train would be near.' The driver of an automobile is in so such danger. If his machine is a good one, it can be controlled easily and perfectly, and there is no danger from it if he stops to look and listen within 6 feet of the track. The difference between automobiles and vehicles drawn by horses, in the application of the rule, has been recognized by the courts. In New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Maidment, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 794, 93 C. C. A. 413, 168 Fed. 21, the court said: 'He cannot drive close to the track, or stop there, without risk of his horse frightening, shying, or overturning his vehicle. . . . These precautions the automobile driver can take, carefully and deliberately, and without the nervousness communicated by a frightened horse. It will thus be seen an automobile driver has the opportunity, if the situation is one of uncertainty, to settle that uncertainty on the side of safety, with less inconvenience, no danger, and more surely than the driver of a horse. Such being the case, the law, both from the standpoint of his own safety and the menace his machine is to the safety of others, should, in meeting these new conditions, rigidly hold the automobile driver to such reasonable care and precaution as go to his own safety and that of the traveling public. If the law demands such care, and those crossing make such care, and not chance, their protection, the possibilities of automobile crossing accidents will be minimized.' To the same purport is Brommer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 924, 103 C. C. A. 135, 179 Fed. 577. See also Spencer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 123 App. Div. 789, 108 N. Y. Supp. 245, affirmed in 197 N. Y. 507, 90 N. E. 1166. With the statement of the law in the paragraph above quoted we entirely agree. With proper care on the part of the driver, there is no danger in crossing a railroad with an automobile upon an ordinary highway in a country town. In this case, considering that part of the testimony which is most favorable to the plaintiffs, there is no evidence that Hancock was in the exercise of due care; but, on the contrary, the accident seems to have been caused by his great carelessness." 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

—where danger is apparent.

It has been held that the driver of an automobile is guilty of contributory negligence in keeping his eyes fixed on the highway just ahead of him until too late to stop and prevent being run down at a crossing where the physical situation generally pointed unmistakably to the presence of a railroad crossing, and there was a full-sized crossing sign plainly visible at a distance, and upon coming closer the track could clearly be seen, and there was an unobstructed view up and down the track. Co. — Conn. —, 87 Atl. 734, where the driver of a heavy truck was seen when a train, approaching a crossing at the rate of 35 miles an hour, was about 100 feet from a crossing, and although there was no obstruction to his view, he drove his truck onto the crossing, in front of the train, it was held that he was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to pass in front of the train, or in not knowing that it was approaching.

And a chauffeur is guilty of contributory negligence in not discovering the approach of the train which struck him, and in failing to stop his machine, where it appears that he looked south when about 25 or 30 feet from a crossing which he was approaching at about 3 or 4 miles an hour, and saw no train approaching; that his automobile was surrounded by a crowd proceeding in the same direction in which he was going; that he did not stop as he approached the crossing, and as he was passing over the first rail of the north-bound track, some of the people screamed and fell back, and that he then looked south again, and saw the train which struck him approaching about 400 feet away, and immediately gave the machine more power in an effort to of ordinary care and diligence required of the public than there is required of the railroad company.

cross ahead of the train, but was struck by it. Spencer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra. The court said: "The evidence establishes to our entire satisfaction that the train which collided with the automobile was in plain sight long enough to have enabled him to shut off the power and bring the machine to a standstill before reaching the track. At the rate of speed at which he was moving, he might have stopped the car almost immediately. It is impossible to believe that with the exercise of ordinary care the plaintiff could not have seen the approaching train and avoided the accident. The only diligence shown to have been exercised by plaintiff was to look from two different points to the south where the train was approaching in plain view without seeing it. He passed over the last 30 feet before reaching the tracks, the most dangerous part of the route, without looking; and it is no excuse to say that he was hemmed in by the people bound for the station. These conditions were only temporary, and would shortly pass away. Common prudence, if necessary to properly handle his machine, required him to stop and proceed no further until he could exercise full vigilance. Heaney v. Long Island R. Co. 112 N. Y. 122, 19 N. E. 422. 'The fact that he did not see the train under these circumstances did not create an issue of fact to be determined by the jury, and their verdict cannot be permitted to stand.'"

—where view obstructed.

Where the view along a track is obstructed until the driver of an automobile is near a street crossing, the tracks are a signal of danger, and impose upon the driver the duty of looking and listening before going on them. Chappell v. United R. Co. — Mo. App. —, 156 S. W. 819.

In Dickinson v. Erie R. Co. 81 N. J. L. 464, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 150, 81 Atl. 104, which was an action to recover for damages resulting from a collision between a train and automobile a crossing, it was held that where there are permanent obstructions in sight that make danger invisible, and a transient noise that would make it inaudible, it is negligence for a traveler to go forward from a place of safety to a place of possible danger without waiting for hearing to become defective.

But it was held that the duty to stop did not arise except where there were transient noises or temporary obstructions to the view. Ibid.

It was held in this case that the driver of an automobile was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in not stopping before his view became effective, where it appeared that his view in approaching a grade crossing was obstructed by permanent obstructions so he could not see a train approaching on the west-bound track until the front wheels of his machine were on the east-bound track, and it appeared that upon reaching the top of a hill 200 feet distant from the crossing, he turned off power and proceeded by force of gravity, noiselessly, at a speed of 4 miles an hour, constantly looking and listening, but hearing no signals, and it further appeared that there were no transient noises nor temporary obstructions to his view. Ibid.

The court in Wachsmith v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 233 Pa. 465, 82 Atl. 755, Ann. Cas. 1913 B, 679, said that the negligence of the driver of an automobile was manifest where it appeared that the view as he approached a grade crossing was shut off until a point 17 or 20 feet from the track was reached, and that from there there was a clear view for several hundred feet, and that when 25 or 30 feet from the track, he slackened speed almost to a full stop and suddenly went forward onto the crossing, and was struck by a shifting engine, of the approach of which no notice was given. The question under consideration in this case, however, was whether the driver's negligence could be imputed to a passenger of the machine.

It has been held that a finding that a young woman whose automobile was struck by a train at a crossing was not guilty of contributory negligence is not sustained by the evidence where it appeared that the view at a greater distance than 30 or 34 feet from the track was partially obstructed, but that a clear view for about a mile was afforded when within that distance, and witnesses testified that they saw the train at a great distance and called out to the plaintiff, although she testified that she looked, but did not see the train until it was 60 or 70 feet away and she was 6 or 7 feet from the crossing, and the evidence further showed that her control of the car was so feeble that after seeing the train she nevertheless drove upon the track. Bonert v. Long Island R. Co. 145 App. Div. 552, 130 N. Y. Supp. 271.

In an action to recover for damage done to an automobile which was run into at a crossing in which the pleadings raised the question of contributory negligence was held that an instruction submitting the question of contributory negligence was warranted, although the defendant introduced no testimony upon the point, where it appeared from the evidence introduced by the plaintiff that the driver knew that tracks crossed the street at the point where the accident occurred, and that a building stood 10 or 12 feet from the track, and partially obstructed the view, but that, after passing this, one could see 75 or 100 feet down the track, and it appeared that the plaintiff's automobile was going only about 3 or 4 miles an hour, and could have been stopped in 4 or 5 feet. Chappell v. United R. Co. — Mo. App. —, 156 S. W. 818.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hilgartner, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 1091, it was held that a requested instruction was properly refused as being upon the weight of the evidence which stated that if the buildings, structures, and obstructions of view surrounding the track as plaintiff was approaching the crossing were such that he could not see the train crossing the street until it had gotten to the edge or on the street upon which he was traveling, it was his duty to use care proportionate to the situation in approaching the track in order to ascertain whether or not there was a train upon the track, greater than it have been if his view up and down the track had been unobstructed.

crossing, had a right to presume and rely upon the presumption that defendant would perform its duties under the law, and would ring the bell on its locomotive, and blow the whistle as required by law; and this is peculiarly true where the crossing, like the crossing in question, is an obscure one.

A person need not be an expert to give his opinion as to the distance a locomotive —where driver voluntarily stops.

The question of contributory negligence on the part of a driver of an automobile which was struck at a crossing is properly left to the jury where there is positive testimony that the driver stopped, looked, and listened at the proper place before attempting the crossing, and that the approaching train was not then in view. Witmer v. Bessemer & L. E. R. Co. 241 Pa. 112, 88 Atl. 314.

And it was also held proper in this case to submit the question of whether the driver exercised due care after being committed to the crossing to the jury. The court said: "It is only in clear cases, where the facts are undisputed and but one inference can be drawn from them that courts can declare as a matter of law a party guilty of contributory negligence. Under our cases there was no imperative duty requiring the driver of the motor car to stop on the tracks of the railroad company after being committed to the crossing, because there might be more danger in stopping than in going ahead. It was his duty to use due care and to proceed cautiously even after being committed to the crossing; but there was no imperative duty either to stop or to go ahead. His duty in this respect depended upon the circumstances of the case and the dangers with which he was confronted. Whether he did all that his duty required him to do depended upon the facts; and unless in a very clear case, it is always the province of the jury to determine the facts. We see nothing in this case so exceptional as to take it out of the ordinary rule. The learned counsel for appellant has called our attention to some cases from other jurisdictions in which a distinction is made between the duty of the driver of a team and the driver of an automobile at a grade crossing. No such distinction has yet been made in any of our cases, and we do not deem it necessary for the purposes of the present case to determine finally whether such a distinction should be made. No matter whistle can be heard when blown, and a locomotive bell heard when rung.

Sanner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At about 6:12 P. M. on July 28, 1910, the respondent, while driving a Ford runabout, was struck on a public road crossing between Butte and Anaconda by one of appellant company's trains. His companion was instantly killed and he seriously injured. To recover for such injuries he brought this action, alleging as negligence on the part of appellants that they were running the train at excessive speed, and that they failed to blow the whistle, ring the bell, or give any alarm of its approach. Respondent had a verdict for $15,000, upon which judgment was entered. This appeal is from that judgment, and from an order overruling a motion for new trial.

1. It is claimed that the evidence of appellants' failure to sound the whistle or ring the bell was insufficient to take the case to the jury, and that, in the face of positive testimony that the whistle was sounded and the bell rung, the jury was not authorized to find for the respondent. It is quite true that the testimony of the engineer and other employees of the appellant company is positive, and that of one other witness rather ambiguous, to the effect that the bell was rung and the whistle sounded in the regular way at from 50 to 80 rods from the crossing. The respondent, however, testified that, as he approached the crossing and for some time before reaching it, he was alert for any warning, having both looked what the true rule may be in this respect, under the facts of the case at bar, it was for the jury to say whether the driver of the motor car could have avoided the collision if he had exercised due care after being committed to the crossing."

And the question of contributory negligence on the part of the driver of an automobile is properly left to the jury where he testified that he stopped, looked, and listened, when about 9 feet from the first track at a crossing with which he was unfamiliar, and his testimony was not directly disputed, but was in some measure substantiated. Bush v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 232 Pa. 327, 81 Atl. 409. The court said: "The law with respect to such cases as this is so clearly expressed in Ely v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 158 Pa. 233, 27 Atl. 970, by the late chief justice, that no other citation of authority is required. It is there said: 'The mere act of stopping does not, it is true, of itself show that he stopped at a proper place, nor that there was not another and better place where he should have stopped again, or that his duty of looking and listening was performed with the proper care and attention; but stopping is opposed to the idea of negligence, and unless, notwithstanding the stop, the whole evidence shows negligence so clear that no other inference can properly be drawn from it, the court cannot draw that inference as a conclusion of law, but must send the case to the jury.'"

—where engine stops.

In Hull v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 60 Wash. 162, 110 Pac. 804, where the motor to the plaintiff's automobile stopped as he was nearing a crossing, and while attempting to restart it the machine ran onto the crossing and stopped, it was held that he owed no absolute duty to stop before attempting to cross, but that if he could ascertain by listening and looking that he could cross in safety, he was entitled to recover. The court said: "The respondent's driver owed no absolute duty to stop before attempting to cross the appellant's track. If, on approaching the track, he could ascertain by looking and listening that he could cross in safety, he has complied with the rule. Here the driver testified that he traveled parallel to the appellant's track for 6 miles without meeting or being passed by a single car; that on arriving at the track he looked in both directions and listened, and neither saw nor heard a train approaching, and that the time it would take an approaching train to travel over the distances he could see the track gave him plenty of time to cross if no mishap befell his car. The sequel, also, proves his statement to be true. It will be remembered that the car stopped with the rear wheels between the rails, and that the passengers had time to alight after the stopping of the car and proceeded along the track towards the approaching train a considerable distance before the train reached the place of crossing. Under these circumstances it would have been error for the court to have charged the jury that the respondent was guilty of negligence as a matter of law if he did not stop before attempting to cross the track."

And it was further held that the plaintiff was entitled to have his conduct judged by the surrounding circumstances at the time of the accident, and if it appeared to be that of a reasonably prudent person, a recovery might be had. Ibid.

In Carnochan v. Erie R. Co. 73 Misc. 131, 130 N. Y. Supp. 514, it was held that no recovery could be held for damage done to an automobile which, because of a defect in its machinery, had stopped so near the track that it was struck by a passing train. The questions involved in this case, however, were as to the negligence of the defendant's flagman in giving incorrect information concerning expected trains, and in failing to signal the train which struck the machine to stop.

—crossings where flagmen maintained.

In Lockridge v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. — Iowa, —, 140 N. W. 834, it was held and listened for the approach of a train, and that the whistle was not sounded nor the bell rung. D. M. Canty, who, with his brother and niece, had made the crossing a very few seconds before, and who were only 20 or 30 feet away, whose hearing was good, and who heard the sound of the train as it struck the respondent's machine, testified that he heard no whistle, nor bell, nor other warning of the train's approach; and James A. Canty also testified that he heard no whistle nor bell, though he hears all sounds plainly and distinctly. The niece, Miss Dugan, testified to similar effect.

The sufficiency of the foregoing to raise an issue, and the present contention of appellants against it, are alike settled in Riley v. Northern P. R. Co. 36 Mont. 545, 93 Pac. 948. At page 559 of that decision, Mr. Justice Smith, speaking for this court, said: "Appellant affirms that it was proven by the uncontradicted evidence that the bell was ringing, and that there was a headlight upon the rear of the switch engine. On the part of the defendant there was positive testimony that the bell was ringing and the light burning. The plaintiff's witnesses simply testified that they did not hear any bell or see any light. Appellant argues that this negative testimony is of no weight, in view of the positive testimony opposed to it. Ordinarily, when one witness testifies positively that a certain thing existed or happened, and another witness, with equal means of knowing, testifies that the thing did not exist or happen, the so-called negative testimony is so far positive in its character that a court could not say that it was entitled to less weight than the affirmative testimony."

2. The testimony of respondent tended to show that, while he looked and listened as he approached the crossing, he did not "stop, look, and listen," and the question is presented by appellants whether the driver of an automobile, approaching a railway cross-that where, under the ordinances of a city, a railroad company was required to and did maintain gates, or a watchman or flagman at a crossing, travelers had a right to presume that when no warning was given to them as they approached, they might proceed with safety.

In this case it was held that the jury might properly find that the driver of an automobile which was run into at a crossing was free from contributory negligence where there was testimony which was in part disputed, that the plaintiff, as he approached the crossing, which he frequently passed, and at which a flagman was maintained, looked and listened, but heard no train and saw no flagman, but that as a train which he did not see until it was upon him was about to strike the machine, a flagman rushed out and tried to push it back. Ibid.

And where an automobile, traveling on a frequented thoroughfare, approaches a railroad crossing over which there are many tracks and at which a city ordinance requires the railway company to keep a flagman night and day, and the chauffeur sees no flagman and no flag in front of the first track where he has the right to expect to see him in case a train is approaching, and sees no train, he is not guilty of negligence in proceeding; and where the flagman then appears and gives warning, but only in time to enable the chauffeur to stop on the first track, where he is almost immediately run into by a train, the accident will be attributed to the negligence of the flagman. Roby v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 130 La. 880, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 355, 58 So. 696.

Speed.

It is improper to instruct the jury that it was contributory negligence on the part of the driver of an automobile to approach a railroad crossing in a city at a greater speed than 6 miles an hour, where, under a city ordinance, it was not negligence per se to approach such crossing at a speed less than 8 miles an hour. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hilgartner, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 1091.

Where driver acts in emergency—running machine off crossing planks.

It has been held that the driver of an automobile is negligent in running off the end of a 16-foot planking on an unobstructed railroad crossing on a bright night, when his lamps are all burning, and stalling his machine on the rails. Nicol v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. 71 Wash. 409, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 174, 128 Pac. 628.

Where the driver of an automobile is placed in a position of danger without his fault, his failure to stop his automobile instead of jumping cannot be said to be negligence as a matter of law. Dickinson v. Eric R. Co. 81 N. J. L. 464, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 150, 81 Atl. 104. The court said: "Where a traveler, without any fault on his part, is placed in a position of imminent peril at a crossing, the law will not hold him guilty of such negligence as to defeat his recovery if he does not select the very wisest course, and an honest mistake of judgment in such a sudden emergency will not of itself constitute contributory negligence, although another course might have been better and safer; and this rule is especially applicable where the person is placed in such perilous position by reason of the railroad company's negligence, as in failing to give the proper signals. All that is required of a person in such an emergency is that he act with ordinary care under the circumstances; it being for the jury to determine whether such an emergency existed, and whether the traveler acted with due care."

ing, is not charged with the absolute duty to "stop, look, and listen." The appellants, conceding that as to other vehicles using a public highway the general rule upon approaching a railway crossing is to exercise such care and caution as might be expected of an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances, insist that "the duty of an automobile driver, approaching tracks where there is restricted vision, to stop, look, and listen, and to do so at a time and place where stopping, and where looking, and where listening will be effective, is a positive duty." New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Maidment, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 794, 93 C. C. A. 413, 168 Fed. 21; Brommer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 924, 103 C. C. A. 135, 179 Fed. 577.

Both of the decisions just cited emanated from the circuit court of appeals for the third district, speaking through Judge Buffington, and they proceed upon the mistaken ideas that a railroad has some sort of a paramount right to the use of a public highway crossing, and that whether a citizen using the highway on approaching such crossing must stop, look, and listen depends upon the motive power he is using and its amenability to control; whereas the true rule, as we understand it, is that the citizen has an equal right with the railway company to use the crossing, and the amenability to control of the motive power he is using bears more properly upon how near he may come to the place of danger before taking the precautions that common prudence generally requires. Of these cases nothing further need be said than this: If they are to be taken to hold, in the absence of express statute, that it is contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for the driver of an automobile not to stop, look, and listen before using a highway crossing, without regard to whether ordinary prudence would require such a course, they are contrary in spirit to the rule announced by the superior authority of the Supreme Court of the United States (Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 36 L. ed. 485, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 679); are against the weight of general decision (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hiltgartner, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 1091; Pendroy v. Great Northern R. Co. 17 N. D. 433, 117 N. W. 531; Spencer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 123 App. Div. 789, 108 N. Y. Supp. 245; Bonert v. Long Island R. Co. 145 App. Div. 552, 130 N. Y. Hawkins, — Ky. —, 124 S. W. 836), and are in conflict with the settled rule in this state. (Mason v. Northern P. R. Co. 45 Mont. 474, 124 Pac. 271; Sprague v. Northern P. R. Co. 40 Mont. 481, 107 Pac. 412; Hunter v. Montana C. R. Co. 22 Mont. 525, 57 Pac. 140.)

In the Sprague Case appears the following: "Whether, in selecting the point which they did select to stop and listen for approaching trains, Nelson and Chappel exercised ordinary care to make their listening effective, and whether, in doing what they did from that point until the injury occurred, they exercised such care and prudence as reasonable men under like circumstances would have exercised, were questions of fact for the jury to determine;" and in the Mason Case this court, disapproving of certain instructions, said: "Neither of these instructions correctly states the law. They imposed too great a burden upon the plaintiff. If such were the law, a person approaching a railroad track would either be obliged to keep a constant lookout in both directions, or it would be incumbent upon him, in order to avoid the imputation of contributory negligence, to stop, if necessary, and look for a train at the last available point, and at the last moment of time, before crossing the track. The law is that one desiring to cross a railroad track must exercise reasonable care for his own safety." We see no reason to change these rules either for or against any class of vehicles in lawful use.

3. The passages just quoted are decisive also of the third contention of appellants, viz.: that the particular circumstances required respondent to stop, look, and listen, and that, as he did not stop at all, nor look and listen, where such looking and listening would have revealed the approach of the train, he is ipso facto convicted of contributory negligence. The argument, although not so expressed, seems to be that if the respondent's view as he neared the crossing was restricted so that he could not see whether a train was coming, he should have proceeded, with his machine under such control that he could instantly stop, to a point between the walls of the cut and the track where he could see, and there look and govern himself accordingly; or that he should have stopped his machine, gone forward into the cut afoot, and ascertained whether the coast was clear; or, if a train coming from Butte towards the cut was visible, then failure to see it was due to failure to look at the right time and place, and in either case there can be no recovery under the Sprague and Hunter decisions.

A short review of the salient features of the case will disclose that the matter is not so easily settled. The respondent was struck by a passenger train which had left Butte shortly before, and was running at not less than 45 nor more than 55 miles an hour. The crossing is in a cut variously estimated at from 8 to 12 feet deep at that point, which cut extends from the crossing eastward about 1,000 feet. The county road east of the crossing follows the general contour, which is about the same as the top of the cut, to a point about 125 feet from the crossing; there the approach to the crossing begins, and it consists of another cut (at a right angle to the railway cut) through which the county road gradually descends from the general level to the level of the track. According to respondent, a train approaching the cut from Butte is visible to the traveler on the county road from where the approach to the crossing begins back to a point one eighth to one-fourth of a mile distant; after proceeding into the approach a little distance, such a train could not be seen, whether in or out of the cut; nor could such a train coming into the cut be seen before the traveler on the county road reached the point above mentioned, one eighth to one-fourth of a mile from the cut; when he reached this place he took "a reasonably long look" to the east for a train and saw nothing; he then looked westward with the like result; he then looked forward, and, being at the approach to the cut, saw the Cauty machine coming towards him; alert then for any warning or sound of a train, anxious also to avoid meeting the Cauty machine on the crossing, he checked his speed, descended slowly and quietly towards the track, saw the other machine pass safely over the track, passed the other machine about 20 or 30 feet from the crossing, and, still listening for a train, reached the track where the accident occurred. He also testified that to see a train, after once entering the approach to the crossing, he would have to proceed to a point where his front wheels would be on the track; that there is a curve in the track where it enters the east end of the cut; and that to stop his car, walk forward to the crossing to view the track, return to the car, and make the crossing, would require from two to five minutes.

By way of maps, profiles, and photographs, there is evidence on behalf of appellants to show that when a passenger train is in the cut, about 6 feet of it projects above the top of the cut. East of the crossing, between the county road and the cut, are a pole fence and the right-of-way fence, built of posts and wire; these to some extent obstruct the view, and while we think that a train drifting downgrade through the cut is visible to one on a level with the top of the cut whose attention was drawn to it, it would not be obtrusive without some warning. The witness Nick testified that he could stand in the county road at a point 80 feet from the track and still see a passenger train coming from the east; but how much above or below his eyes would be the eyes of the respondent sitting in a Ford runabout does not appear. There was also testimony that the curve in the track just east of the cut is a 3-degree curve; that from the east end of the ties at the crossing to the wall of the cut is 11 feet; that the distance from the front edge of the front wheel to the seat of a Ford runabout is 5 feet 6 inches; and that the width of a passenger coach is 10 feet, so that it extends over either side about 1 foot beyond the end of the ties.

Doubtless the case made by appellants was sufficient to defeat a recovery; but it must be remembered that, if any substantial conflict existed in the evidence, this court will not substitute its views for those of the jury, who were the judges of the weight and credibility of respondent's showing. If they believed that the curve to the east of the cut prevented a view from the crossing much beyond the end of the cut (1,000 feet away), and that it would take the respondent not less than two minutes to stop his machine, go to the track, take his view, return to the machine, and cross, it is quite clear that such a proceeding, unless the train was in the cut, would induce a false rather than a real security, because a train approaching at 45 or 55 miles an hour would traverse the entire visible distance in not to exceed 13 seconds. If the jury believed that it was not feasible for the respondent—either from lack of knowledge or because of the narrow margin of safety as disclosed by the appellants' own measurements—to stop his machine at a point within the cut where he could have a view without getting off, then he could not be convicted of negligence for failure to do that; and if the jury believed that the respondent did, before descending into the cut, take a reasonably long look from a point where he says a view was of any value, the facts that he took that look before, instead of after, his look in the other direction,—which, in due care, he was also bound to take,—and that thereafter, though still listening for the possible approach of a train, he gave some attention to the Cauty machine,—which it was also his duty to avoid, and which he saw pass the track in safety,—would certainly not necessitate the conclusion that he was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross the track.

Crediting the testimony of the engineer and others that the crossing of the Cauty machine elicited two blasts from the whistle of the train, it might well be said that the respondent, hearing them and nevertheless proceeding, was chargeable with negligence, as a matter of law; but if it be true that the whistle was not sounded then or at all, nor the bell rung, as the respondent and the occupants of the Cauty machine say, then the very passage of Cauty, unchallenged, in the absence of information to the contrary, was some assurance to the respondent that the crossing was safe.

From the views above expressed it follows that no error was committed by the trial court in overruling the motion for nonsuit, or in modifying appellants' offered instructions 2a and 4a, or in refusing appellants' offered instructions 5a and X. The instructions given were undoubtedly correct so far as they went; and if there was any error in failing to more specifically define the care required of the respondent, it is unavailing to the appellants, since no proper instruction on this subject was offered by them. We see nothing in the other rulings complained of to warrant a reversal of this case.

4. We are then brought to the verdict, which appellants assert is unreasonable and excessive. At the time of the accident the respondent was twenty-three years of age, was a stereotyper by trade, having spent several years in learning that business, and was earning $125 per month. By the injuries received in the accident he is forever barred from again pursuing his trade, and at the time of the trial was earning $80 per month running a moving picture machine. We have here an established loss of $45 per month, or $540 per year, and to purchase an annuity equal to this amount would require approximately $11,000. In addition to this, the respondent suffered a total loss of earning capacity for about a year. When struck by the train he was thrown 75 feet; his hip socket was fractured; his skull slightly fractured; he sustained other severe external bruises, and suffered internal hemorrhages from the intestines and kidneys; he was unconscious for six or eight hours, confined five weeks to his bed, compelled to use crutches for five or six months, and a cane for three or four months thereafter. It was a year before he walked without help. His pain for several weeks was severe; his nervous system sustained serious shock; he has a displacement of the pelvic bone and of the lower spinal processes, causing atrophy, shortening and partial paralysis of one of his legs, an increased susceptibility to tubercular infection, and other difficulties. For all this he receives the difference between the amount of the verdict and the proved loss of earning capacity. While the amount awarded may, apart from the circumstances, seem to have been generous, we do not feel authorized to say that it is so excessive as to evince passion and prejudice, or to warrant any action by this court. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

HENRY O. ROGERS, Appt.,

v.

HELEN A. ROGERS.

(— N. J. —, 86 Atl. 935.)

Husband and wife — desertion — justification.

1. Under our statute, desertion is justified only when the deserting party has been so offended against as to authorize at his or her instance a decree of divorce or judicial separation, but the guilt of the offending party must appear by clear and satisfactory proof.

Divorce — counter offense — proof.

2. When a defendant in a divorce case pleads a counter matrimonial offense against the petitioner in bar of the suit, the offense so pleaded is not made out unless supported by corroborating evidence the same as though it were made the basis of an application for divorce.

Same — desertion — withholding support.

3. While the support of his wife and children by the petitioner was meager, and possibly not all that he could and should have provided out of such means as he had, nevertheless the mere fact of failure to provide sufficient support for a wife does not constitute desertion by the husband under our statute.

Same — efforts at reconciliation.

4. When a wife deserts her husband, it is his duty to make proper approaches to her and sincere efforts to induce her to return to him, unless it is apparent that such approaches and efforts would be entirely futile.

Headnotes by WALKER, Ch.

Note. — For failure to furnish support as ground of divorce or separation, see note to Carson v. Carson, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 255.

For effort by one spouse to induce the other to return home as a condition of desertion by the latter, see note to Hill v. Hill, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1118.

Evidence — sufficiency.

5. Evidence examined, and held to show a wilful, continued, and obstinate desertion by a wife of her husband under such circumstances as excused him from making approaches to her and an effort to induce her to return to him, because it was apparent that any such inducement or effort would have been futile and unavailing.

(April 24, 1913.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Court of Chancery in defendant's favor in an action for a divorce. Reversed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Archibald C. Hart for appellant.

Messrs. Hance & Miller for respondent.

Walker, Ch., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mr. Rogers filed a petition for divorce in the court below, alleging wilful, continued, and obstinate desertion by his wife for the statutory period of two years. She answered, denying the desertion, and averred that she went to the home of her parents in New York city in the month of August, 1908, with their children, and that the petitioner refused to permit her to re-enter their home at Hasbrouck Heights, New Jersey, and barred the house against her; that she had at all times been anxious and willing to return to the petitioner and so informed him, provided he would cease from cruel and inhuman treatment toward her, and cease from treating her as a servant, and permit her to be mistress of the household and rear her children as the wife of the petitioner, to all of which requests the petitioner refused to accede; that after August, 1908 (the time of the separation), the petitioner refused to provide her with money for the support of herself and children; and that she commenced a suit in chancery for such support, which resulted in his agreeing to pay her the sum of $3 per week for the support of their two children, and that he has continued to pay such weekly sum.

The cause was referred to Vice Chancellor Stevenson, who advised a decree dismissing the husband's petition. In the course of his oral opinion he remarked: "When a man sues his wife for divorce for desertion, and charges her with wilful, continued, and obstinate desertion, he must prove that the desertion had those three characteristics. The burden is upon the husband, the petitioner. He must show by a preponderance of the evidence that his wife was guilty of obstinate desertion, and in my judgment in this case the husband entirely fails. As I have already indicated, the great weight of the evidence in this case tends to show that there was no such obstinacy on the part of the wife; that if proper approaches had been made to her, if an honest, sincere effort had been made by the husband for a reconciliation, it would have been successful."

We are in accord with the proposition that a party to a suit for divorce, who charges the other with wilful, continued, and obstinate desertion, must prove that charge, and that the burden of proof is cast upon him or her who prefers it. This is axiomatic. It has been so often decided as not to need the citation of authorities to support it.

In this case the defendant left the petitioner, and has remained away from him for more than the statutory period of two years. Was she justified? If not, was the husband obliged to make a proper effort to induce her to return? This, in turn, involves the question whether such inducement would have been futile, and was so understood by the husband.

First. The parties were living in a house owned by the petitioner at Hasbrouck Heights, in this state; and on the morning of August 18, 1908, the defendant went for a visit to her parents in New York city with their two children; the petitioner accompanying them. Before starting, and on the way to New York, they quarreled about money matters. They had had repeated disputes about money, and the petitioner was shown to have been a miserly and penurious man. His income was small, to be sure, and that was a reason for economy, but not for the penuriousness in which he indulged and which amounted to considerable privation to his wife and children.

On cross-examination the defendant was asked what were her real reasons for deserting the petitioner, and she answered that it was because he refused to give her money that he should have given her to run the house with, and his general continued unkind treatment. At an interview with her husband, at her father's house in New York, she agreed to return to him only upon condition that she should have $30 a month to run the house with, and that they were to occupy separate rooms. She asserted that from the time she made those conditions to the time of giving her testimony her mind on that subject had not changed. She only paid one visit to the Hasbrouck Heights house after she went to her father's in 1908, and that was not to live with her husband, but to take her furniture and belongings away. On the occasion of the petitioner being at the defendant's father's house, her father told the petitioner that if his wife returned to him they would have to occupy separate rooms, and the defendant in her testimony said that that was the first that was said about separate rooms.

The defendant testified that her husband would not agree to the conditions, and that her father then asked her to state her decision, and she asked the petitioner if he had changed his idea as to how she should run the house, and he said, "No." She then asked him if he would continue to carry the money for the running of the house, and he said, "Yes;" and she asked if she was not to have any if she went back, and if he was to continue to buy the things and pay the bills and he said, "Yes;" he thought he could do it more economically than she could, and she said she would not return under those conditions; and she added that if he changed and she went back, still they would occupy separate rooms.

It should be stated that the defendant's refusal to occupy the same room with her husband was because she suspected him of having some sort of venereal disease, although she admits she did not accuse him of it while living with him. It was only brought to his attention by her father at the interview just adverted to, according to the husband's testimony. The defendant's father testified that he himself said nothing to Rogers about his alleged physical condition; that the subject was not brought up at the conversation in his (witness), house, although his daughter had intimated to him such was the case. He did say that he exacted as a condition of his daughter's going back to her husband that they should occupy separate rooms, and gave as a reason that he understood Mr. Rogers was entirely too passionate a man for his wife under the circumstances, whatever they were. The date of the interview with the father was September 8, 1908; the husband having paid one visit to his wife at her parents between the date of her leaving, August 18, 1908, and that visit was on August 31, 1908. On the 10th of September, 1908, it was that Mrs. Rogers went to her former home and removed her things in the absence of her husband. The petitioner continued to occupy his house from the time of their separation until the filing of his petition in this cause. His wife never returned to him, and he never made any overtures to her for a reconciliation, or endeavored to persuade her to return to him. It must be conceded that Mrs. Rogers left her husband and has remained away from him. She does not deny it. In her answer she seeks to justify it by alleging that her husband had been guilty of cruel and inhuman treatment toward her; that he treated her as a servant, and did not permit her to be mistress of the household and rear her children as his wife; that after the separation he refused to provide her with money for the support of herself and children.

Under our statute, desertion is justified when the deserting party has been so offended against as to authorize at his or her instance a decree for divorce or judicial separation; but the guilt of the offending party must appear by clear and satisfactory proof. Drayton v. Drayton, 54 N. J. Eq. 298, 301, 38 Atl. 25; Suydam v. Suydam, 79 N. J. Eq. 144, 146, 80 Atl. 1057.

Assuming that the charge of cruelty in the defendant's answer is sufficiently pleaded, and that the pleader intends to charge the extreme cruelty which is cause for divorce a mensa et thora under our statute, still it is not proved; that is, the facts testified in support of the allegation do not in and of themselves constitute extreme cruelty. But even if they did, being an affirmative defense, the burden of proving it would be upon the defendant; and, as it amounts to a matrimonial offense pleaded in bar of a suit for divorce, it would have to be supported by corroborating evidence the same as though it were made the basis of an application for divorce. Letts v. Letts, 79 N. J. Eq. 630, 632, 82 Atl. 845, Ann. Cas. 1913 A, 1236. The same rule was applied in Garcin v. Garcin, 62 N. J. Eq. 189, 50 Atl. 71.

So far as the question of venereal disease is concerned, the wife only suspected it, and did not accuse her husband of it, much less prove it. Therefore no fact is presented which makes a case of extreme cruelty visited by the husband upon the wife through sexual intercourse while he was so afflicted, and the case does not fall within Cook v. Cook, 32 N. J. Eq. 475, 479, and Crane v. Crane, 62 N. J. Eq. 21, 26, 49 Atl. 734. As to her father's assertion of the reason for the imposition of the condition under which she might return, namely, that they were to occupy separate rooms because the petitioner was entirely too passionate for his wife, it is sufficient to say that the court is not given to be informed of any facts which might show extreme cruelty arising out of gross abuse of marital rights. The court of chancery in English v. English, 27 N. J. Eq. 71, granted a decree of divorce from bed and board forever on the ground of extreme cruelty, consisting mainly in gross abuse by the husband of his marital rights, rendering it unsafe for the wife to cohabit with him or be under his command or control, which decree, however, was reversed in this court (27 N. J. Eq. 579), but only because it was apprehended that further acts of the same abuse would not be attempted if the wife should return to him (27 N. J. Eq. 585), and the divorce was refused and the bill dismissed, but without prejudice, so that the facts urged in the complaint before the court might be used if the case should again be brought. But the case at bar does not come within this doctrine, for want of proof of any gross abuse of marital rights such as would constitute extreme cruelty.

While the support of his wife and children by the petitioner was meager, and possibly not all that he could and should have provided out of such means as he had, nevertheless the mere fact of failure to provide sufficient support for a wife does not constitute desertion by the husband under our statute. See Palmer v. Palmer, 22 N. J. Eq. 88; Skean v. Skean, 33 N. J. Eq. 148; Thomas v. Thomas, — N. J. Eq. —, 74 Atl. 125, 127.

The learned vice chancellor in the court below lays considerable stress upon the want of proper approaches by the husband to the wife, and the absence of sincere effort on his part to induce a reconciliation and her return.

We, however, think that this cause falls within that class of adjudicated cases which excuse the husband from making an effort in the direction just mentioned, because it is apparent to us from the wife's conduct—her actual desertion of her husband, the imposition of unlawful and unreasonable conditions before she would return, her removing her furniture and belongings from his house in his absence, bringing a suit for alimony shortly after the separation—that any overtures or efforts made by her husband to induce her to return would have been entirely futile. See Hall v. Hall, 65 N. J. Eq. 709, 55 Atl. 300; Sterling v. Sterling, 71 N. J. Eq. 59, 63 Atl. 548; Purnell v. Purnell, — N. J. —, 70 Atl. 187.

The above views lead to a reversal of the decree below and the granting of a final decree of divorce to the petitioner and appellant.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

RE ESTATE OF ELIZABETH B. WHITE, Deceased.

(208 N. Y. 64, 101 N. E. 793.)

Succession tax — life estate — death before assessment.

The value for purposes of succession tax of a life estate must be determined by ascertaining its theoretical present value, according to the rule provided by statute, although it falls in before the tax is assessed.

(April 1, 1913.)

APPPEAL by the state comptroller from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing a decree of the Surrogate of Erie County, which confirmed an order fixing the tax on the estate of Elizabeth B. White, deceased, so far as it affected the life estate of Gilbert B. Morgan, a beneficiary under the will. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward N. Mills, for appellant:

There is no absolute right in the individual, at his death, to dispose of his property by will or otherwise; such privilege, when it exists, is created by the civil law.

Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 85, 44 L. ed. 987, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; Re Dows, 167 N. Y. 231, 52 L.R.A. 433, 88 Am. St. Rep. 508, 60 N. E. 439.

The civil law may also regulate the manner of such distribution, and impose such conditions thereon as it may deem proper.

Re Sherman, 153 N. Y. 4, 46 N. E. 1032.

The transfer tax upon the life estate of Gilbert B. Morgan is based on the value of his right to succession, not upon the value of property which later came into his actual possession.

The ascertainment of the value of the taxable interest and the fixing of the tax necessarily take place subsequent to the death; but the guide is the value at the time of death, when the interests were acquired.

Note. — Basis and method of computing value of life estate or annuity for purposes of succession tax.

This note is confined strictly to the subject indicated by the title, but includes the question which is a particular phase of that subject, whether in any event a succession tax may be presently assessed against an ordinary life estate when the same is not modified or limited by any provision which makes either the title or the amount of the life estate contingent or defeasible. As implied by the statement just made, the note does not include cases which hold a life estate not presently taxable upon the ground of its unascertainability, due to the existence of such a contingency, as that word is used in the broad sense. An illustration of the cases so excluded is to be found in Re Surrogate of Cayuga County, 46 Hun, 657, holding that the right of the wife to whom an estate is devised for life, to impair and diminish the same for any purpose whatever,

Durand, 194 N. Y. 477, 87 N. E. 677; Re Jones, 28 Misc. 356, 59 N. Y. Supp. 983; Re Heller, N. Y. L. J. 1903.

Mr. Carl H. Smith, for respondent:

A tax should not be imposed upon something never received.

The transfer tax law is a statute of special taxation, and must be construed as favorably to the taxed as is consistent.

Re Harbeck, 161 N. Y. 217, 55 N. E. 850; Re Fayerweather, 143 N. Y. 114, 38 N. E. 278; Re Enston, 113 N. Y. 174, 3 L.R.A. 464, 21 N. E. 87.

renders the assessment of a collateral inheritance tax under the New York statute of 1885 premature during her life.

By way of further illustration on this point attention is directed to Herold v. Shanley, 76 C. C. A. 478, 146 Fed. 20, holding that the mortality tables are improperly used to ascertain the value of the interests of remaindermen under the Federal internal revenue legacy tax, where a devise of the residue of the testator's estate is postponed until death or remarriage of his widow. In this connection the court said that, even if the use of the mortality tables were permissible in a proper case, they should not have been used here, for one of the contingencies contemplated by the will was the remarriage of the widow, and that while the probability of death might perhaps be approximately estimated from the recorded experience of insurance companies, there were as yet no certificates available from which the probability of remarriage might be even conjectured. To the same effect is Re Millward, 6 Misc. 425, 27 N. Y. Supp. 286; and Re Sloane, 154 N. Y. 109, 47 N. E. 978.

In this connection, see also Re Roosevelt, 143 N. Y. 120, 25 L.R.A. 695, 38 N. E. 281, holding that life annuities contingent on survivorship are not subject to a collateral inheritance tax until they vest by the termination of the life on which they are contingent.

Generally—life estate.

From Re Cornwallis, 11 Exch. 580, 25 L. J. Exch. N. S. 149, 4 Week. Rep. 711, it appears that in England, at least in the legacy duty act of 36 Geo. III. chap. 52, and the succession duty act of 1853, mortality tables were inserted for the ascertainment of annuities and life estates.

The United States Supreme Court in United States v. Fidelity Trust Co. 222 U. S. 158, 56 L. ed. 137, 32 Sup. St. Rep. 59, essentially indorsed the course of the collector of internal revenue in computing the value of a life estate for taxation under the war revenue act of 1898, upon the basis of Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The last will and testament of Elizabeth B. White bequeathed the sum of $200,000 to a trustee, and directed, as a term of the trust, the payment of the interest and income from the trust fund, which remained after certain expenses were paid, to Gilbert B. Morgan, the grandson of the testatrix, during his life. The testatrix died March 2, 1908. The will was admitted to probate April 18, 1910, after a contest. Gilbert B. Morgan died November 8, 1908. Subsequent to the death of the life beneficiary and the probate of the will the proceeding to determine the transfer tax upon the estate was instituted.

Section 230 of the tax law (Consol. Laws the then theoretical present value, ascertained by the use of the mortality tables. The precise holding in the case was that the entire clear value, so ascertained, of a legacy under a will devising the residuary estate in trust, to pay over to the testator's niece the net income in quarterly payments for life, and not merely so much of such life estate as she had actually received before a certain date, had vested prior to that date in the sense of the provision of another act for the refunding of so much of the succession tax as had been collected on "contingent beneficial interests which shall not have become vested" before the date mentioned.

In Re Kaas, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 583, involving a gift of the net income for life, the court said that, in ascertaining the value of life estates and annuities in obedience to statute, the appraiser should take into consideration commissions of the trustee and other charges which may be incurred, and evidence generally tending to show the probable net income; then the court added that when the probable net income is ascertained, it may then be proper to adopt the standard of the Carlisle tables in fixing the cash value of annuity on that amount, based upon the age of the annuitant and the probable duration of life.

In Re Dows, 167 N. Y. 227, 52 L.R.A. 433, 88 Am. St. Rep. 509, 60 N. E. 439, the court held simple remainders dependent upon no contingencies presently taxable before the termination of the precedent estate, upon the ground that their value was readily ascertainable by the use of annuity tables.

In Re Maresi, 74 App. Div. 76, 77 N. Y. Supp. 76, involving a bequest to the testator's widow of a life estate in the personal property, subject to life annuities in favor of others, the court held that it was proper, in calculating the present value of the widow's life estate, to deduct from the net value of the personal property the present value of the annuities, instead of deducting therefrom the actual amount of principal necessary to produce these annuities; and that the fact that the widow would not, until the annuitant died, receive the income 1909, chap. 60) contains the provision: "The value of every future or limited estate, income, interest, or annuity dependent upon any life or lives in being shall be determined by the rule, method, and standard of mortality and value employed by the superintendent of insurance in ascertaining the value of policies of life insurance and annuities for the determination of liabilities of life insurance companies, except that the rate of interest for making such computation shall be 5 per centum per annum."

The surrogate's court, affirming the determination of the appraiser, made pursuant to such provision, determined the value of the interest of Gilbert B. Morgan in the estate of the testatrix, in accordance with the valuation of it by the superintendent of insurance, at $138,809. The appellate division, upon the appeal of the executor, held this erroneous, and remitted the proceeding to the surrogate's court, with the direction that it determine the value of the interest of the life beneficiary according to the actual duration of his life. The principle upon which it rested this decision, as stated in its opinion, was: "The purpose of the statute (§ 230 of the tax law) was to afford a method of valuing an estate or interest not capable at the time of ascertainment with exactness because of the uncertainty attendant upon the duration of an existing life. To such a case the statute clearly applies; but where there is no such uncertainty, the reason for the statute rule does not exist, and, hence, the on so much of the funds as might be necessary to produce the annuities, did not render such method of computation improper, since § 230 provided that when any property shall be transferred subject to any charge determinable by the death of any person, or at any period ascertainable only by reference to death, the increase of benefit accruing upon the extinction or determination of such charge should be deemed a transfer of property in the same manner as though the person beneficially entitled thereto had then acquired such increase of benefits from the person from whom the title to their respective estates was derived.

In Re Von Storch, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 204, the court cited and followed Re Handley, 3 Lack. Leg. News 9, as having prescribed the proper method of ascertaining the present value of life estates for the purpose of taxation by computation upon the basis of the annuity tables and 5 per cent.

In Re Lange, 55 N. Y. Supp. 750, holding a remainder vested in expectancy presently taxable, the court stated merely that the value of the remainder was properly ascertained by deducting the value of the precedent life estate, which was found and reported by the appraiser, though the method adopted by the appraiser was not shown. To the same effect is Re Bogert, 25 Misc. 466, 55 N. Y. Supp. 751.

In Re Runcie, 36 Misc. 607, 73 N. Y. Supp. 1120, the court merely remarked in passing that the decision involved a simple life estate, the value of which could be computed as soon as it came into existence.

See also Re Kaas, supra.

In Disston v. McClain, 77 C. C. A. 340, 147 Fed. 114, writ of certiorari denied in 207 U. S. 587, 52 L. ed. 353, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255, it was held that the Federal war revenue act of 1898, relating to "legacies and distributive shares" arising from personal property, did not warrant a tax upon the residuary personal estate of the testator as legacy of the corpus, where an annuity—46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

i. e., a fixed sum, as distinguished from the income of a fund—was directed to be paid to a person for life, out of the total income of the entire residuary estate, real and personal; and that a tax could be enforced only upon the specific payments as they from time to time fell due. The court said that the method adopted by the collector was unauthorized, the statute prescribing no method of valuation, since he did not estimate by life tables the value of a life estate in a designated and ascertained fund, but, by an exercise of his arbitrary judgment, proceeded to create the fund that would produce the income, though it had not been designated by the testator, and then proceeded to value the same by the use of life tables. The court distinguished Vanderbilt v. Eidman, 196 U. S. 480, 49 L. ed. 563, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 331, a case not within the scope of this note, as it does not involve a life estate.

However, the other cases which involve the question take the contrary view without much discussion, and on the apparent assumption that the same rules apply to annuities as to life estates in the strictest sense.

Thus, the Massachusetts supreme court holds that in ascertaining the value of the remainder for succession tax, in a residuary estate from which the testator has directed the payment each year of a sufficient sum to make the income of the life tenant a certain amount, including her private income, if the private income is substantially the same from year to year, the life interest in the residue may be regarded as an annuity for the difference between the private income and the specified sum, which may be valued as of the time of the testator's death in the manner provided by the statute, according to the actuaries' experience tables, at 4 per cent compound interest. Howe v. Howe, 179 Mass. 546, 55 L.R.A. 626, 61 N. E. 225.

And in a New Jersey case involving a gift of the residuary estate to the testator's brother, with the direction that he pay to a certain person a certain sum each year for such person's life, the court declared without discussion that the property thus passed was statute was not intended to apply in such a case." Re White, 149 App. Div. 428, 431, 134 N. Y. Supp. 281, 284. Upon this appeal by the comptroller from an order of the appellate division, we are to declare the correct method of valuation.

The tax in question is imposed, as provided in the statute, upon the transfer of, and not upon, the property. It is a tax upon the method by which the interest of the life beneficiary in the estate of the testatrix was transferred to and acquired by him. It is in the nature of an excise tax on the right to and method of transfer. Re Keeney, 194 N. Y. 281, 87 N. E. 428. The right to make a testamentary disposition of or the right to inherit property is not an inherent right; nor is it guaranteed by the fundamental law. Its exercise to any extent depends entirely upon the consent of the legislature as expressed in their enactments. It can withhold or grant the right; and, if it grants it, it may make its exercise and its extent subject to such burdens and requirements as it pleases. Wherein the legislature is silent in the matter of the devolution of property, the courts cannot speak; and as it has spoken, the courts must obey and enforce.

The power of taxation is likewise vested in the legislature as a part of the more general power of making laws; and, except as restrained by the Federal Constitution, its exercise for public purposes is unlimited. The authority under which a tax is collected and the method of its collection lie an annuity for life, and that its value might properly be fixed by a determination of its worth at the testator's decease, considered in the light of the legatee's probability of life. Re Rothschild, 71 N. J. Eq. 210, 63 Atl. 615, affirmed without opinion in 72 N. J. Eq. 435, 65 Atl. 1118.

In Re Tracy, 179 N. Y. 501, 72 N. E. 519, involving § 230 of the New York statute set out in RE WHITE, the court held that the present value of a life annuity should be ascertained by the use of the standard of mortality employed by the superintendent of insurance, and that the amount of the tax computed thereon should be paid out of the funds set aside for creating the annuity, but that inasmuch as the annuity was payable from the residuary estate, the tax paid upon the annuity should be returned to the residuary estate by deducting from each annual payment of the annuity the proportionate part of such tax, to be ascertained by dividing the amount of the tax paid by the number of years the annuity will probably continue. It is to be observed that it is recited in the statement of facts that the annuity was contingent upon the annuitant remaining as faithful in the service of the testator's daughter as he had been in the testator's service; but such fact seems not to have occurred to the court as affecting the present taxability of the annuities.—at least, such fact seems not to have been urged by counsel.

After life tenant's death.

As in RE WHITE, it was held in Re Jones, 28 Misc. 356, 50 N. Y. Supp. 983, that the statutory method according to the standard of mortality employed by the superintendent of insurance was the proper method, though the life tenant died before appraisal.

The case of Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 26 L.R.A. 259, 38 N. E. 512, shows that it is provided in the Massachusetts act of 1891 that in case of an annuity or life estate, the value thereof should be determined by the so-called actuaries' combined experience tables and 4 per cent compound interest. And the Massachusetts court holds that the valuation is to be made in compliance with this provision, although the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

life estate terminates before the valuation. Howe v. Howe, supra, involving the valuation of the contingent remainder of property devised to an exempt person for life.

So it is held by the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, in United States v. Farr, 196 Fed. 990, that the value of a life estate for the purposes of a legacy tax under the Federal war revenue act was properly ascertained by the use of mortality tables duly adopted by the United States; and this although the life tenant died before the expiration of the year after the death of the testator, allowed by the statute for the payment of the tax, which it seems expired before the assessment was made. Apart from the effect of the death of the life tenant, the court relied entirely upon the decision of the United States Supreme Court in United States v. Fidelity Trust Co. 222 U. S. 158, 56 L. ed. 137, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 59, upon the propriety generally of using the mortality table.

However, the contrary was held by the circuit court of appeals for the third circuit in Herold v. Kahn, 86 C. C. A. 598, 159 Fed. 608, the court declaring that the ascertainment of the present value by the use of mortality tables could not be supported, notwithstanding the death of the life tenant was not known at the time of the assessment. But it is to be observed that the decision in Herold v. Kahn antedates those in United States v. Farr and United States v. Fidelity Trust Co. supra.

And in Re Hall, 36 Misc. 618, 73 N. Y. Supp. 1124, the court, in appraising a remainder for the purpose of a tax, after the death of the life tenant, refused to follow Re Jones, supra, and apply the statutory method, upon the grounds that the life tenant outlived her expectancy, and that the remaindermen were not ascertainable until her death, that the appraisal of the remainder had therefore been postponed until her death, and that the life estate created consisted in an annuity, it being provided that the trustees should use the principal to make up the fixed income in case of a deficiency, and the trustees having necessarily invaded the principal for this in the discretion of and must be prescribed by the legislature. Gautier v. Ditmar, 204 N. Y. 20, 97 N. E. 464, Ann. Cas. 1913 C, 960. The proper inquiry, therefore, is: What method of determining the value of the interest of the life beneficiary does the statute prescribe?

At the commencement of the proceeding to determine the tax, §§ 220 and 221 of the tax law fixed the measure of the amount of the tax. Thereafter those sections were amended and § 221a was added. Laws 1911, chap. 732, § 3. Under those sections the true test by which the tax is to be measured is the value of the interest or estate transferred at the time of the transfer thereof. Re Sloane, 154 N. Y. 109, 47 N. E. 978. The interest of the life beneficiary accrued on the death of the testatrix, and its value as of the time of that occurrence is the sum to which the rate per centum as fixed by the statute should be applied, and under the provision within § 222 the tax then became due and payable. Inasmuch as it became due and payable at the time of the transfer, or at the death of the testatrix, it would seem to follow, logically and necessarily, that the amount of it should be determined upon the conditions then existing. The legislature enacted that such determination should be made through the use of the rule prescribed in and by the language of § 230, already quoted. This provision is mandatory in its language, and the statute contains no other applicable or intended to apply to this case. The language is clear and its meaning certain. The court has not the power to declare that it was not intended to apply to this case, and to modify the rule it states or create another. Indeed, we may well believe that the legislature, when creating it, contemplated the precise conditions here existing. They are neither strange nor beyond reasonable expectation. It is commonly known that frequently the actual imposition of the tax is delayed by protracted litigation or other causes, and that the lives of life tenants may fall far short of or extend beyond the periods fixed by the mortality tables. In harmony with such knowledge, and indicative that it existed, is the further clause of § 230, as follows: "Where an estate for life or for years can be divested by the act or omission of the legatee or devisee, it shall be taxed as if there were no possibility of such divesting."

The rule promulgated by the legislature effects certainty and uniformity which the principle adopted by the appellate division would tend to destroy, because classes of facts might be found to exist by an appraiser and surrogate's court, which, if permitted application, would affect the determination of the tax. While in this case the rule works to the advantage of the state, inasmuch as the remainder has passed to a religious corporation exempt from the tax, such manifestly is not its necessary or uni-purpose. The court held that the value of the remainder should be ascertained upon the basis of the actual duration of the life tenant's life.

Effect of life tenant's poor health, etc.

The Tennessee court holds that where the statute provides that the computation shall be made by the Carlisle life tables "whenever the use of life tables is necessary or applicable," said tables are not conclusive and should be supplemented by evidence as to the age, habits, and health of the person whose expectations of life is being considered; and that since the annuitant was in a low state of health and incurable, it was improper to use the mortality tables; at least, to the extent of making them the sole test. Crenshaw v. Knight, — Tenn. —, 150 S. W. 468. The court stated that the legislature, in inserting the quoted words in the statute, must have had in mind the general principle which, as stated in 16 Cyc. 616, requires the computation of the probable duration of a life estate to be based upon tables of life expectancy, taking into consideration the state of the tenant's health and other circumstances of the particular case.

that the Pennsylvania act of 1858 left it to the individual register to determine the mode in each case as to appraising the present value of life estates and annuities, said: "We believe that in most of our counties, the Carlisle tables are resorted to for determining the average duration of human life, and through that the present value of a continuing legacy. But it is manifest that a calculation based upon those tables, and into which no element drawn from the circumstances of any single case is allowed to enter, must often result grotesquely. That calculation would show no difference in the chances of life between the man of twenty-five years, stricken with paralysis, and the trained athlete of the same age in robust health."

On the contrary, in Re Robertson, 5 Dem. 92, in ascertaining the value of a life estate for taxation under the statute of 1885, whose language is not set out, the court held that such an estate should be valued according to the rules of the supreme court, which involved the use of life tables to show the probable duration of life, and that the result could not be varied because the physical condition of the life tenant made it unlikely that she would live during the period indicated as her expectancy.

form result, and it is not subject to criticism as unjust and harsh.

The order of the Appellate Division and the decree of the Surrogate's Court made thereon should be reversed, and the original decree of the Surrogate's Court reinstated with costs in both courts.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

RE SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS OF ALICE D. WILLIAMS et al., Exrs., etc., of William Williams, Deceased.

(208 N. Y. 32, 101 N. E. 853.)

Judgment — on foreign judgment for alimony — effect.

The recovery of a judgment on a foreign judgment for alimony does not merge the latter so as to take the debt for the second judgment out of the operation of the bankruptcy act, which exempts debts due for support of wife from discharge.

(March 25, 1913.)

A PPEAL by the executors of William Williams, deceased, from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing a decree of the surrogate for Monroe County disallowing a claim which had been filed against the estate for alimony under a decree of divorce. Affirmed.

The order of the appellate division granting leave to appeal to this court certifies that in its opinion the following questions of law are involved which ought to be reviewed in this court, viz.:

(1) Was the South Dakota decree merged in or superseded by the judgment recovered in this state on February 17, 1894?

(2) Did the discharge in bankruptcy release decedent, William Williams, from liability under the New York judgment?

(3) Should the surrogate, on the papers and proofs before him, have allowed the claim of Eliza T. Williams?

Mr. Hugh Satterlee, with Messrs. McGuire & Wood and Henry D. Shedd, for appellant:

not enforce the penal laws of another. Perhaps in this connection attention ought to be called to the case of Fauntleroy v. Lum, 52 L. ed. U. S. 1039, which reveals a sharp conflict of views among the members of the Supreme Court as to the right of a court of one state to go behind a judgment rendered in another in order to inquire into the validity of the claim upon which it was based. The judgment involved in that case, however, was not rendered under a penal statute.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The testator died September 14, 1904. This is a proceeding brought in the surrogate's court for a final judicial settlement of the accounts of the executors of the last will and testament of the testator. The respondent, in 1892, was the wife of the testator. In that year, in a contested action in the circuit court in the state of South Dakota, she recovered a judgment of absolute divorce against him, and in the judgment was awarded for alimony and costs $32,704.98. In 1894, in a contested action upon said judgment in this state, in which action the issues involved in said action in South Dakota were alleged and shown, she recovered a judgment against him of $35,765.46. In 1899 the testator filed a petition in an involuntary bankruptcy proceeding in the United States district court for the northern district of New York. In said petition and the schedules made a part thereof, he stated that his entire indebtedness consisted of two claims against him, one being a note of $500 given for the purchase price of certain stock which he had pledged as collateral security for the payment of said note, and the other being the claim of the respondent, therein described as follows: "Eliza T. Williams, Rochester, N. Y. This debt is in a judgment recovered in her favor February 17, 1894, and docketed in Monroe county clerk's office, and the consideration of the judgment was a judgment recovered in South Dakota for counsel fee and alimony in an action in that state for a divorce, amounting to $35,765.46." No assets were received by the trustee in bankruptcy. The testator was adjudged a bankrupt, and on March 15, 1900, he was discharged from all of his debts which were provable in bankruptcy. The respondent presented to the executors a verified claim, in which she described said judgment rendered in this state, and stated that the same was due and owing to her as "being in the nature of a judgment for alimony." The claim was rejected by the executors, and in this proceeding the judgment roll in the said action in South Dakota, and also the judgment roll in the said action in this state, were received in evidence without objection. It was conceded that said judgments had not been paid, but the executors insisted that the New York judgment had been discharged by the proceeding in bankruptcy. The sur- 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) rogate by the decree entered herein disallowed the respondent's claim.

It was found as a fact by the surrogate that the judgment recovered in this state was an effort and endeavor on the part of the respondent to enforce the judgment of the circuit court of South Dakota. According to the weight of authority, the recovery of the judgment in this state was not a discharge of the South Dakota judgment, and it was not merged in the judgment so recovered in this state.

It may be inconvenient that two judgments should subsist in the same state against the same person on the same judgment, but no such inconvenience can exist in the case of judgments rendered in different states, and there is no sufficient reason for the application of the purely technical doctrine of merger subversive of substantial justice, as it would be in such cases. Story, Conf. L. 8th ed. § 599, note a; Black, Judgm. 2d ed. § 864.

It is claimed by the appellant, that, admitting that the judgment recovered by the respondent in South Dakota was to enforce a duty enjoined upon the testator by the marital relation, the judgment in this state was purely a judgment for debt represented by the amount of the judgment entered in South Dakota upon which the action was brought.

The bankruptcy statute, as it has existed since 1903, expressly provides that alimony due or to become due for maintenance or support of wife or child is exempt from discharge under Bankr. act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, § 17, 30 Stat. at L. 550, 551, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3428, as amended by act Feb. 5, 1903, chap. 487, § 5, 32 Stat. at L. 798, U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1496. Although there was no such express exemption in the bankruptcy statute prior to the amendment in 1903, that amendment was merely declaratory of the true meaning and sense of the statute as originally enacted. Wetmore v. Markoe, 196 U. S. 68, 49 L. ed. 300, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 172, 2 Ann. Cas. 265. In Audubon v. Shufeldt, 181 U. S. 575, 577, 45 L. ed. 1009, 1010, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 735, 736, the court say: "Alimony does not arise from any business transaction, but from the relation of marriage. It is not founded on contract, express or implied, but on the natural and legal duty of the husband to support the wife. The general obligation to support is made specific by the decree of the court of appropriate jurisdiction. Generally speaking, alimony may be altered by that court at any time, as the circumstances of the parties may require. The decree of a court of one state, indeed, for the present payment of a definite sum of money as alimony, is a record which is entitled to full faith and credit in another state, and may therefore be there enforced by suit. Barber v. Barber (1858) 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226; Lynde v. Lynde (1901) 181 U. S. 183, 45 L. ed. 810, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555. But its obligation in that respect does not affect its nature. In other respects alimony cannot ordinarily be enforced by action at law, but only by application to the court which granted it, and subject to the discretion of that court. Permanent alimony is regarded rather as a portion of the husband's estate to which the wife is equitably entitled, than as strictly a debt; alimony from time to time may be regarded as a portion of his current income or earnings; and the considerations which affect either can be better weighed by the court having jurisdiction over the relation of husband and wife, than by a court of a different jurisdiction. . . . The result is that neither the alimony in arrear at the time of the adjudication in bankruptcy, nor alimony accruing since that adjudication, was provable in bankruptcy, or barred by the discharge."

The decision in the Audubon Case is not dependent upon authority of the court, which awarded the alimony, to amend the judgment therefor as the circumstances of the parties may require.

In Wetmore v. Markoe, 196 U. S. 68, 71, 49 L. ed. 390, 391, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 172, 173, 2 Ann. Cas. 265, the court say: "It is conceded in argument by counsel for the plaintiff in error that this case would be within the decision of this court in Audubon v. Shufeldt, 181 U. S. 575, 45 L. ed. 1009, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 735, if the judgment for alimony had been rendered in a court having control over the decree, with power to amend or alter the same. It is insisted, however, that, there being in this case no reservation of the right to change or modify the decree, it has become an absolute judgment beyond the power of the court to alter or amend, and is therefore discharged by the bankruptcy proceedings. Walker v. Walker, 155 N. Y. 77, 49 N. E. 663; Livingston v. Livingston, 173 N. Y. 377, 61 L.R.A. 800, 93 Am. St. Rep. 600, 66 N. E. 123. . . . The precise question there is, Is such a judgment as the one here under consideration a debt within the meaning of the act? The mere fact that a judgment has been rendered does not prevent the court from looking into the proceedings with a view of determining the nature of the liability which has been reduced to judgment. Boynton v. Ball, 121 U. S. 457, 466, 30 L. ed. 985, 987, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 981. . . . The court having power to look behind the judgment, to determine the nature and extent of the liability, the obligation enforced is still of the same character notwithstanding the judgment. We 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

think the reasoning of the Audubon Case recognizes the doctrine that a decree awarding alimony to the wife or children, or both, is not a debt which has been put in the form of a judgment, but is rather a legal means of enforcing the obligation of the husband and father to support and maintain his wife and children. He owes this duty. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not because of any contractual obligation or as a debt due from him to the wife, but because of the policy of the law which imposes the obligation upon the husband. . . . In the case of Romaine v. Chauncey, 129 N. Y. 566, 14 L.R.A. 712, 26 Am. St. Rep. 544, 29 N. E. 826, it was held that alimony was awarded not in the payment of a debt, but in the performance of the general duty of the husband to support the wife. . . . While it is true in this case the obligation has become fixed by an unalterable decree, so far as the amount to be contributed by the husband for the support is concerned, looking beneath the judgment for the foundation upon which it rests, we find it was not decreed for any debt of the bankrupt, but was only a means designed by the law for carrying into effect and making available to the wife and children the right which the law gives them as against the husband and father."

In the proceeding now before us, assuming that the surrogate had power to pass upon the question whether the respondent's claim had been discharged by the bankruptcy proceeding, the facts were before the court, and looking beneath the judgments it appears that the foundation upon which the respondent's claim rests is the alimony decreed by the South Dakota court to be paid by the testator to the respondent. The alimony was due in the form of a judgment entered in the legal method of enforcing the testator's obligation. Even if we give to the appellant's argument all the force and effect that he claims for it, the judgment rendered in South Dakota was not discharged by the decree in bankruptcy. The inconsistent and absurd results that would arise from holding that the New York judgment was discharged by the decree in bankruptcy, while the South Dakota judgment remained in full force and effect, require that the New York judgment should not be discharged unless the South Dakota judgment upon which it is founded is at the same time discharged.

A decree in bankruptcy proceedings should not be held to be a discharge of a judgment in one state unless it, at the same time, is held to be a discharge of any and all judgments of other states, which are founded primarily upon the same debt or duty, and which have such a relation to each other that a payment of one would result in a defense to or extinguishment of the others.

The order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs payable out of the estate. First question certified should be answered, not within the purview of the bankruptcy act; second question certified should be answered in the negative; and the third question certified should be answered in the affirmative.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

F. M. GREIG, Trustee, etc., of Howard N. Ford, Bankrupt, Appt.,
v.

C. C. MUELLER, Trustee, etc., of First National Bank of Vale et al., Respts.

(— Or. —, 133 Pac. 94.)

Mortgage — consideration — pre-existing debt.

1. A pre-existing debt is a sufficient consideration for a mortgage given to secure it. Same — for benefit of mortgagor — validity.

2. A chattel mortgage given to a creditor who has collateral security with which he is satisfied, for the purpose of enabling the mortgagor to force a settlement with another creditor, is void where the mortgagor is permitted to continue his business without accounting to the mortgagee for sales which he makes of the mortgaged property.

(June 10, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Malheur County in defendants' favor in a proceeding to cancel a chattel mortgage alleged to have been executed in fraud of the bankrupt's creditors. Reversed.

Statement by Eakin, J.:

Howard H. Ford, a dealer in autos, auto goods, and sundries, in connection with his auto repair shop, being in failing circumstances, was adjudged a bankrupt. The plaintiff was appointed assignee of his estate, and as such brought this suit to have canceled a certain chattel mortgage given by Ford to Mueller for the benefit of the defendants, the First National Bank of Vale,

Note. — For the validity of a chattel mortgage of stock of merchandise as affected by a provision or agreement giving the mortgagor possession with power of sale, see notes to Ephriam v. Kelleher, 18 L.R.A. 604, and Gilbert v. Peppers, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1181.

The effect of the mortgagee's consent to the sale of property by the mortgagor after the mortgage is given as a waiver of the lien, is treated in the note to Carr v. Brawley, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 302.

hereinafter referred to as Vale bank, and the First National Bank of Ontario, hereinafter referred to as the Ontario bank. The mortgage was given on May 11, 1911, at which time Ford was indebted to the Vale bank in the sum of $8,700 as evidenced by certain promissory notes and overdrafts, and to the Ontario bank in the sum of $3,500. New notes were executed by Ford to Mueller for said amounts secured by the said mortgage. The mortgage covered "three 40-horse power Oakland automobiles; one 30-horse power Oakland touring car; one 30 horse power Oakland roadster; one 40x45 horse power Pierce Arrow touring car; one lathe, one drill press, one electric motor, two gasoline tanks, of about 300 and 500 gallon capacity, respectively; all tools, fixtures, appliances, and all stock in trade, goods, wares, and merchandise, and sundries . . . including all furniture and furnishings, office safe . . . all of the foregoing mentioned and described property now being in that certain brick building on the east side of the Main street in Ontario . . . occupied by the party of the first part under the name and style of Ontario Auto Company. . . ." It is provided in the mortgage that, "and these presents are on the express condition that if the said party of the first part, his executors, administrators, and assigns shall well and truly account on the third Saturday of each and every month hereafter during the life of these presents unto the said party of the second part . . . for all of the receipts of said business, and pay over the net profits thereof after the running expenses thereof shall have been paid, as may be approved by the party of the second part, and the replacement of said stock shall have been provided for in the pleasure of the said party of the second part . . . then these presents shall be void." At the time of the execution of the mortgage Ford was largely indebted to the Oakland Motor Car Company, of Detroit, Michigan. It appears that one purpose of Ford in making the mortgage was to put himself in a position that he might force a satisfactory compromise or settlement with the Oakland Motor Car Company, as well as to secure the mortgagees. Ford made two informal reports under the mortgage to Mueller, which were indefinite and incomplete, but did not pay over any of the proceeds of the business, and continued to sell the goods at retail in the usual way, keeping no specific account of his transactions. He paid his personal expenses as well as the expenses of the business out of the receipts, but kept no account thereof. The Ontario bank was made a defendant, but disclaims any interest in said mortgage. The Vale bank answered, setting up the notes of Ford to Mueller in the sum of $6,700 as given for its benefit for a pre-existing debt, and that they, with the mortgage, were taken in Mueller's name for the benefit of the said Vale bank. Upon the trial the court found that the mortgage was a valid, subsisting lien in defendant's favor, enumerating the items of goods covered by the mortgage as consisting of more than 400 items, and adjudged that plaintiff is not entitled to any relief. Plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. McCulloch & Eckhardt and H. C. Eastham, for appellant:

Where a mortgage is designed and made for the benefit of the mortgagor, to enable him to continue in business by placing his property beyond the reach of legal process, it is void as to creditors.

Where it appears, either on the face of the mortgage or by parol, that the mortgagee of personal property has given the mortgagor an unlimited power to dispose of the property mortgaged for the use of the mortgagor, then the mortgage is void as to creditors.

If the mortgagee has an agreement with 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the mortgagor not to sell any of the mortgaged property, but, disregarding this agreement, the mortgagor did sell portions of the mortgaged property and apply the proceeds to his own use, the mortgagee by his silence permitting this to be done, the inference is that the sales were made with the consent of the mortgagee, and renders the mortgage void.

Eakin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is first contended that defendant parted with no consideration for the mortgage at the time of its execution. That contention may be briefly answered by the statement that a pre-existing debt secured by mortgage is a sufficient consideration for it. Currie v. Bowman, 25 Or. 364, 35 Pac. 848; Jolly v. Kyle, 27 Or. 95, 39 Pac. 999; Mendenhall v. Elwert, 36 Or. 375, 52 Pac. 22, 59 Pac. 805; Hesse v. Barrett, 41 Or. 202, 68 Pac. 751.

It is next claimed that Ford made the mortgage for the purpose of hindering and delaying creditors. According to Ford's own statement he feared trouble with the Oakland Motor Car Company, which held a claim against him for about $8,000; and for the purpose of getting a settlement with it he proposed to the Vale bank and to the Ontario bank that, in order to protect them, he would give them a chattel mortgage. He says that neither the Vale bank nor the Ontario bank requested the mortgage. The Ontario bank did not agree to accept it, but said they were satisfied with the paper they had; that Monroe, the cashier of the Vale bank, said, "He was willing to (accept it) if it was any benefit to me,"—thus showing a fraudulent purpose on the part of Ford, which was acquiesced in by the Vale bank. Monroe admits knowledge of Ford's purpose, and acquiesced in the mortgage; and although the mortgage contains no reservation in favor of Ford, and is in form valid, it is clear that the Vale bank nominally accepted the mortgage to benefit Ford, and thereafter, with a tacit understanding, permitted him to continue the business unrestrained and for his own benefit. It is said in Sabin v. Columbia River Lumber & Fuel Co. 25 Or. 15, 42 Am. St. Rep. 756, 34 Pac. 692: "Where a mortgage is designed and made for the benefit of the mortgagor, and to enable him to continue in business by placing his property beyond the reach of legal process, it is void as to creditors." Where the mortgage on its face contains no evidence of being made for the benefit of the debtor, yet, as said in Sabin v. Wilkins, 31 Or. 450, 48 Pac. 425, 37 L.R.A. 465, note, "as it is a thing capable of modification by subsequent agreement, either expressed or implied by co-operative and wilful disregard of its terms and conditions, it is a prerequisite to its continuing validity that good faith and fair dealing be maintained towards those whose interests may be affected by it." If the parties, by their subsequent treatment of it and of the property covered by it, converted it into an instrument calculated to delay or defraud creditors, it will be thus rendered fraudulent and void from that time. In Orton v. Orton, 7 Or. 478, 33 Am. Rep. 717, it is held that where, by the provisions of the mortgage, or by an agreement between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, the mortgagor is to remain in possession of the property and may sell the mortgaged property for the benefit of the mortgagor, the mortgage is void as to purchasers and attaching creditors. And in Bremer v. Fleckenstein, 9 Or. 266, where there was a parol agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee that the former might sell the goods at retail and use the proceeds for his own expenses, expense of the business, and to replenish the stock, it is said that such an agreement renders a mortgage void as to other creditors of the mortgagor. This court has recognized that by agreement or provision in the mortgage the mortgagor may remain in possession of the stock of goods and continue to make sales, strictly accounting to the mortgagee for the proceeds of the sales less the expense of making the sales; but by agreement and connivance in disregard of the terms of the mortgage Ford was permitted to use it to ward off his creditors, and yet to proceed to use the goods exclusively for his own benefit without paying the mortgage debt there- 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) from. Thus with the acquiescence of the mortgagee the mortgage became an instrument to hinder and delay creditors, in violation of the terms of the statute. To maintain his preference the mortgagee under such a mortgage must be diligent to require observance of its terms and spirit. This duty is well stated in Sabin v. Wilkins, supra, and in Currie v. Bowman, supra. The Vale bank knew Ford was selling at retail and for credit as well as for cash, keeping no account of such sale nor of the receipts therefrom, although by the mortgage both the expense of making the sales and the purchase of new stock were to be made only on approval of the mortgagee. As beneficiary of the mortgage the Vale bank did not require nor receive any monthly account provided for, or payment to it of the receipts from sales, neither did it control the expenditure of the receipts. In fact, it acquiesced in Ford's methods of conducting the business as he pleased, in total disregard of the mortgage or of its requirements, and without even keeping an account of his doings.

We conclude that the mortgage was executed by Ford for a fraudulent purpose; that the Vale bank accepted it with knowledge of that purpose and for Ford's benefit, and permitted him to conduct the business as he had formerly done and for his own benefit; and that as to other creditors the mortgage was void.

The decree is reversed and a decree will be rendered here adjudging the mortgage to be void.

Petition for rehearing denied.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE W. SHISLER

v.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, Appt.

(239 Pa. 468, 86 Atl. 1019.)

Mandamus — to strike property from plat.

Mandamus will not lie to compel municipal officers to strike private property from a plat of a proposed park, although the property was platted without authority of law; since the plat constitutes merely a cloud on title, for removal of which mandamus is not a proper remedy.

(March 3, 1913.)

Note. — A search has failed to reveal any other cases passing upon the right to mandamus to compel exclusion of property from eminent domain proceedings.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County, granting a writ of mandamus to compel the striking of property from a plat of a park. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James Gay Gordon, Jr., Edwin O. Lewis, and Michael J. Ryan, for appellant:

Mandamus will not lie to compel the director of the department of public works and the chief of the bureau of surveys to strike plaintiff's property from the city plan.

Com. ex rel. Northeastern Rapid Transit R. Co. v. Fitler, 136 Pa. 129, 20 Atl. 424; Com. ex rel. Hamilton v. Pittsburgh, 34 Pa. 496; Lehigh Water Co.'s Appeal, 102 Pa. 515; Com. ex rel. Dist. Atty. v. West Chester, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 542.

Mr. Charles H. Downing, for appellee:

The court below clearly had the right to grant the mandamus.

Com. ex rel. Moulds v. Fleming, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 404; Kell v. Rudy, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 507.

Elkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The mandamus issued in this case directed the director of the department of public works and the chief of the board of surveyors to strike from the city plan certain described property of the plaintiff which it was alleged had been plotted for a proposed public park without authority of law.

The first question for decision is whether mandamus is a proper remedy in such a case. The writ of mandamus only issues where there is no other specific and legal remedy, or when it is expressly authorized to be issued by statute. It does not lie to compel a public officer to do any official act which the law does not impose upon him, or to discharge the duties of his office in a manner not authorized by law, or to do any official act which the law does not expressly or by implication require such officer to perform. Davis v. Patterson, 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 479. In Com. ex rel. Northeastern Rapid Transit R. Co. v. Fitler, 136 Pa. 129, 20 Atl. 424, this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Paxson, said: "Such writ has never been held to be a proper remedy, except where there is a clear legal right in the relator, and a corresponding duty of the defendant, and the want of any other adequate, appropriate, and specific remedy." If the relator has suffered any injury by the plotting of the properties in question on the city plan, it is because a cloud has been cast upon his title, and we are not aware of any authority for holding mandamus to be a proper remedy for removing a cloud upon title to real estate.

We agree, in part at least, with the contention of counsel for appellee, that the city had no authority under the ordinance of 1907 to plot upon the city plan to properties in question, so as to have any binding effect upon the owners thereof. Certainly no such authority is conferred by the acts of May 13, 1857 (P. L. 489), or June 24, 1891 (P. L. 394). It may be that under the act of February 2, 1854 (P. L. 21), the board of surveyors under the general powers therein delegated, and especially that relating to the "planning of the city," may have the authority to prepare for the use and convenience of the city alone; general plans having in contemplation park and other public improvements. But such plans would have no binding effect on anyone, not even upon the city itself, which could change the plans at its pleasure before the necessary legal steps had been taken to appropriate and condemn the land for park purposes. Such proceedings are purely statutory, and the city has no authority to appropriate or condemn lands unless authorized to do so by law. The act of June 26, 1895 (P. L. 349), confers upon cities of the commonwealth the right "to purchase, acquire, enter upon, take, use, and appropriate private property for the purpose of making, enlarging, extending, and maintaining public parks within the corporate limits of such cities, whenever the councils shall, by ordinance or joint resolution, determine thereon." The act of 1891 also empowers cities to purchase, take, and hold ground to use for the purpose of public parks. The method of procedure is set forth in the act of 1895, and it must be followed. If the parties cannot agree as to the purchase price, there must be an appropriation of the land by ordinance, and the damages must be ascertained in the manner set forth in the act. These acts evidently contemplate an immediate appropriation of the lands desired for park purposes, and the ascertainment of damages as of the date when so appropriated.

The ordinance of 1907 did not appropriate the lands in question, and nothing done under that ordinance in any way interfered with the right of the then owner, or any subsequent purchaser, to use or dispose of his property as he thought proper. The ordinance of June 13, 1912, set forth in the answer, was the first appropriation of the land for park purposes upon the part of the city within the meaning of the law. Under the facts averred in the answer, this was a proper appropriation, and the city is bound by it. It now remains for the interested parties to have the damages properly assessed as required by the act. It is true this ordinance was passed after the present proceeding was instituted, and if appellee had any clear legal right to be enforced by a writ of mandamus, it would be necessary to hold that the city acted too late to deprive the landowner of his remedy. But mandamus is not a proper remedy, and therefore this proceeding cannot be sustained.

Decree reversed, and petition dismissed, at the cost of appellee.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 1.)

LYMAN HINCKLEY et al., Respts.,

v.

CITY OF SEATTLE, Appt.

(— Wash. —, 132 Pac. 855.)

Judgment — award in eminent domain — action for injuries due to improvement.

1. An award of damages in an eminent domain proceeding to condemn a portion of an abutting lot for a slope in order to raise the grade of a highway will not preclude an action to hold the municipality liable for damages for injuries caused by the buckling of the surface of the lot and the extension of the slope because the earth proved to be unstable under the weight of the fill.

Public improvements — injury to property — effect of change of grade.

2. The fact that the owner of property abutting on a highway changes its surface to adapt it to use in connection with the street grades does not prevent his holding the city liable for injuries to it by the buckling of the surface in consequence of a fill in the street, although it might not have been affected if it had been left in its natural condition.

(June 13, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiffs' property because of a street improvement constructed by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James E. Bradford and C. B. White, for appellant:

All matters that were, should have been,

might have been, or could have been, raised in the condemnation proceedings, are adjudicated and forever closed in that judgment.

Respondents' own acts materially and naturally contributed to the damage, and hence they are barred from any recovery in this suit or any similar suit.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material facts in this case are not disputed. The plaintiffs are the owners of a lot extending from Dexter avenue to Westlake avenue in the city of Seattle. The lot slopes from Dexter avenue down to Westlake avenue. The city of Seattle condemned the right to raise the grade of Dexter avenue, to widen it 7 feet, and to make a bank with a slope of $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 on the property of the plaintiffs. Damages were assessed and paid by the city, and Dexter avenue was improved in accordance with the original plans and specifications. After the fill had been made, the earth that had been put into Dexter avenue began to sink, and was repeatedly filled by the city. In the meantime plaintiffs had excavated that part of their lot abutting on Westlake avenue, so as to make it level with that street. After a time the fill on the Dexter avenue side of their property began to slide downhill, and the earth in that part of the lot that had been excavated or cut down to the street level bulged or buckled. The foundation of plaintiffs' dwelling house was destroyed, and the house had to be removed. We take it from the record that, barring the pushing down of the fill or bank and the buckling of that part of the lot which had been cut to the level of Westlake avenue, there was no great change in the contour of the land. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages. From a verdict in their favor, the city has appealed.

The first and principal contention of the city is that all of the issues raised in this case were adjudicated in the Dexter avenue regrade case, and that it is not liable for any damages which may have been caused by the weight of the fill imposed upon respondents' property.

Undoubtedly the city believed, when it drew its plans for the regrade of Dexter avenue, that it had condemned enough land for the bank, and to sustain the fill it contemplated, and which it thereafter made in Dexter avenue, abutting plaintiffs' property. Appellant invokes the rule that "all matters that were, should have been, might have been, or could have been, raised in the condemnation proceedings, are adjudicated and forever foreclosed by that judgment." This may be admitted, but it does not answer the question whether a loss that neither party had any reason to anticipate, and the possibility of which, if suggested, would have been rejected as speculative and conjectural by the trial court, can now be compensated in damages. In the case brought by the Olympia Light & P. Co. v. Harris, 58 Wash. 410, 108 Pac. 940, the claimant undertook to show that a ridge which the company purposed to use as a retaining wall for the waters of a lake when raised to a higher level would not successfully retain the waters, but would permit of leakage or seepage, we said: "As to whether it will or not is now conjectural, and must be until it is put to the desired use. If it then should be ascertained that it is ineffectual, respondents have their remedy in an action where the damage can be readily and easily determined from the physical facts then existing, and not as a matter of speculation and conjecture as it must now be." In the Dexter avenue condemnation the city proceeded regularly. It condemned the right to raise the grade and to make a slope on plaintiffs' property of $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 1. It fixed this ratio, because from experience it had found it to be sufficient. On the other hand, plaintiffs graded that part of their lot abutting on Westlake avenue to conform to the established grade. This was a lawful thing to do, a necessary thing to do if the property was to be made available, and a thing to be anticipated in the natural order of events. The thing that was not anticipated was the sinking of the fill in the street, which had to be backfilled for a long time, and which not only added to the weight of the fill, as called for in the plan, but also pushed the slope further down on plaintiffs' property, and from some cause or combination of causes made the earth on the graded part of the lot buckle up. An engineering problem is presented. Manifestly a property owner should not be held to the doctrine of res judicata when he has failed to set up as an item of damages something that was not foreseen by the engineers who drew the plans for the improvement of Dexter avenue, or those who had charge of the work.

We find no hesitation in applying the doctrine of the Casassa Case, reported in 66 Wash. 146, 119 Pac. 13, to the facts in this case. There the city assumed that a 1 to 1 slope would be sufficient. The property owner moved his house back beyond the slope: "When the contractors for the city proceeded with the work of excavation, the slope was not sufficient to hold the soil, which, on account of its character, slid into the cut and carried with it the houses, which were completely demolished." A recovery was had, although it was argued, and with much force, that a plan for a 1 to 1 bank, taking into consideration the "character of the soil and its disposition to slide," was patently deficient, and the consequent damage must have been considered by the jury. A condemnation must proceed along the lines marked out by the condemnor; the property owner cannot anticipate, and will not be heard to speculate upon, possible consequences. They must be reasonably probable. Olympia Light & P. Co. v. Harris, supra. Having in mind these principles, we held that, where the "character of the soil" was such as to defeat the estimates and the opinions of the engineers, more land was occupied than was contemplated, and that additional damages could be recovered. The damage sustained by plaintiffs may be justly attributed to a physical condition,—the character of the underlying soil. The case of Provine v. Seattle, 59 Wash. 681, 110 Pac. 619, is also relied on. In that case the trespass was wilful, and the verdict could have been sustained in any event; it may, however, be considered as authority to sustain the holding that a city cannot take more than it has paid for.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, "by authority of law," which we may assume, for the purposes of this case, is the power of eminent domain, proceeded to construct a connecting line over an embankment between two points on its main track, for the purpose of avoiding a dangerous and expensive curve. The company put into the embankment or fill about 160,000 cubic yards of earth and other filling, when the surface of property owned by an abutting owner irregularly upheaved, so that his building was almost completely wrecked, and was deserted by his tenants. It was the theory of the complainant that the upheaval was due to the deposit of filling material upon soft ground, that the silt and mud were thereby forced back upon adjacent property, "or that the filling material itself moves upon and through the mud, under the surface of his lot and up through that surface, and he insists that from one or the other or both of these causes the surface of the lot has been and is being disturbed." The right to recover damages in such a case is admitted. Herbert v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 43 N. J. Eq. 21, 10 Atl. 872. The same railroad company filled in upon its lands a quantity of earth and raised an embankment of great height, and thereby forced and pressed a large quantity of earth into and upon the lots of another beneath the surface of the same, and thereby upheaved the surface and caused the foundation and walls of the dwelling house thereupon to crack and topple over. Upon this statement of facts it was held that the complainant had a cause of action. Costigan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 54 N. J. L. 233, 23 Atl. 810. In Roushlang v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 115 Ind. 106, 17 N. E. 198, a railway company had received a deed and paid the consideration for land upon which to construct and operate its road. The complaint alleged: "That a portion of the land over which the railroad was constructed was marshy; that through that portion the railway company made an embankment about 12 feet high; that after the road had been used for about six months the embankment . . . began to sink; that, to keep the grade up to the original height, the railway company deposited upon the top of the embankment a large amount of earth, sand, and other material; that, as the same was thus deposited, the embankment kept sinking until the roadbed finally became settled and solid; that a large amount of the earth and other material thus deposited, as it sank, spread and extended under the surface of the land beyond the land of the railway company, and upheaved the plaintiff's land adjoining the right of way and rendered worthless several acres of it."

We understand the law of eminent domain to be the same, whether it is invoked by a city or by a public service corporation, and this case is strangely like the one at bar. There the rule is laid down, as it has been often declared in this state, that, in considering the damages to be assessed, the value of the land appropriated should be considered, together with any injury to the residue of the land naturally resulting, or that might reasonably be expected to result, from the appropriation and construction of the road in a proper manner. In passing upon the main question the court said: "The real question in the case before us is not one of negligence, but of an encroachment upon land outside of the company's right of way. When the company discovered that its roadbed was sinking, could it, without making compensation, or the payment of damages, have gone upon appellant's land and constructed walls or banks to prevent the roadbed from sinking and spreading? Clearly not. That it did not do, but, what in effect was the same thing, it filled in earth and other materials until the embankment spread out beyond the right of way upon appellant's adjoining lands, and upheaved the surface and caused the injury described in the complaint. It may be that the company had no knowledge that the filling would cause the spreading of the embankment and the upheaval of appellant's land. Whether or not it had such knowledge is not stated in the complaint; nor do we think that it is material in this case. By reason of the filling upon the embankment it was caused to spread upon appellant's land, and caused the injury. That the railway company may have had no knowledge that the filling would cause the injury is not sufficient to exonerate it from liability. The fact remains that appellant granted to the railway company a strip of land upon which to construct and operate its road, and it has so constructed it as to make it rest, not only upon the strip thus granted, but also upon his adjoining land not granted. The railway company is thus occupying land which was not granted to it, and which neither party intended should be either granted to it or occupied by its road. The road is no less an encroachment upon appellant's land because its foundation is beneath the surface. That fact might affect the amount of damages, but it does not alter the rights of the parties. The railway company had a right to construct its road upon the strip of land granted, but it has no right to occupy additional land without compensation or the payment of damages. The strip of land was granted before the road was constructed, and hence the consideration paid must be presumed to have been measured by the value of the land granted and the anticipated damages, in the light of surrounding circumstances and the knowledge of the parties at that time. It surely was not intended at that time that the roadbed should cover and rest upon land outside of the strip granted. Nor could it have been anticipated that in the construction of the road land outside of the right of way would be occupied by the roadbed or any portion of it. It would not be reasonable, therefore, to assume that, in fixing the compensation, the parties included damages for such encroachment. Had the strip of land been taken by condemnation instead of by grant, the commissioners or jury, in assessing the damages, could not have included damages from such encroachment: First, because they could not have assumed that the railway company would voluntarily so construct its road as to make it rest partially upon land outside of the right of way. To have assumed that, and to have assessed damages accordingly, would have been to assume that the railway company would commit a trespass, and to have assessed, in advance, damages resulting from such trespass. Second, because they could not have known in advance that the result of the fill would be to cause the embankment to so spread as to encroach upon appellant's land and cause injury. Such an injury could not reasonably have been expected to result from the proper construction of the road. It will not be presumed that the parties included in the price agreed upon at the time of and for the grant any amount for injuries which could not properly have been considered by the commissioners and jury, had the right of way been taken by condemnation proceedings."

To further sustain its position that the damages now claimed cannot be recovered in another suit, the city cites and relies upon the following cases: Compton v. Seattle, 38 Wash. 514, 80 Pac. 757; Johnson v. Spokane, 72 Wash. 298, 130 Pac. 341; Carpenter-McNeill Invest. Co. v. Spokane, — Wash. —, 131 Pac. 823; and for the sake of future reference the case of Grosshoff v. Spokane, — Wash. —, 132 Pac. 643, may be added. In the Compton Case the court held that the matters sought to be litigated in the principal case were actually litigated in the condemnation case. In the Johnson Case the item sought to the recovered was on account of the lowering of the surface of the street, and the court held, as it held in the Grosshoff Case, that this was a question that was open to the plaintiff, and might have been litigated in the condemnation suit. In the Carpenter-McNeill Case the work which it was alleged was negligently performed had been done at the time the condemnation suit was tried. It was accordingly held that the plaintiff could have set up in that suit all damages claimed by him, not only on account of the physical change of the grade, but all that had resulted from the manner in which the work was done. The corner stone of that case was the statute (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 7820). We find nothing in these cases that would defeat the right of these plaintiffs to recover.

There are other assignments of error predicated upon the instructions. The pleadings were drawn upon the theory of negligence, and the plea of contributory negligence was tendered as a defense. Upon the oral argument it seemed to be conceded by all parties that this is not a case of negligence. If it were so, we would hold that the plaintiffs were not guilty of contributory negligence in excavating that part of their lot abutting on Westlake avenue.

We have not overlooked the contention of the city that, if the property had been left in its natural condition, there would have been no disturbance. This is not sound. City property located upon the slope of a hill must ordinarily be put to some use, and, if necessary, must be cut or filled. As hereinbefore suggested, the owner cannot be held negligent or his recovery defeated if he pursues his lawful right; otherwise the law would demand that all property taken or damaged for a public use be bought outright.

The case was not tried upon a correct theory of the law, but we are satisfied that plaintiffs are entitled to a judgment against the defendant, and the amount of the verdict not being seriously challenged, we will not discuss the questions raised on the instructions.

Affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.
(In Banc.)

WILLIAM CAPP et al., Resp'ts.,
v.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS, Appt.

(— Mo. —, 158 S. W. 616.)

Negligence — dangerous premises — public parks — turntable cases.

1. The conditions necessary to liability under the doctrine of the turntable cases are not necessary to hold a municipality liable for the death of a child drowned in a dangerous pond in a public park, where it had a perfect right to play.

Municipal corporation — unsafe condition in park — negligence.

2. A municipal corporation may be found negligent in maintaining in a public park, where many children resort to play, a pond several feet deep formed in a small stream in which they are in the habit of wading, by water from a storm sewer which the municipality turned into the stream, so as to render it liable for the death of a child drowned while playing there.

Evidence — sufficiency — presumption as to death.

3. That a boy is not shown to have been drowned in the pond where his body was found does not justify the sustaining of a demurrer to evidence in an action against the one responsible for the maintenance of the pond, where he was last seen wading in the stream a short distance above the pond, where the water was only a few inches deep, on the theory that he may have drowned in the stream and his body been washed into the pond.

(Lamm, Ch. J., and Graves and Brown, JJ., dissent.)

Note.—As to liability of municipality for injuries through unsafe conditions in parks or public grounds other than streets, see note to Bisbing v. Asbury Park, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 523.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the death of their minor son, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lambert E. Walther and William E. Baird, for appellant:

If an injury may have resulted from more than one cause, for one of which, and not the other, the defendant is liable, it must be shown with reasonable certainty that the cause for which the defendant may be liable produced the result, and if the evidence leaves it to conjecture, the question cannot be submitted to the jury.

Per Curiam:

The following attached opinion, written by Woodson, J., in division, was adopted by the court in banc. All concur, except Lamm, Ch. J., and Graves and Brown, JJ.

Woodson, J., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiffs brought this suit in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis against the defendant to recover the sum of $10,000 damages sustained by them on account of the death of their minor son, Cecil Capp, caused by the alleged negligence of the city in not properly guarding a pool of water (which will be presently described) in Forest park, in which the deceased fell and was drowned. A trial was had before the court and a jury, and after hearing the evidence and the instructions of the court, the jury found the issues for the plaintiffs, and assessed their damages at $2,500. Upon the verdict of the jury, the court rendered judgment for the plaintiffs, and after taking the proper preliminary steps therefor, the defendant duly appealed the cause to this court.

No question is raised as to the sufficiency of the pleadings, and we will therefore pass them by. The facts are practically undisputed, and are as follows:

The plaintiffs were husband and wife, and the deceased was their lawful son. The city of St. Louis is a municipal corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Missouri, known as the "Scheme and Charter." That Forest park is a public park belonging to, and was under the management and control of, the city. Through the park ran a small stream of water known as the "River Des Peres." Many years prior to the happening of this unfortunate incident, the city constructed what is known in the record as "Euclid Avenue storm sewer," which drained a large part of the city of St. Louis, as well as a considerable part of the territory of St. Louis county, which emptied into the River Des Peres at a point in the park where the deceased was drowned. The park was large, having an area of more than 1,400 acres, and said river, in its ordinary stages, was insignificant, no larger than an ordinary creek, but in times of storm, the waters thereof, accompanied with those of said sewer, became and were a mighty torrent, swift, turbulent, and terrible in its flow to the Merriam and to the "Father of Waters." At the junction of said sewer with said river, the waters of the former in full flow had, many years prior to the accident, washed out the bed of the river, and thereby caused to exist therein an excavation about 60 feet in diameter and of a depth varying from a few inches at the outer margin, to some 10 or 12 feet in the center, which for years had been filled with water and refuse from said sewer and river. At the junction of the river and the sewer, the outlet thereof is about 10 feet in breadth and 14 in height, with perpendicular walls constructed of stone with cap rocks on top which are about 18 inches higher than the adjacent surface of the ground. Immediately adjacent to the mouth of the sewer, there are four stone steps 12 feet long and 6 inches thick, leading therefrom down to the water, two of which are generally covered with the water of the pool, and the other two are above the water line.

The River Des Peres is wholly unguarded in its entire length, as it passes through the park; and boys and children, with the knowledge, if not the acquiescence, of the city, have been in the constant habit of wading in the bed of said river, from early spring until late fall, and to skate thereon in the winter time. The park is one of the great public resorts of the world, constantly frequented by many men, women and children. The World's Fair was held therein in 1904, which was visited by millions of people, and it has continued to be the greatest public resort of the city ever since. It is highly improved, carefully attended and cared for, constantly guarded and policed, by and at the great cost of the city. Some 200 feet from the mouth of the sewer, there is a fine spring, and a path leading therefrom to the Lindall boulevard and Kingshighway entrances to the park, which pass within a few feet of the mouth of said sewer. This was the most frequented part of the park.

The last time the deceased was seen alive was July 10, 1908, when he and another boy named — Ulrich, about the same age, were seen by a mounted policeman named Hutton, wading in said river about 100 feet above said pool. On or about the 12th day of July, the body of Ulrich was discovered floating in said pond, and when the father of Cecil Capp heard of that fact, knowing that the deceased and Ulrich left home together, he began to search the pond for his son, with the result that on the 15th of July, he found the body of his son therein. Both of them had been drowned. When discovered, the pants of the deceased were rolled up as far as they could be, and there was some evidence which tended to show that the sleeves of his shirt were likewise rolled up. The evidence also showed that boys and children generally were in the habit of wading in said river, and were in the habit of fishing for crawfish therein, and playing in and about the mouth of the sewer and on the steps mentioned. Such additional facts as may be necessary for a proper disposition of the case will be considered in the course of the opinion.

I. The city assigns but two errors in its brief, but discussed a third in the oral argument of the case in this court, namely, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the city in keeping, managing, and controlling the park. We will consider this question first, but preliminary thereto it should be borne in mind that the public parks of the cities, while designated for the use of all classes, nevertheless it is common knowledge that they are in fact more generally used and occupied by the middle and poorer classes of our citizens, who have not the means to justify them in going to the mountains, the seashore, or foreign countries for rest and recreation, as is the custom and practice of the wealthy and more fortunate class.

During the open and warm seasons of the year the parks are usually filled with the women and minor children of the poor, and especially the latter, who are usually sent there alone for safety, recreation, and amusement, while their parents are down town earning their bread by the sweat of their faces. One of the most important, if not the principal, quality or beneficial element of a public park, is the safety it throws around the unprotected youth and indiscreet of the state, placed therein by their toiling parents, chiefly for the safeguards supposed to be thrown around them, and incidentally for play and recreation, while they, the parents, earn a living for themselves and children. Were it not for the supposed safety of the parks, the poor of the cities would be compelled to either personally guard their minor children, which would materially impair their earning power, or they would have to turn their children loose upon the public streets of the city, where they would be constantly liable to come in contact with the numerous vices and dangerous agencies ever present therein. It is largely for this protection of life and limb, and the separation of the youth of the country from vice and dangers, that these parks are created and maintained at such enormous cost and expense to the cities and people of the state, without which they would be absolutely worthless. That being unquestionably true, the public parks of the cities should be maintained in a reasonably safe condition for those who frequent and use them, and especially for the unprotected youth.

The evidence is undisputed that the city of St. Louis created and maintains this inexcusable nuisance, which is a constant menace to the lives of the children who visit Forest park. Common sense and common experience teach us that this inexcusable nuisance can be abated at a trifling expense to the city, probably at a sum not to exceed one half of the cost of defending this suit; and why should it not be done? It has already claimed for its vicious reward the lives of two bright and innocent boys, who were as sweet, near, and dear to their parents as our children are to us. But no, echoes the city, through the voice and pen of her able and worthy city counselor, I will maintain this horrible nuisance, right in the heart of the principal playground of the children of the metropolis of this state, which is giving forth its offensive odors and sickly and deadly germs every day and night of its existence, to say nothing of its ever-yawning mouth, ever ready to swallow up the body of any and all children who may happen perchance to play thereat, or who may wade into its unknown depth, but well-known filth and slime.

And in this connection it might be said that much confusion has been injected into this class of cases by applying to it the doctrine applicable to the turntable cases. That rule has no application whatever to this case, or to the class to which it belongs. In this class the injury occurred, and of necessity must occur, at a place where the injured party had both the legal and moral right to be, while in the turntable cases the injury occurred, and of necessity must have occurred, on private property, a place where the injured person had no legal right to be, but was induced to go there by an attractive piece of machinery or other matters equally attractive to children.

The confusion mentioned grows out of the fact that there is another class of cases akin to this, where the injury occurs upon private property, namely, in the reservoirs of waterworks of the municipalities of the country, or in other private ponds and pools of water. In those cases the injured child is concededly a trespasser, but is attracted there by the water of the reservoir, pool, or pond, which the owner knows will instinctively attract children; and in some of the states, even in the latter class, the injured party or his representative is permitted to recover, while in others that right is denied. The authorities supporting the latter class are cited as authorities in the class to which the case at bar belongs, for the reason that if a recovery can be had in the former, where the injured party is a trespasser, then a fortiori a recovery should be had in this, the latter, where the injured party had a lawful right to be.

In this case, the son of the plaintiffs lost his life in a pool of water located in a public park, a place where the child had the right to be; but the record fails to show that either the boy or his parents had any knowledge of the depth of the pool. So in the consideration of this case, care should be taken so as not to confuse the principles of law governing it with those controlling the turntable cases, for the obvious reason that one might be entitled to a recovery in this class, and not in that.

Returning to the contention of counsel, previously stated, namely, that the record contains no evidence of negligence on the part of the city, the uncontradicted evidence shows that Forest park was a public resort for men, women, and children, and that thousands visited it daily, and especially children, boys, and girls; also that they were in the habit of wading, playing, and fishing in said river, and playing on and about the steps at the mouth of the sewer, where there was a pool of water from 8 to 12 feet deep in the center. This pool was caused by the waters of the stream flowing down and over the steps mentioned, and washing the dirt and soil from the bed of the river, thereby making an excavation therein which filled up with the waters thereof. This pool had existed for years, and unquestionably the city had knowledge of its existence, which the evidence shows could have been filled up or guarded at a very small cost. The park being a public place, and containing this unguarded pool of water, and frequented by many children, young and indiscreet, at the invitation of the city, who we all know are greatly attracted by pools of water, bubbling brooks, and running streams, made the situation highly attractive and dangerous to any and all children who might approach the place and play in or about the stream and pool.

That evidence, in my opinion, was sufficient to warrant the court in submitting to the jury the question whether or not said conduct of the city was such as an ordinarily prudent person would have done under similar circumstances. If it was, then the city was not liable for the damages done; 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

if, upon the contrary, it was not, then the city was liable. That was a question of fact which the trial court, in my opinion, properly submitted to the jury, which I believe is supported by the following authorities: Williams, Mun. Liability for Tort, § 184; Carey v. Kansas City, 187 Mo. 715, 70 L.R.A. 65, 86 S. W. 438; Barthold v. Philadelphia, 154 Pa. 109, 26 Atl. 304; Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65, 9 N. E. 155; Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484; Price v. Atchison Water Co. 58 Kan. 551, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625, 50 Pac. 450; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 661, 21 L. ed. 745; Edmondson v. Moberly, 98 Mo. 523, 11 S. W. 990; Lowe v. Salt Lake City, 13 Utah, 91, 57 Am. St. Rep. 708, 44 Pac. 1050; Schmidt v. Kansas City Distilling Co. 90 Mo. loc. cit. 294, 59 Am. Rep. 16, 1 S. W. 865, 2 S. W. 417; Straub v. St. Louis, 175 Mo. 413, 75 S. W. 100, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 384.

In the case of Carey v. Kansas City, 187 Mo. 715, 70 L.R.A. 65, 86 S. W. 438, the city owned and converted a part of a block of ground on which was located its water reservoir, into a public park, and on a level with the coping of the reservoir wall, the city built a walk or park way, and on the outer edge of the coping it built a wire fence 4½ feet high. While the eleven-year-old son of the plaintiffs was playing in and about the premises, he fell into the reservoir and was drowned. This court, in a unanimous opinion written by Judge Fox, held that the care required of the city was that care which an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised under similar circumstances. But under the facts of that case, the court further held, and properly so, that the city was under no legal obligation to construct a fence around the reservoir, which would be impossible for boys to climb over, but only such a fence as would prevent children who had reasonable respect for the wishes of the owner of the property, from trespassing upon it. That case clearly holds, and properly so, that the law imposes upon Kansas City the imperative duty of keeping the public parks thereof in a reasonably safe condition for persons using the same for pleasure, amusement, or recreation, and especially for children while engaged in their innocent sports, plays, and recreations.

In the case of Barthold, the supreme court of Pennsylvania tersely stated the law and facts as follows: "Turning therefore to the evidence, we find it was shown that the pool or well in which the plaintiff's son lost his life was upon ground acquired by the city some six months before the accident, for the purpose of adding it to Fairmount park. It was not only upon the public grounds, but was open of access to persons of all ages. The wall that enclosed it was lower than the surrounding surface. The plaintiff's son came to the pool to wash his shoes, and sat down upon a stone which was part of, or was lying upon, this wall. The stone tipped under his weight, and he fell backward into the water and was drowned. The stone on which he sat fell at the same time into the pool. Whether it was the exercise of proper care on the part of the city to leave this pool for six months in the condition described, open to the access of children in the public grounds, was not a question of law, but of fact, and properly submitted to the jury. We have nothing to do with the correctness of their finding."

There is no difference whatever in principle between that case and the case at bar; the facts, however, in this case show far more culpability on the part of the officers and agents of the city of St. Louis, than those did on the officers of Philadelphia.

In the case of Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 58 Am. Rep. 65, 9 N. E. 155, the petition charged that the city, while constructing a bridge in one of the streets thereof, made an excavation in the bed of a small stream where it crossed said street; also constructed a levee from the bank of the stream to said excavation or pit, and knowing that the children of persons residing near there were in the habit of playing in the absence of the workmen, without safeguards of any kind; and in consequence thereof the child of the defendant (in error), without negligence on his part, while at play, fell into the pit and was drowned, etc. The city demurred to the petition, for the reason that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against it, which was by the trial court overruled. Thereafter, the city carried the case to the supreme court of Indiana on writ of error (I suppose, though the report says "appeal"), and the court, in sustaining the rulings of the trial court, used this language:

"The initial proposition upon which the appellant rests its argument against the sufficiency of the complaint is that it does not appear from the facts averred that the city was guilty of any breach of duty in respect to the plaintiff or his child. That the liability of the city can only be affirmed upon the theory that it has violated its duty in the premises is too clear for serious controversy. Speaking upon the subject as applied to an adult, this court, in the case of Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Griffin, 100 Ind. 221, 50 Am. Rep. 783, used the following language: 'Before it can be affirmed that the appellant was negligent with respect to the transaction concerning which its omission is imputed to it as wrongful, it must appear that it was under some legal duty or obligation to the plaintiff at the time when and place where the injury occurred, which was left undischarged. If it is liable at all, this is the foundation upon which its liability rests.' Lary v. Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. 78 Ind. 323, 41 Am. Rep. 572. In respect to cases such as we are considering, a learned author says: 'It is important to bear in mind in actions for injuries to children, a very simple and fundamental fact which in this class of cases is sometimes strangely lost sight of, viz., that no action arises without a breach of duty.' 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 1183, note.

"With this rule in view, and with the further concession that, in dealing with cases which involve injuries to children, courts and juries have sometimes strangely confounded legal obligations with sentiments that are independent of law, it must nevertheless be kept in mind that wherever an adult may be without incurring the imputation of being an intruder, a child may also go free from the like imputation. The same circumstances which would justify a recovery by one who had reached years of discretion, and had sustained an injury from the act of another while free from fault, would justify a recovery by an infant of such years as to be incapable of fault, provided its parents or guardian were also guilty of no neglect which could be imputed to the child. And so, conversely, except when a child is seen in time so that injury to it might be avoided, persons who are lawfully using or carrying on business on their own premises are not liable for injuries to children, unless under the same circumstances they would have been liable to others who were equally free from fault.

"The conclusion to be drawn from the approved cases on the subject is that the owner of premises who has neither expressly nor impliedly invited the public to come upon or pass over his grounds is under no legal obligation to keep them free from pitfalls, or in a condition of safety, for those who in the pursuit of their own pleasure or convenience pass over such premises, even though it be with the acquiescence of the owner. Persons passing over premises of that description exercise the privilege with its attending perils, and this without distinction as to whether or not they have arrived at an age of discretion. Unless contrivances are placed on such premises with an actual or constructive intent to hurt intruders, the proprietor is not liable for injuries resulting to persons by reason of the condition in which the premises have been left, or from the prosecution of a business thereon, in which the owner had a right to engage. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Griffin, 100 Ind. 221, 225, 50 Am. Rep. 783, and cases cited; Gillespie v. McGowan, 100 Pa. 144, 45 Am. Rep. 365; Gramlich v. Wurst, 86 Pa. 74, 27 Am. Rep. 684; Cauley v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 95 Pa. 398, 40 Am. Rep. 664; McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 26 Am. Rep. 555; Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1; Burdick v. Cheadle, 26 Ohio St. 393, 20 Am. Rep. 767.

"The foregoing, and many other analogous cases which might be cited, proceed upon the theory that the person sought to be held liable had done nothing to produce injury to others who voluntarily strayed upon or invaded the premises on which the injury occurred. In all such cases the owner may dig an excavation in his own land not substantially adjoining a public highway, and no action lies against him by one who has fallen into the excavation. Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire R. Co. 4 Hurlst. & N. 67, 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 139, 5 Jur. N. S. 150, 7 Week. Rep. 326; Hounsell v. Smyth, 29 L. J. C. P. N. S. 203, 7 C. B. N. S. 731, 6 Jur. N. S. 897, 1 L. T. N. S. 440, 8 Week. Rep. 277; Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Bingham, 29 Ohio St. 364, 23 Am. Rep. 751; Sweeny v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644; Knight v. Abert, 6 Pa. 472, 47 Am. Dec. 478; Nicholson v. Erie R. Co. 41 N. Y. 525.

"But there is a clear distinction between the cases cited and the case where an excavation is made in or so near a highway, as that one, while rightfully using the highway, may without fault sustain injury by falling into the excavation. Not less clear is the distinction between a case in which an excavation is made, or something calculated to amuse or attract children is done or left, at a place where the child has a right to be, and one in which the same thing is done at a place where, in order to reach the place of danger, the child becomes an intruder upon the premises of another.

"Whoever, while passing along, or when properly in a public street, suffers an injury while exercising the degree of care which the law requires of such persons, by falling into an excavation which has been made in or near such street, is entitled to maintain an action for such injury against the person making the excavation. In such a case, the person making the excavation comes under an obligation to make it safe in respect to all persons who have a right to use the street.

"Streets are open to persons of all ages, and children are and must be permitted, to some extent at least, to go upon the streets of towns and cities, without incurring the imputation of negligence upon themselves 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or their parents. It would be intolerable to hold, as a matter of law, that a parent, having no knowledge of the presence or probability of danger, was nevertheless guilty of negligence in permitting a five-year-old child to pass beyond the dooryard into the street without an attendant. Whoever, therefore, does anything in, or immediately adjacent to, a public street, calculated to attract children of the vicinity into danger which they cannot appreciate, owes the duty of protecting them by suitably guarding the source of danger, or in case this is impracticable, by giving timely warning to their parents and guardians of the existence of the danger. Chicago v. Hesing, 83 Ill. 204, 25 Am. Rep. 378; Chicago v. Major, 18 Ill. 349, 68 Am. Dec. 553; Niblett v. Nashville, 12 Heisk. 684, 27 Am. Rep. 755; Graves v. Thomas, 95 Ind. 361, 48 Am. Rep. 727; McAlpin v. Powell, 70 N. Y. 126, 26 Am. Rep. 555; Beck v. Carter, 68 N. Y. 283, 23 Am. Rep. 175; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1005. The right of a child to go or be in or upon a street is in no way dependent upon the occupation or pecuniary condition of its parents. Mayhew v. Burns, 103 Ind. 328, 2 N. E. 793.

"If a person of discretion, while attempting to pass over the stream in question where it crossed Spruce street, had fallen into the pit into which the child fell, no doubt could be entertained that such person, if free from contributory fault, might have recovered for an injury sustained; or if the plaintiff, without knowledge of the pit, had permitted his horse to go there for water, and it had fallen into the unguarded hole and had been injured, the liability of the city would have been beyond question. As we have seen, the liability of the city is precisely the same in case a child rightfully in a street sustains injury from a defect created therein by the city, as in the case of an adult who is injured while free from fault, from a like cause. It would shock all sense of justice to hold that a city might dig a pit in a street and leave it so that children might be lured into it, and yet deny to parents who were without fault any remedy for the loss of a child.

"Considered in the light of what has been said, it seems clear to us that the demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The excavation into which the appellee's son fell was made in Spruce street, at a point where it crosses Pleasant run. It was made in the bed of a shallow stream, and left alone unguarded on a July day, with knowledge that children were accustomed to play in the vicinity. The city must be held to know that children are attracted to such a place in July weather.

They were not intruders. It was gross carelessness on the part of the city, with such knowledge, to leave an unguarded pit filled with water in the street, into which an unsuspecting child might fall."

The same law that requires a municipal corporation to keep its streets free from nuisances, and reasonably safe for those who lawfully use them, also imposes upon it the duty to keep its public parks and other public places in a reasonably safe condition for all who lawfully frequent and use them.

The case of Price v. Atchison Water Co. 58 Kan. 551, 62 Am. St. Rep. 625, 50 Pac. 450, is very interesting, able, and instructive. While the defendant in that case was a private corporation, and the accident occurred on private property, nevertheless it is a strong authority in support of the defendant's liability in the case at bar. In fact, the reason is all the stronger for holding a public or municipal corporation liable for the death of a person occurring on public grounds, than it is for holding a private corporation responsible therefor when occurring on private property. The opinion was written by Chief Justice Doster, conceded to be one of the ablest jurists of the country; the facts and the law applicable thereto were stated in the following language:

"Melrose H. Price, the son of plaintiffs in error, a bright, intelligent boy of about eleven years of age, was drowned in one of the reservoirs of the defendant in error. These reservoirs were two in number, and were situated in or near the corporate limits of the city of Atchison, in immediate proximity to a section of the residence portion of the city. They were of unequal size; one having a capacity of about 1,100,000 gallons, the other about 3,000,000 gallons. The smaller one was used as a 'settling basin,' into which the water was pumped, and from whence it was discharged into the larger one through a pipe. The opening of this pipe into the larger basin was covered with an 'apron' made of lumber, and designed to break the force of the water discharge and prevent injury to the walls of the reservoir. It was partially buoyed by the water, and rose and fell as the water supply increased or lessened. For 4 feet from the top, the walls of the smaller reservoir were perpendicular, and thence slanted to the bottom; and its basin was about 10 feet in depth in the deepest part. The walls of the larger reservoir slanted at an angle of about 45 degrees, and its basin had a depth in its lowest part of about 15 feet. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for a person falling into the larger basin to get out unaided, on account of the steepness of the walls. These reservoirs and appurtenant grounds occupied about 3 acres, and were attractive places for children, many of whom frequented there for fishing and for other sports. They were inclosed with a barb-wire fence ten to twelve wires high. There were two gates through the fence, which, however, were always kept closed, and two rudely constructed contrivances designed for stiles, but being, as described by some of the witnesses, 'sheds,' or large boxes, nailed to adjacent trees and inclosing most of the wires, but upon and over which it was not difficult for boys to climb from the outside. A watchman and custodian of these grounds was employed by the defendant. He was aware of the habit of the boys of the town to climb over the stiles, and permitted them to do so without objection. The boy Melrose, without the consent or knowledge of his parents, went with some companions to the reservoirs in question to fish and play, and venturing upon the apron before described, for the purpose of crossing from one part of the reservoir wall to another, the end which projected out upon the water sank, precipitating him into the basin, where he drowned. Immediately upon starting to go upon the apron, one of his companions called to him and warned him of the danger of so going, saying to him he might fall in. To this he replied, 'Oh, no!' His parents had frequently warned him of the danger of going to the reservoir, and he had trespassed there but once before, and then without their knowledge.

"The plaintiffs in error sued to recover damages for the loss of their son, occasioned by the negligent maintenance of the reservoir, and the negligence of the defendant in permitting him access to the dangerous situation described. The above statement summarizes the evidence for the plaintiff. To this evidence a demurrer for insufficiency to prove a cause of action was sustained. This action of the court is alleged as error, and is brought here for review. The contention arising upon the above state of facts divides itself into two principal questions: First, was the defendant in error negligent, as to the deceased boy, in maintaining the dangerous reservoir? and, second, was the deceased guilty of contributory negligence in venturing upon the slanting wall and projecting apron? These are questions of fact, and they should have been left to the jury for determination. They are not questions of law for decision by the court.

"It is, however, contended by the defendant in error, that, inasmuch as the deceased was a trespasser upon its grounds, it owed to him no duty to guard against the accident which occurred. Without doubt, the common law exempts the owner of private grounds from obligation to keep them in a safe condition for the benefit of trespassers, idlers, bare licensees, or others who go upon them not by invitation, express or implied, but for pleasure or through curiosity. Cooley, Torts 2d ed. 718; 1 Thomp. Neg. 303; Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 60, 38 L.R.A. 573, 66 Am. St. Rep. 856, 41 S. W. 62. The common law, however, does not permit the owner of private grounds to keep thereon allurements to the natural instincts of human or animal kind, without taking reasonable precautions to insure the safety of such as may be thereby attracted to his premises. To maintain upon one's property enticements to the ignorant or unwary is tantamount to an invitation to visit and to inspect and enjoy; and in such cases the obligation to endeavor to protect from the dangers of the seductive instrument or place follows as justly as though the invitation had been express. The rule collected out of the authorities is vigorously, but not too strongly, stated in 1 Thompson on Negligence, 304, 305: 'There is also a class of cases which hold proprietors liable for injuries resulting to children although trespassing at the time, where, from the peculiar nature and open and exposed position of the dangerous defect or agent, the owner should reasonably anticipate such an injury to flow therefrom as actually happened. In such case, the question of negligence is for the jury. It would be a barbarous rule of law that would make the owner of land liable for setting a trap thereon baited with meat, so that his neighbor's dog attracted by his natural instincts might run into it and be killed, and which would exempt him from liability for the consequences of leaving exposed and unguarded on his land a dangerous machine, so that his neighbor's child, attracted to it, and tempted to intermeddle with it by instincts equally strong, might thereby be killed or maimed for life. Such is not the law.'

"The principle involved is the same as that upon which those actions known as the 'turntable cases' have been resolved, and in which it has been held, with few exceptions, that the maintenance in an unguarded manner, of a dangerous apparatus for the shifting of locomotives, attractive to children residing or accustomed to playing near by, constitutes negligence upon the part of the companies. In one of these cases, it was quite well remarked by Mr. Justice Valentine: 'Everybody knowing the nature and instincts common to all boys must act accordingly. No person has a right to leave, even on his own land, dangerous machinery calculated to attract and entice boys to it, there to be injured, unless he first take proper steps to guard against all danger; and any person who does thus leave dangerous machinery exposed, without first providing against all danger, is guilty of negligence. It is a violation of the beneficent maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. It is true that the boys in such cases are technically trespassers. But even trespassers have rights which cannot be ignored, as numerous cases which we might cite would show.' Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 691, 31 Am. Rep. 203.

"The reasons upon which these cases proceed, and the authorities supporting the rule, are strongly set forth in Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393. They are, in brief, that, where a person maintains upon his premises anything dangerous to life or limb, and of a nature to invite the intrusion of children, he owes them a duty of precaution against harm, and is liable to them for injury from that thing, even though their own act, if not negligent, puts in operation its hurtful agency. One may not bait his premises with some dangerous instrument or quality alluring to the incautious or vagrant, and then deny responsibility for the consequences of following the natural instincts of curiosity or amusement aroused thereby, without taking reasonable precautions to guard against the accidents liable to ensue. Rights can only be enjoyed subject to those limitations which regard for the weaknesses and deficiencies of others dictate to be humane and just. This rule has been applied, not only in the turntable cases, but to others in which dangerous situations have been negligently maintained, and especially to cases of death or injury by falling into unguarded pools or vats of water. Brinkley Car Works & Mfg. Co. v. Cooper, 60 Ark. 545, 46 Am. St. Rep. 216, 31 S. W. 154; Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 27 L.R.A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114, 39 N. E. 484.

"Counsel for defendant in error endeavors to distinguish the turntable and other like cases from the one under discussion, upon the ground that, in such first-mentioned cases, the dangerous instruments or places were not inclosed so as to exclude or warn trespassers, while, in the present case, the reservoirs had been so fenced as to render access to them difficult, to say the least, and in any event to operate as notice to stay on the outside because of the dangerous situation within. Whatever merit such precautionary measures might have under other circumstances, it is sufficient to say that, in this case, they were not reasonably effective; because it was the daily habit of trespassing boys to mount the fence and frequent the reservoirs on the inside, and this habit was known to the company's responsible agent, and was not only tolerated, but went unrebuked by him. Knowing the fence to be ineffective either as barrier or warning, it was the duty of the company to expel the intruders, or adopt other measures to avoid accident. Whatever advantage the defendant in error might have gained from the erection of a reasonably effective barrier or warning is neutralized by the facts of its knowledge that the boys did trespass, and its permission to them to do so. It is as though no fence at all had been erected."

In the case at bar, the deceased child, in addition to having been attracted to the stream and pool in which he was drowned, by his strong boyish instincts to play, wade, paddle, and fish in the waters thereof, he, and all other children of the city, and adults for that matter, were invited upon the premises to indulge without restraint those childish desires, unprotected from the great dangers incident to their very existence.

The case of Pekin v. McMahon, supra, was a suit by the parents of a child eight years old, to recover damages for its death, caused by the alleged negligence of the city in maintaining a deep pit on lots belonging to it, filled with water, and only partially fenced, into which it fell while playing about it, and was drowned. The supreme court of Illinois, in passing upon that question, used this language:

"The general rule is well settled that the private owner or occupant of land is under no obligations to strangers to place guards around excavations upon his land. The law does not require him to keep his premises in safe condition for the benefit of trespassers, or those who come upon them without invitation either express or implied, and merely to seek their own pleasure or gratify their own curiosity. 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 303; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. (4th ed.) § 715. An exception, however, to this general rule exists in favor of children. Although a child of tender years, who meets with an injury upon the premises of a private owner, may be a technical trespasser, yet the owner may be liable, if the things causing the injury have been left exposed and unguarded, and are of such a character as to be an attraction to the child, appealing to his childish curiosity and instincts. Unguarded premises which are thus supplied with dangerous attractions are regarded as holding out implied invitations to such children. The owner of land where children are allowed or accustomed to play, particularly if it is unfenced, must use ordinary care to keep it in safe condition; for they, being without judgment and likely to be drawn by childish curiosity into places of danger, are not to be classed with trespassers, idlers, and mere licensees.' 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 705; 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 53, and cases in note. In such case, the owner should reasonably anticipate the injury which has happened. 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 304.

"There is conflict in the decisions upon this subject, some courts holding in favor of the liability of the private owner, and others ruling against it. Where the land of a private owner is in a thickly settled city, adjacent to a public street or alley, and he has upon it, or suffers to be upon it, dangerous machinery, or a dangerous pit or pond of water, or any other dangerous agency, at a point thereon near such public street or alley, of such a character as to be attractive to children of tender years incapable of exercising ordinary care, and he is aware or has notice of its attractions for children of that class, we think that he is under obligations to use reasonable care to protect them from injury when coming upon said premises, even though they may be technical trespassers. To charge him with such an obligation under such circumstances is merely to apply the well known maxim, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. It is true, as a general rule, that a party guilty of negligence is not liable if he does not owe the duty which he has neglected to the person claiming damages. Williams v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 135 Ill. 491, 11 L.R.A. 352, 25 Am. St. Rep. 397, 26 N. E. 661. But, though the private owner may owe no duty to an adult under the facts stated, the cases known as the turntable cases hold that such duty is due from him to a child of tender years.

"The leading one of the turntable cases is Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745. There the company was held liable in an action by a child about six years old, who had injured his foot while playing with a turntable belonging to the company, although it was contended that he was a trespasser and had received the injury because of his own negligence, and that the company owed him no duty; it appearing that the turntable was located upon the private grounds of the company in a settlement of from 100 to 150 persons, about 80 rods from the depot, near two traveled roads, and was a dangerous machine, and was not guarded or fastened, and that a servant of the company had previously seen boys playing there, and had forbidden them to do so; and it was further held that the care and caution required of a child is according to his maturity and capacity, and is to be determined by the circumstances of each case; that the fact of the child being a technical trespasser made no difference in his right of recovery; that the question of the defendant's negligence was one for the jury to determine; and that the jury were justified in believing that children would probably resort to the turntable, and that the defendant should have anticipated their resort to it, from the fact that several boys were at play there when the accident occurred, and had played there on other occasions within the observation and to the knowledge of defendant's employees. To the same effect are the following cases: Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393; Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons, 22 Kan. 686, 31 Am. Rep. 203; Koons v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 65 Mo. 592; Union P. R. Co. v. Dunden, 37 Kan. 1, 14 Pac. 501; Evansich v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 57 Tex. 123; Ferguson v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 75 Ga. 637; Id. 77 Ga. 102; St. Louis, V. & T. H. R. Co. v. Bell, 81 Ill. 76, 25 Am. Rep. 269.

"In many, if not all, of the foregoing turntable cases, stress is laid upon the facts that the turntable was in a public or open and frequented place; that it was dangerous and left unfastened, and, when in motion, was attractive to children by reason of their love of motion, 'by other means than their own locomotion;' and that the servants of the railroad companies knew, or had reason to believe, that it was attractive to children, and that children were in the habit of playing on or about it. The doctrine of the cases is that the child cannot be regarded as a voluntary trespasser, because he is induced to come upon the turntable by the defendant's own conduct. 'What an express invitation would be to an adult, the temptation of an attractive plaything is to a child of tender years.' Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393; Union Stock Yards & Transit Co. v. Rourke, 10 Ill. App. 474.

"We are unable to see any substantial difference between the turntable cases and the case at bar. Here was a half block of ground in a populous city, bounded on two sides by public streets and on the third side by a public alley; with an opening of some 40 feet in the fence upon the street on the south side, and an opening of equal dimensions in the fence upon the alley on the north side; with a causeway running from one opening to the other diagonally across the premises, inviting approach and actually used for passage by men and teams. Upon this half block was a dangerous pond or pit in which the water was always 5 or 6 feet deep, and sometimes 14 feet deep. Logs and timbers floated about in this pond; and boys had for some time been in the habit of playing upon them in the water. The city authorities had been notified of its attractiveness to children, and of its dangerous character. They not only suffered the pond to remain undrained, but the fences around it to be broken down in some places, and to be actually removed in others. The deceased boy, Frank McMahon, is proven to have entered the premises at the opening in the fence on the alley. This opening was only 17 feet from the barn of Soady, where he dismounted from the wagon on which he had been riding. The place where he was seen playing in the water was only a few feet from this opening on the public alley. The love of motion, which attracts a child to play upon a revolving turntable, will also attract him to experiment with a floating plank or log which he finds in a pond within his easy reach.

"The doctrine of the turntable cases is sustained by other cases where the injuries complained of were caused by agencies of a different character. Such are Mackey v. Vicksburg, 64 Miss. 777, 2 So. 178; Birge v. Gardiner, 19 Conn. 507, 50 Am. Dec. 261; Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 26 Conn. 591, 68 Am. Dec. 413; Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193; Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 51 Am. Rep. 154, 19 N. W. 257; Hydraulic Works Co. v. Orr, 83 Pa. 332; Whirley v. Whiteman, 1 Head. 610."

The other cases cited announce the same rule of law, and no special good would be accomplished by making further quotations from them. As previously stated, we are firmly of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to make a case for the jury; and we are, therefore, of the opinion that the court properly submitted the question of the city's negligence to the jury.

II. Counsel for the city next insist that the trial court should have sustained the demurrer to the evidence, for the reason that there was no evidence introduced which tended to show the deceased child was drowned in the pool of water complained of.

This insistence is wholly untenable, for the reason that it is not denied, but practically conceded, by counsel that the child was drowned; but be that true or not, the evidence is conclusive that he was in fact drowned. But notwithstanding that fact, counsel insist that the deceased may have drowned in the stream of water above the pool, and his body may have been washed into it, where it was subsequently found. There is not a particle of evidence preserved in this record upon which to predicate such an assumption. In fact, all of the testimony is to the contrary. The uncontradicted evidence was that the stream of water in the River Des Peres, in its ordinary and usual stage, was very small, varying in depth from a very few inches to 15 inches in its deepest places, for a distance of 1,000 feet above and below the pool of water in which the body was found; and there was not a particle of evidence tending to show that the stream did not remain in its ordinary and usual stage from July 10, 1908, when the boy was last seen alive wading in the stream about 100 feet above the pool, until a few days thereafter, when his body was found.

The presumption is that he was exercising ordinary care at the time he was drowned. Buesching v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 73 Mo. 219, 39 Am. Rep. 503. Also that he was not assassinated, for the law never presumes that a crime has been committed. This is elementary.

III. It is finally insisted that the argument of counsel before the jury was calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against the defendant, and was for that reason erroneous. We have examined the record touching that matter, and have failed to find any objectionable language therein, or in the suggestion that the witnesses were improperly interrogated about immaterial matters for the purpose of unduly influencing the jury.

Finding no error in the record, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

MARION CAPPS, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF ARKANSAS.

(— Ark. —, 159 S. W. 193.)

New trial — criminal law — jury's reading newspapers.

A new trial should be granted where the Note. — Juror in criminal case reading newspaper account of trial as ground for new trial.

For opinion gained from newspapers as disqualification of juror in criminal case, see the note to Scribner v. State, 35 L.R.A. (N. S.) 985.

This note presupposes that it appears by competent evidence that newspaper accounts of the trial have been read by one or more jurors, and it does not deal with the question of the manner or quantum of proof that there has been such reading.

The question whether a new trial should be granted in a criminal case, because the jury have read newspaper accounts of the jury in a murder case read narrative newspaper articles at the trial containing statements that the evidence is not shaken, is sufficient to convict, that there is little conflict, that the testimony is sensational, that the public was startled, and pointing out the strong features of the evidence.

(July 14, 1913.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sebastian County convicting him of murder. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jesse A. Harp, George W. Dodd, and I. Simmons, for appellant:

If the defendant in a criminal case has or might have been prejudiced by the reading of newspapers by the jury while in discharge of their duty, the verdict will be vitiated.

People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 193, 42 Am. St. Rep. 102, 37 Pac. 207; People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 561, 80 Pac. 681; Styles v. State, 129 Ga. 425, 59 S. E. 249, 12 Ann. Cas. 176; *State v. Messrs. William L. Moose, Attorney General, and John P. Streepey, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

Jurors' affidavits as to misconduct were inadmissible.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was indicted for the crime of murder in the first degree, alleged to have trial, is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and depends upon whether the accused has been prejudiced by such reading.

As was stated by the court in People v. Gaffney, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 36, 1 Sheldon, 304, an inquiry will always be whether an improper influence, through such a medium, was brought to bear upon the jury.

Reading accounts not of a nature to influence the jury.

The reading by jurors in a criminal case of newspaper accounts of the trial is not a cause for a new trial when the articles read were not of a nature to influence the jury.

United States v. Reid, 12 How. 361, 13 been committed in the Greenwood district of Sebastian county, after premeditation and deliberation, by tying Rose Capps and Priscilla Capps in the bed upon which they slept, and by then and there perpetrating the crime of arson by setting fire to and burning a certain house, which they occupied, and which said house was under the control of the said Marion Capps, and thereby wilfully and feloniously caused the death of the said Rose Capps and Priscilla Capps, by then and there causing them to be burned to death. The venue was changed to the Ft. Smith district, and upon a trial there appellant was found guilty, and appeals to this court from the judgment sentencing him to hang.

A number of exceptions were saved at the trial, and are assigned here as error calling for the reversal of the case. Among other grounds upon which a reversal is asked are the discovery of new evidence and the insufficiency of the evidence; but, in view of the fact that the case will be reversed for another reason, we do not discuss those assignments of error. No exceptions were saved to any of the instructions, and as the other errors complained of are not likely to occur at another trial, we discuss only the error which in our judgment calls for the reversal of the case, and this error is the misconduct of the jury in reading, and in being permitted to read, newspaper articles relating to the trial.

It was also objected that the verdict of the jury was insufficient to support a judg-

L. ed. 1023; United State v. Francis, 144 Fed. 520; People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 486, 39 Pac. 24; People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 Pac. 1100; People v. Fernandez, 3 Cal. App. 689, 86 Pac. 899; Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450, 5 S. E. 782; State v. Cucuel, 31 N. J. L. 249; People v. Gaffney, 14 App. Pr. N. S. 36, 1 Sheldon, 304; State v. Brown, 7 Or. 186; Com. v. Valverdi, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 241; Moore v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 88, 35 S. W. 668.

Thus it has been held to be no ground for a new trial that the jury or some of them read in a newspaper:—

—(prior to their retirement) a perfectly fair résumé of the facts. People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 486, 39 Pac. 24 (murder); —reports of the progress of the trial. People v. Fernandez, 3 Cal. App. 489, 86 Pac. 899;

—a statement that the case was upon trial. Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450, 5 S. E. 782;

—a report or abstract of the evidence. State v. Cucuel, 31 N. J. L. 249; —a portion of the testimony and brief abstract of the argument of counsel. People v. Gaffney, 14 App. Pr. N. S. 36, 1 Sheldon, 304 (a capital case);

—(after their selection, but before the jury was entirely completed) a reference to the case, a part of which was somewhat jocular but in no wise prejudicial to the defendant. State v. Brown, 7 Or. 186 (where, however, there was probably a waiver).

It was held to be no ground for a new trial that two jurors had read a newspaper report of the evidence, where one of them stated that it was correct and had refreshed his memory, and the other did not think it accurate, but both saying that it had not influenced them. United States v. Reid, 12 How. 361, 13 L. ed. 1023.

A juror knows all about the progress of the trial, and it cannot hurt him to read what he already knows. People v. Fernandez, 3 Cal. App. 689, 86 Pac. 899.

In United States v. Francis, 144 Fed. 520 (modified as to the sentence in 152 Fed. 155), the court was of the opinion that a 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

mere account of some of the evidence and of incidents occurring during the trial, and some incidents as to the arrest of other parties, did not constitute any objectionable matter that would prejudice the defendant's case.

It is not ground for a new trial that a juror has read a comment in a newspaper on his qualification by reason of the fact that he was formerly a policeman. People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 Pac. 1100.

Reading prejudicial accounts.

Conversely, the reading by the jury in a criminal case of newspaper articles which are likely to influence the jury is ground for a new trial.

Mattox v. United States, 146 U. S. 140, 38 L. ed. 917, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50; Capps v. State; People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 193, 142 Am. St. Rep. 102, 37 Pac. 207; United States v. Ogden, 105 Fed. 371; People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 561, 80 Pac. 681; People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520, 114 Pac. 829; Styles v. State, 129 Ga. 425, 59 S. E. 249, 12 Ann. Cas. 176; Cartwright v. State, 71 Miss. 82, 14 So. 526; Com. v. Landis, 12 Phila. 576; Com. v. Johnson, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 236; Carter v. State, 9 Lea, 440; Walker v. State, 37 Tex. 366; State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799.

Thus it has been held that a new trial should be granted in criminal cases where the jurors, or some of them, had read in a newspaper:—

—an article containing charges against the accused not in evidence, and stating that the testimony was strong and that the accused did not venture to testify in his own behalf. United States v. Ogden, 105 Fed. 371;

—an article giving evidence excluded by the court and containing intimations that two of the jury had been corrupted. People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 193, 142 Am. St. Rep. 102, 37 Pac. 207;

—articles as to charges of perjury against the defendant's witnesses. People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 561, 80 Pac. 681;

—an article describing the accused as ment imposing the death sentence, for the reason that it did not declare the degree of the homicide of which the defendant was guilty. Section 2409 of Kirby's Digest reads as follows: "The jury shall, in all cases of murder, on conviction of the accused, find by their verdict whether he be guilty of murder in the first or second degree; but if the accused confess his guilt, the court shall impanel a jury and examine testimony, and the degree of crime shall be found by such jury." The judge in his charge to the jury gave them the following directions: "Gentlemen, if you find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, the crime with which he is charged in the indictment, write your verdict, 'We the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment.' If you find him guilty of murder in the second degree, write your verdict, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree,' and assess his punishment at a term in the state penitentiary of not less than five nor more than twenty-one years, the time to be fixed by you, not less than five nor more than twenty-one years. If you find the defendant not guilty, write your verdict, 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty.' If you find him not guilty on the ground of insanity, state that fact in your verdict." The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment." It is contended that, although this verdict, read by itself, does not state the degree of the having been convicted of murder, granted a new trial, and let off on account of a loss of records. People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 520, 114 Pac. 829 (murder); —(in a homicide case) an editorial criticizing the lax administration of the law by juries in homicide cases. Styles v. State, 129 Ga. 425, 59 S. E. 249, 12 Ann. Cas. 176; see also State v. Walton, 92 Iowa, 455, 61 N. W. 179, infra, "Particular statutes;"

—accounts containing in substance the testimony with unfavorable comments and remarks against the accused. Cartwright v. State, 71 Miss. 82, 14 So. 526 (homicide); —(in a forgery case) a statement that the accused had already been convicted of a forgery, stating briefly the facts as to such previous crime. Com. v. Landis, 12 Phila. 576;

—(in a capital case) a statement that "we hope that strict justice will be accorded him, and that, if innocent, which few believe, he may be able to prove it, and thus save his neck from the gallows." Com. v. Johnson, 5 Pa. Co. Ct. 236;

—(in a manslaughter case) accounts highly prejudicial to the accused, not of the trial, but of the crime, and comments upon it. Carter v. State, 9 Lea, 440.

In State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799, it was held ground for a new trial in a homicide case where the defense was insanity, that the jury had read a newspaper containing an account of another murder trial where the defense was insanity, containing expert testimony in regard to insanity that might prejudice the jurors in the case on trial. But compare Schissler v. State, 122 Wis. 395, 99 N. W. 593, infra, "Appellate review."

In Mattox v. United States, 146 U. S. 140, 36 L. ed. 917, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50, it was held to be good ground for a new trial that eight of the jurors had read a newspaper published after the case had been given to the jury, containing statements that the defendant had been tried for his life once before: that the evidence against him was claimed to be very strong by those who had heard all the testimony; that the argument for the prosecution was such that the defendant's friends gave up all hope of any result but conviction: and that it was expected that the deliberations of the jury would not last an hour before they would return a verdict.

In Cartwright v. State, 71 Miss. 82, 14 So. 526, where it was held to be good ground for a new trial that some of the jurors had read newspaper accounts of the trial containing in substance the testimony with some unfavorable comments and remarks against the accused, the court said: "It filtered through the medium of a partisan of the state, and was his version of the evidence. This version, too, was accompanied by remarks of the reporter unfriendly to the accused, and well calculated to excite prejudice in the mind of a reader. The homicide was characterized as 'the unprovoked murder of two officers while in the discharge of official duty.' The defendants were declared to be the possessors 'of very unsavory and damaging antecedents.'"

In Walker v. State, 37 Tex. 366, where a murder case was reversed on several grounds, the court said: "The suffering jurors to have, during the progress of the trial, daily access to newspapers containing imperfect or incorrect accounts of the trial being had before them, together with comments upon the person and characters of those connected with the trial, was certainly erroneous and improper, and of itself sufficient to vitiate the verdict rendered by them."

But the reading of a prejudicial article will not result in a new trial if the court is satisfied that the accused has not been harmed thereby. Thus, in Moore v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 88, 35 S. W. 668, it was held to be no ground for a new trial that, after the jury had agreed that the plaintiff was guilty and while deliberating upon the length of imprisonment they should give him, one of the jurors, who said he was not influenced by it, read a newspaper account of the defendant, stating that he was under indictment for murder in another part of the state and had been accused of various misdemeanors: and the juror stated that, after reading the article he finally agreed to homicide, it is yet made definite and certain by reference to the charge of the court; that the verdict returned employed exactly the language which the court directed to be used in the event appellant was found guilty of murder in the first degree. The courts are divided on the question of the sufficiency of such verdicts, and eminent authority could be cited upon both sides of the question of the sufficiency of this verdict. Unquestionably the verdict would be insufficient except by reference to the charge of the court; but, as we are reversing the case upon another ground, we permit any discussion of its sufficiency here, as that question is not likely to arise upon another trial.

The newspaper articles complained of a less term for imprisonment than that for which he was formerly in favor.

And see cases, infra, "Appellate review," where the appellate court declined to disturb the ruling of the trial court refusing a new trial, although the articles read were prejudicial to the defendant.

Article containing judge's charge.

In Farrer v. State, 2 Ohio St. 54, it was held to be cause for a new trial in a murder case that the jurors read a newspaper containing a portion of the judge's charge, a part of which at least was admitted to be entirely correct, and the rest of it was in condensation. The real ground of the decision seems to have been that it would have been error for the judge himself to have repeated his charge to the jury in the absence of the prisoner and his counsel, and that therefore the jury could not thus consider the charge by themselves.

Comment on defendant's failure to testify.

The interesting question whether the reading by the jury of newspaper statements that the defendant failed to testify in his own behalf will be ground for a new trial seems to be unsettled.

It was held in Williams v. State, 33 Tex. Crim. Rep. 128, 47 Am. St. Rep. 21, 25 S. W. 629, 28 S. W. 958, that the reading by two jurors of a newspaper was not fatal to the verdict, although the headlines stated that the defendant was not placed on the stand. As to this the court said: "It merely stated a fact already known to the jury. The inhibition upon counsel in the case alluding to defendant's failure to testify is statutory (Acts 21st Leg. 37), and it is for that reason we reverse cases where the statute is violated, even though the error was harmless."

But in United States v. Ogden, 105 Fed. 371, in granting a new trial for the reading by the jurors in a criminal case of a newspaper article highly prejudicial to the defendant in several matters, and which stated in headline that the accused did not testify, and below it, that he "did not venture on were published in the Ft. Smith Times Record and the Southwest American, daily papers published in that city, and each was shown to have had a large circulation. The foreman of the jury testified upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial that he and other jurors read these articles. But this evidence was not competent for that purpose, and would be insufficient to support a finding that members of the jury had read these articles, because jurors are not thus allowed to impeach their verdict. § 2423 of Kirby's Digest; Wilder v. State, 29 Ark. 293; Smith v. State, 59 Ark. 132, 43 Am. St. Rep. 20, 26 S. W. 712; Hampton v. State, 67 Ark. 266, 54 S. W. 746. But the finding that the papers had been read by the jury did not depend alone upon the stand in his own defense, the court said: "In defiance of the constitutional provision that no man shall be obliged to testify against himself, attention was called to that fact, and it was asserted that the defendant did not venture to testify in his own behalf,—an assertion which neither judge nor counsel would have been permitted to make during the course of the trial."

Under particular statutes.

The reading by jurors of a fair synopsis of the evidence in a newspaper is not receiving additional evidence within the statute, and is not a cause for a new trial. Williams v. State, supra (murder).

A newspaper is not a "paper" within a statute inhibiting the receipt by the jury of "papers" not authorized by the court. State v. Jackson, 9 Mont. 508, 24 Pac. 213, where it was held that the reading of newspapers by the jury was not within the meaning of the word "papers" as used in the statute providing: "A new trial shall be granted when the jury receive any evidence, papers, or documents not authorized by the court," but fell within the further provision of the statute which provided: "A new trial shall be granted when the jury has been separated without leave of the court, or have been guilty of any misconduct tending to prevent a fair and due consideration of the case" (and it was held "that the simple reception by a juror of a newspaper does not, ipso facto, vitiate the verdict, but that such reception must be considered as any other misconduct of a jury, and be treated by the rules governing cases of misconduct").

When the statute provided that "the jury may also take with them notes of the testimony or other proceedings on the trial taken by them, but none taken by any other person," it was held to be cause for a new trial in a homicide case that the jurors, while they were deliberating, had read newspaper accounts purporting to be full reports of the evidence and the addresses of counsel, with fulsome commendation of the arguments of the counsel for the state, and the affidavit of the jurors, as the officer in charge of the jury and the proprietor of the hotel at which the jury was being entertained testified that the jurors bought these papers, and some of the jurors read them, and that other jurors had access to the daily papers belonging to the hotel, and read them as other guests did. These articles were very lengthy, extending over several columns of each of these papers, and we will not set them out in extenso, but copy the following excerpts from them:

Ft. Smith Times Record:

"Hears His Children Tell How He Tried to Burn Them to Death in Their Beds.

"The Flame-Scarred Brother.

"Ellis Capps, age fourteen years, bore plainly the evidence of his close call from death in the flames in scars that disfigured his forehead and hands and mutilated one ear. His testimony did not materially differ from that given by his sister.

"Neighbor Testifies to Rope.

"Capps Feared Mob.

"Wiggington says Capps expresses desire with criticisms and complaints against the courts for failure to bring criminals to justice. State v. Walton, 92 Iowa, 455, 61 N. W. 179.

In State v. Caine, 134 Iowa, 147, 111 N. W. 443 (quoted from in CAPPS v. STATE), where the statute required the court to admonish the jury, "that it is their duty not to permit any person to speak to or communicate with them on any subject connected with the trial . . . and that they should not converse among themselves on any subject connected with the trial, or form or express an opinion thereon, until the cause is finally submitted to them," it was held to be cause for a new trial that the jurors read newspaper accounts of the case, which, while not objectionable for general purposes, were not strictly accurate. The court said: "The reading of newspaper accounts of and comments upon the trial is thus prohibited by the letter and the spirit of the statute."

Waiver.

The question of waiver seems generally to have arisen where there was no reason to consider that the jury had been prejudiced.

In Hunter v. Georgia, 43 Ga. 483, the appellate court declined to disturb a verdict where, after some of the jury had been sworn and while they were waiting for the completion of the jury, they read a newspaper attack upon the defendant's counsel, who was aware of this at the time, but made no exception to it until after the verdict.

In Bulliner v. People, 95 Ill. 394, it was held that the defendant had waived any objection to the reading of two newspapers, one of which had been handed to a juror by the defendant's counsel, who later saw the juror reading the other paper and privately asked the court to see that papers did not reach the jury, but made no motion. It appeared in the record that it was thought best by the trial court, "and was so stated to counsel at the time, that as the paper was already in the hands of one 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) of the jurymen it would give the article too much prominence and do the defendants more harm than good to speak about it, and nothing further was said or done about it."

In McCue v. Com. 103 Va. 870, 49 S. E. 623, the court declined to order a new trial where the prisoner and his counsel made no objection to the statement of the court to jurymen, before the formation of the jury, that they might read the parts of the daily newspaper not relating to the trial, but must avoid anything relating thereto, and it did not appear that the limits imposed by the court were exceeded, although the court had not inquired of the defendant or his counsel at the time whether they had any objections.

In Marrin v. United States, 93 C. C. A. 351, 167 Fed. 951, it was held that there was no error in refusing to withdraw a juror where the matter of the reading of objectionable newspaper articles was called to the attention of the court by the defendant's counsel, and several of the jurors thereupon admitted reading the articles and stated that they would not be influenced thereby, and the defendant did not insist upon any motion but left himself in the hands of the court.

It was held that there was no prejudice to the defendant where, before the jury was completed, those of the jurors who had been selected read a newspaper reference to the case, and the court offered to discharge the jury if the defendant's counsel wished it, who declined to take any attitude, but excepted to the fact that the jury was not discharged and told the court he would except if they were discharged. State v. Brown, 7 Or. 186.

Appellate review.

The granting or refusing of a new trial in a criminal case on account of the reading of newspaper accounts by the jury is a matter of discretion in the trial court, and will only be reversed where there is clear abuse of discretion. Com. v. Valverdi, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 241; State v. Briggs, —

"Judge Harp was scored by the court by the nonarrival of a witness from Jenny Lind, whose absence caused a halt in the case. Shortly afterward, when counsel attempted to place on stand a witness who had been given the privilege of court room throughout hearing, Judge Hon again grew warm in his remarks to Jurge Harp, and said condemned counsel's action in case of missing witness as well as in other case."

See also as indicating a like opinion Holt v. United States, 218 U. S. 245, 54 L. ed. 1021, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 2, 20 Ann. Cas. 1138, where the particular question was upon the separation of jurors in a murder case, the reading of newspapers being merely incidental.

In State v. Briggs, — Minn. —, 142 N. W. 823, the court said: "The court below was in better position to determine whether prejudice resulted from the act of the juror, and, having ruled thereon adversely to defendant, its conclusion should not be disturbed."

The reading of newspapers stating the evidence or part of it and incidents occurring at the trial in the presence of the jury, and not incorrect, will not lead an appellate court to overthrow the discretion of the trial court in refusing a new trial. Com. v. Valverdi, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 241.

And that the articles read are prejudicial to the defendant will not necessarily cause the appellate court to interfere with the discretion of the trial court. Thus, in State v. Jackson, 9 Mont. 508, 24 Pac. 213, it was held that the reading of newspapers by jurors, containing accounts of the evidence and comments adverse to the defendant before the trial was half over, when the matter was brought to the attention of the court, who forbade any further reading of the papers, was not a cause for a new trial, as the court on appeal could not hold that any prejudice had appeared.

So, in Palmore v. State, 29 Ark. 248, where a murder case was sent back for a new trial for other errors, it was stated that the appellate court would not overrule the decision of the trial court refusing a new trial on account of the reading 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"Every one of the three witnesses who testified at the morning session gave startling testimony.

"In fact their stories constitute a series of sensations. Hardly had the audience recovered from the surprising recital of fifteen-year-old Bertha Capps, than Ellis, aged fourteen, droopy-eyed and weary, his hands and face disfigured by the ravages of the fire, and standing as mute evidences of the child's horrible experience, startled the spectators with his testimony. The story of the children corroborated in detail, but with one or two minor exceptions both related their testimony in a straightforward manner, and every neck in the room was stretched so that not a word would escape the listener.

by a juror of a newspaper article asserting that the prisoner had been proved guilty.

And in Schissler v. State, 122 Wis. 365, 99 N. W. 593, where in a murder case the defense was insanity, and some of the jurors had read a newspaper upon feigning insanity, referring to a case in another state where it was claimed that insanity had been feigned in capital cases, and it had been held by the court below that no improper influence had affected the verdict, the appellate court in affirming the judgment said: "Since this decision does not appear to be against the clear weight of the evidence it will not be disturbed by this court." Compare State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799, supra, "Reading prejudicial accounts."

See also infra, "Where court satisfied with result."

—where court satisfied with result.

There are cases which place the appellate court's refusal to grant a new trial on account of newspaper reading by the jury on the ground that that court is satisfied with the result.

Thus, in State v. Williams, 96 Minn. 351, 105 N. W. 265, it was held that it was not ground for a new trial in a murder case that the jury read an account of the evidence of the defendant on the stand, giving in the main a correct account of it, but commenting upon the defendant in a manner showing bias against him, when from the whole case the defendant, in the opinion of the court, had not been prejudiced. The court said: "It affirmatively appears, as already stated, from the evidence in this case, that the jury could not have returned honestly or intelligently any other verdict than the one they did return. Nor can we intelligently assume that they would

"Their testimony was delivered without emotion, except towards the closing part of the girl's cross-examination, when her answers became haughty and snappy. She finally broke into tears as she dramatically exclaimed, after she had given shocking testimony, that 'I would tell the same story if I was on my dying bed.'

"Despite the insistent and repeated efforts of counsel for the defense to shake stories of the children the youthful witness remained firm. Said father read them twentieth chapter of St. John from the Bible. She did not know that the subject dealt with the resurrection."

It is always improper for a juror to discuss a cause which he is trying as a juror, or to receive any information about it except in open court and in the manner provided by the law. Otherwise some juror might be subjected to some influence which would control his judgment, something might be communicated to him which would be susceptible of some simple explanation, which could not be made because of the ignorance of the influence to which the juror had been subjected. But while jurors should never read the newspaper accounts of the progress of the trial for fear they might be influenced by something which was not in evidence, and which had not occurred in the view of the jury, yet the mere reading of a newspaper account of a trial does not necessarily call for the reversal of the case, if the article contained nothing of an unfair or prejudicial character, and gave no intimation to the jury of the effect of any evidence or the weight given to it by the public. People v. Leary, 105 Cal. 486, 39 Pac. 24; People v. Gaffney, 1 Sheldon, 304; Com. v. Fisher, 134 Am. St. Rep. 1056, note 6.

A leading case upon the subject of newspapers read by the jurors engaged in a trial, and the effect of such conduct upon the part of the jurors, is the case of Styles v. State, 129 Ga. 425, 59 S. E. 249, 12 Ann. Cas. 176, and in this case Justice Atkinhave returned a false verdict, if some of them had not read the articles in question. Therefore we hold that in the reading of the newspaper articles in question by the jury was not prejudicial error."

So, in Com. v. Chauncey, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 90, the fact that the court was satisfied with the verdict is the only reported reason for the denial of a motion for a new trial in a murder case, made partially on the ground that the jurors had read a newspaper containing an inaccurate account of the proceedings.

In Burns v. State, 145 Wis. 373, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 128 N. W. 987, where a newspaper found its way into the jury room with an account of the deliberations of the jury, and stating that one jurymen was persisting against his fellows in holding that the defendant was not guilty, the court declined to set aside the verdict on the ground that they were "unable to reach a conclusion that, had the improper conduct not occurred, the result might within reasonable probabilities have been different."

Miscellaneous.

In Hempton v. State, 111 Wis. 127, 86 N. W. 596, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 657, it was held to be cause for a new trial that the jury in a murder case stayed at a hotel, mixed freely with the guests, read newspapers, etc.

In State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 43 Am. Rep. 799, it was held not to be ground for a new trial in a homicide case that the jury had read a newspaper account of a murder committed in another state.

While without the scope of this note, reference should be made to State v. McCormick, 20 Wash. 94, 54 Pac. 764, where it was held to be error requiring a new trial 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

when the court, without consent of the defendant, gave permission that two letters from a distance and a newspaper should be delivered to a juror, after examining the newspaper and finding that it contained nothing relating to the trial. This was upon the ground that the letters were sealed and might have been used to insert communications to the jury, and that it was not necessary to establish that the letters did contain anything damaging to the defendant.

But this case was criticized as an extreme case and as not reflecting the more modern ideas on the subject in the murder case of State v. Pepon, 62 Wash. 635, 114 Pac. 449, where the court held that it was no ground for a new trial in a murder case that jurors were furnished each with a magazine, by consent, and on direction of the court, it not being claimed that there was anything in the magazine concerning the case on trial.

In People v. Fernandez, 3 Cal. App. 689, 86 Pac. 899, where after the jury had been impaneled, and during the taking of testimony the defendant requested the privilege of asking the several jurors some questions in open court as to whether they had read any reports of the trial in the newspapers, and the court refused the request, stating that this was not the time or place for any such inquiry, the appellate court said: "We think the court was right, and that there is no merit in the objection to the action taken."

In Flanagan v. State, 64 Ga. 52, where just before the verdict a newspaper was delivered to one of the jurors, but its contents do not appear, the court, while granting a new trial for other reasons, disposed of this objection as not having been prejudicial to the defendant. B. B. B.

son, speaking for the court, said: "The state is jealous of the rights and liberties of its people. When one of its citizens is accused of crime, it throws around him all the safeguards . . . possible, in order to procure for him a fair and impartial trial. It requires the officer who has charge of the particular jury to swear, in substance, in open court, to take them to the jury room, and there keep them safely, and not to communicate with them himself, or suffer anyone else to communicate with them, unless by leave of the court. The law contemplates that when a jury are selected and sworn to try a citizen for felony, they shall be entirely separate from the world, and that no communication whatever shall be had with them from the beginning of the trial until the verdict is reached, unless by leave of the court. It contemplates that no outside influence shall be brought to bear on the minds of the jury, and that nothing shall occur outside of the trial which shall disturb their minds in any way; that the minds of the jury shall be entirely occupied with the consideration of the case which they are sworn to try." It will be observed that the oath taken by the officer in charge of the jury in that state is very similar to the oath which the court administers to the officer in charge of the jury upon each adjournment of the court in this state. Section 2390, Kirby's Digest. And the court there further said: "When a juror enters upon the trial of a criminal case, the law contemplates his withdrawal from the public, and makes no provision for addresses to him from outside sources, for his entertainment or otherwise, which are calculated, directly or indirectly, to excite any passions or emotions with respect to the matter upon which he is to sit in judgment. Perfect impartiality in the juror is the object of the law. Anything not legitimate, arising out of the trial of the case, which tends to destroy the impartiality of the juror, should be discounted,"—and in the same opinion the following language was quoted with approval from the case of Cartwright v. State, 71 Miss. 82, 14 So. 526: That "this method of communicating to and impressing upon the jury, or any member of it, the opinions of others is open to the same condemnation which would be visited upon oral expressions of opinion touching a defendant, injected into the body of the jury by some designing intermeddler. . . . The widely read and influential daily journal, speaking for, as well as to, the public, reflecting popular sentiment as well as making it, must be held to be much more powerful in influencing the average man than any expression of opinion by a single private individual." And in the note to this Style Case, supra, the following language is quoted from the case of State v. Caine, 134 Iowa, 147, 111 N. W. 443: "The accounts were written in a somewhat sensational manner, though not perhaps objectionable as news intended for the general public. They were not confined to verbatim reports of the testimony of the witnesses, but, to a large extent, consisted of condensed accounts of what was testified to by the witnesses and statements of the facts involved, some of them not shown by any evidence in the case. However fair these accounts may have been, and for the most part they were unobjectionable as a current report of the proceedings, they were communications, with reference to the case, which the jurors should not have received. The only discussions of the evidence which the jurors should have an opportunity to consider, before they are secluded for deliberation on their verdict, are discussions in open court, by the attorneys of each party in the presence of those for the other, in which errors of statement may be corrected and improper inferences may be controverted. The jurors should not subject themselves to the danger of misconception and error, which must exist if outside persons, without the checks incident to an orderly trial and discussion in court, are allowed to sum up the evidence, emphasize its particular features, and suggest the conclusions to be drawn therefrom."

It will be observed that the language employed in the first quoted newspaper article is not a verbatim report of the evidence of any witness, but is a statement in narrative form of the reporter's understanding of it. It will be observed, too, that it communicates to the jury the paper's estimate of its sufficiency, for the article in the Times Record contains the statement that the evidence, if not broken down, would send the appellant to the electric chair, and also states the opinion that the evidence of Ellis Capps, a son of appellant, did not materially differ from that given by his sister, although the defense contended that neither the boy nor the girl should be believed because of inconsistencies in their statements and contradiction contained therein. The article in the Southwest American is open to substantially the same objections, and calls especial attention to a circumstance in proof, which was regarded by the state as highly significant, and that is that the can which had contained the oil supposed to have been used in saturating the bed upon which the children had been sleeping, had not exploded, and that, therefore, the oil had been poured out of the can before the fire occurred.

The article in the American also advised the jury that the public was startled by the sensational character of the evidence, and that the appearance of the boy bore mute evidence of his horrible experience and the consequent truthfulness of his story. It also stated that the evidence of the daughter was given without emotion, except towards the closing part she became haughty and snappy, while the theory of the defense was that the girl entertained great animosity towards her father, and had made many conflicting statements. The American's article also contained the statement that counsel for the defense had been unsuccessful in their attempt to shake the stories of the children, but that they had remained firm in them; the inference necessarily being that they were therefore true. We believe these articles were prejudicial, because they were not a mere narration of the evidence connected with the trial which had occurred within the view of the jury, and that their necessary effect was to convey to the jury the information that public sentiment had crystallized into the conviction that appellant was guilty of the horrible crime of which he was charged; that his children had stood the ordeal of a searching cross-examination, and yet remained firm because, as intimated by the papers, their story was true. These were improper influences, and we cannot know what effect they may have had upon the minds of the jury, and no attempt was made to show that the jury was not influenced thereby, and we therefore reverse this judgment, and remand the cause for a new trial.

McCulloch, Ch. J., dissenting:

The testimony in this case is not as strong as is desirable in order to warrant a conviction for a capital crime, but it is undoubtedly sufficient, from a legal standpoint, to justify this court in upholding the verdict of the jury. There are some unsatisfactory features in the evidence, but the jury had the witnesses before them, particularly the testimony of the children of the accused, and a case was made out sufficient to uphold the verdict. I cannot agree to a reversal of the case upon the grounds stated by the court, for I have an abiding conviction that the record is free from any prejudicial error.

It is a sound doctrine, and one supported by authority, to say that, where the jury in a capital case is kept together, the fact that they read newspaper articles of an inflammatory nature is sufficient to raise a presumption of prejudicial effect, and that the burden rests upon the state to remove that presumption. However, we have the newspaper articles before us which are said to have been read by some of the jurors, and, in my judgment, there is nothing in them that is calculated to prejudice appellant's rights in the minds of those jurors. There is nothing of an inflammatory or sensational character about the articles. They only pretend to relate to events of the trial,—events which occurred in the presence of the jury,—and do not pretend to convey the outside sentiment or the opinion of the editor concerning the weight of the evidence. It is true that one of the articles speaks of the two children giving testimony which, if not broken down, would send their father to the electric chair, but the tone of the article evinces clearly the intention of the writer merely to relate the substance of the testimony, and not to express an opinion as to its weight. I think we ought to attribute to the jurors a fair degree of intelligence, and presume that they are not mere puppets, to be influenced by every flying rumor. They are supposed to be fair-minded men, who will be guided by the testimony adduced upon the witness stand and instructions of law given by the court, and not by mere expressions of others.

As before stated, I do not mean to say that a highly inflammatory newspaper article, which purports to express public sentiment, or which is calculated to convey to the minds of the jury the idea that it represents public sentiment, would not be held to be prejudicial, in the absence of a counter showing on the part of the state sufficient to rebut the presumption. These articles are not of that character, however, and it seems to me that they are not sufficient to raise any presumption that the jurors were influenced by them.

Now, as to the form of the verdict: The court has not passed upon that question; but, in order to justify my conclusion that the case ought to be affirmed, it is proper for me to say something on that subject. It is true the statute, in terms, declares that "the jury shall, in all cases of murder, on conviction of the accused, find by their verdict, whether he be guilty of murder in the first or second degree." Kirby's Digest, § 2409. When the verdict in this case is read in the light of the other parts of the record, it is perfectly clear that the jury have complied with the statute, and have by their verdict declared the defendant to be guilty of murder in the first degree. The whole record, including the court's charge, may be considered in interpreting the verdict of the jury, and if, from the whole, it can be ascertained to a certainty what the jury meant, then the verdict is sufficient. Strawn v. State, 14 Ark. 549;

Fagg v. State, 50 Ark. 506, 8 S. W. 829; Blackshare v. State, 94 Ark. 548, 140 Am. St. Rep. 144, 128 S. W. 549. "Whatever conveys the idea to the common understanding will suffice," says Mr. Bishop on that subject, "and all fair intendments will be made to support it." 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1004, subd. 5, § 1005a. In Fagg v. State, supra, Chief Justice Cockrill, speaking of a verdict for manslaughter which failed to specify the time, said: "Viewing the verdict in this case in the light of the evidence and the court's charge, the conclusion is reasonable, if not irresistible, that the jury intended a conviction of voluntary manslaughter. The court had charged them specifically upon that offense, and had made no mention of involuntary manslaughter. If they knew there was such a grade of homicide, it is not probable that they understood that the defendant could be convicted of it in this prosecution." In the present case the court specifically charged the jury as to the form of the verdict, and told them that if they found the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, the form of their verdict should be, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment." In response to that instruction the jury adopted the precise form laid down by the court. It is very clear, therefore, what the jury meant when we look to the whole record, and the requirement of the statute is fully met.

I think the judgment in this case should be affirmed, and I therefore dissent from the conclusion reached by the majority.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

MRS. M. C. DAVIS, Plff. in Err.,
v.
FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BLAKELY.

(139 Ga. 702, 78 S. E. 190.)

Judgment — consent — attorney's disobeying instructions — setting aside.

1. Where a suit was brought to cancel a deed, to have the land described in it de-

Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

Note. — Power of attorney to bind client by consent decree.

The implied power of an attorney to compromise his client's cause of action is discussed in a note to Gibson v. Nelson, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 523, where the question considered was the power of an attorney to effect a settlement of his client's rights out of court without special authority to do so. A reference to that note will show that the cases are nearly unanimous in holding 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

creed to belong to the plaintiff, to have an accounting, to recover double the usurious interest alleged to have been paid to the grantee, a national bank, and to obtain other equitable relief, if the plaintiff authorized her attorneys to enter into a consent decree fixing the amount required to be paid by her to the defendant, in discharge of all liabilities against her and the property, at $5,000, and expressly instructed them that she would not consent to a compromise or settlement of the case except upon such terms, to which the attorneys agreed, which instructions were known to the adverse party through its leading attorney, and if, nevertheless, the defendant's leading attorney persuaded the plaintiff's counsel to disregard such instruction, and induced them to consent to a decree fixing such liability at $15,000, declaring the debt to be hers, and not that of her husband, as she alleged it was, and directing that in default of payment by her the land should be sold as provided therein, a consent decree so entered could be set aside by the client upon proper proceedings therefor, duly commenced.

Same — effect — reinstating case.

2. If the consent decree involved in the present case should be set aside, the former case should be reinstated upon the docket for trial, and the parties should have the rights of prosecution and defense in reference thereto which they would have had before the consent decree was entered, together with any additional right which may be germane to the litigation.

Pleading — striking allegations — tauology.

3. In view of the character of the litigation in which the consent decree was entered, the fact that the allegations of the original petition largely covered the same ground as those now sought to be alleged, outside of the attack made upon the consent decree, and of the vague and contradictory character of many of such allegations in the present petition, other than those attacking such decree, direction is given that all of the allegations and prayers be stricken from the petition, except those attacking the consent decree in the former case. The striking of them on demurrer was error.

(April 17, 1913.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Early County to review a judgment in de-that an attorney has no such power under those circumstances.

Power to consent—in general.

The power of an attorney to bind his client by a consent decree by virtue of his general employment in the case has been frequently recognized.

Thus, in Williams v. Simmons, 79 Ga. 649, 7 S. E. 133, the court says decrees rendered with consent of counsel without defendant's favor in a proceeding to set aside a consent decree which had been entered in favor of defendant against plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thomas E. Watson and J. B. Burnside for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Little & Powell for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. M. C. Davis filed her petition against the First National Bank of Blakely, seeking to have a consent decree which had been previously rendered set aside, and to obtain other relief. Two amendments were made thereto. General and special defraud are obligatory upon their clients, the consent of counsel being in law the consent of the parties they represent.

In Dobbins v. Dupree, 36 Ga. 108, the court says that a judgment upon confession by an attorney at law, which has gone to record, should not be vacated except upon the clearest and most decisive proof that the attorney acted without any authority whatever in the case from the party he represented.

And in Gifford v. Thorn, 9 N. J. Eq. 722, it is held that to avoid a decree entered by consent of counsel a party must show that the counsel had no authority to appear in the case.

Counsel representing a party litigant is competent to represent his client in agreeing to a consent verdict. Webster v. Dundee Mortg. & T. Co. 93 Ga. 278, 20 S. E. 310.

Where the confession of judgment is with the knowledge and at the instance of his client, it is sufficient without any special authorization. Lyon v. Williams, 42 Ga. 168.

In Dougherty v. Andrews, 19 Ind. 406, the court apparently regards an attorney as having power to consent to a judgment on notes against his client if the latter has been notified of the suit; but if he has not been notified, a judgment entered by consent of the attorney can be set aside.

In Story v. Hawkins, 8 Dana, 13, it is held that when a case is depending and in progress, it is competent for the parties, by their counsel, to agree upon the terms of the decree, and their agreements, when entered of record, are binding upon their clients.

In Talbot v. McGee, 4 T. B. Mon. 375, the court says that an attorney has power to confess judgment for his client, and therefore necessarily has power to bind him by an admission of facts.

Dangerfield v. Thruston, 8 Mart. N. S. 232, seems to regard an attorney as having authority to consent to judgment against his client; but see Edwards v. Edwards, infra.

murrers were filed and were sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

1. An important question arises as to the authority of an attorney to bind his client by a compromise resulting in a consent decree, in direct opposition to the instructions of his client, and with the knowledge of the leading counsel of the adverse side of such violation of instructions. On behalf of the defendant, reliance is placed upon Civil Code, § 4955, which reads as follows: "They [attorneys] have authority to bind their clients in any action or proceeding, by any agreement in relation to the cause, made in writing, and in signing judgments, entering appeals, and by an entry of such matters, when permissible, on the dockets of the court; but they can-

W. 845, it was held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to set aside a judgment for $1,500, entered by stipulation of the attorney for a defendant in a suit for malicious prosecution, it appearing that defendant did not appear for trial, and the attorney was unable to get into communication with him, and that defendant was probably negligent in the matter.

In Beliveau v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 68 N. H. 225, 44 L.R.A. 167, 73 Am. St. Rep. 577, 40 Atl. 734, it is held that an attorney of record has power to make final disposition of a cause by an agreement which is entered of record, made an order of court, and executed in good faith by the other party, when no limitation of his authority is or might be known by reasonable inquiry.

In Clinton v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 147 App. Div. 468, 131 N. Y. Supp. 881, a compromise judgment entered into by the attorneys for the parties was sustained, but it appeared that the judgment did not bar, release, or invalidate defendant's claim.

In Re Maxwell, 66 Hun, 151, 21 N. Y. Supp. 209, it was held that the act of an attorney for a creditor in consenting to an allowance to an assignee for costs and allowance on his final accounting was binding on the creditor, the court saying: "When an attorney duly appears in open court, or by a proper notice of retainer, in the absence of fraud or collusion, he must be deemed as representing his client, who must be bound by his acts in the regular line of his duty."

In Stump v. Long, 84 N. C. 616, it was held that an order appointing a receiver for a firm, made by consent of an attorney for the members, was binding on a member although it in effect waived his personal exemption, contrary to his intention.

In Hairston v. Garwood, 123 N. C. 345, 31 S. E. 653, the court says an attorney has authority to confess judgment and thereby bind his client.

In Farmers' Trust & Canal Bank v. Ketchem, 4 McLean, 120, Fed. Cas. No. 4,670, it is held that counsel for parties to a fore-not take affidavits required of their clients, unless specially permitted by law." This section has been in each Code since the first, which is generally called the Code of 1863, because its operation was suspended from the time when it was first contemplated that it should take effect (January 1, 1862,) until January 1, 1863. In the first Code it appeared as § 382. It did not originate from a legislative enactment, but was a codification of the rule previously existing and arising from the decisions of courts. In such a case it has been held that the decisions will be looked to in construing the section thus codified. Bush v. McCarty, 127 Ga. 308, 310, 56 S. E. 430, 9 Ann. Cas. 240; Calhoun v. Little, 106 Ga. 336 (3), 43 L.R.A. 630, 71 Am. St. Rep. 254, 32 S. E.

86; Ocean S. S. Co. v. Way, 90 Ga. 747, 20 L.R.A. 123, 17 S. E. 57. This section did not confer upon attorneys any new authority, but stated in a terse form the pre-existing general rule derived from the sources to which the codifiers were authorized to look. To take such a general rule and slavishly adhere to its letter, without looking to its spirit and meaning, would be substantially to violate the rule in endeavoring to adhere to it. It is a well-established maxim, Qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice (liberally translated by Brougham, "He who considers merely the letter of an instrument goes but skin deep into its meaning"). Let us then look to the derivation of this rule and to the decisions of this and other courts in regard to it.

closure suit have power to consent and stipulate that the mortgaged premises be sold, and a decree entered on such stipulation will not be set aside except on the ground of unfairness or mistake.

However, a considerable number of cases hold that an attorney has no power to bind his client by a consent decree or confession of judgment without his direction, knowledge, or consent. Pfister v. Wade, 69 Cal. 133, 10 Pac. 369; People ex rel. Wright v. Lamborn, 2 Ill. 123; Wadhams v. Gay, 73 Ill. 415; Smith v. Dixon, 3 Met. (Ky.) 438; Cetti v. Dunman, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 433, 64 S. W. 787.

Thus, in Holker v. Parker, 7 Cranch, 436, 3 L. ed. 396, Chief Justice Marshall said that even though an unauthorized compromise by an attorney has assumed the form of a judgment at law, the injured party, if his own conduct has been blameless, ought to be relieved against it.

In Thomason v. Odum, 31 Ala. 108, 68 Am. Dec. 159, it is held that a retraxit, being equivalent to a judgment on the merits, must be entered by the plaintiff in person; but a recital that "this day came the parties by their attorneys, and the plaintiff enters a retraxit in this case," was held, on the authority of Coux v. Lowther, 1 Ld. Raym. 597, to show that the plaintiff in person entered the retraxit.

In Preston v. Hill, 50 Cal. 54, 19 Am. Rep. 647, where the attorney entered into the compromise in defiance of the protest of his client, who, in open court, in the presence of the adverse attorney, remonstrated and insisted that the trial should proceed, the consent decree was set aside.

In Hallack v. Loft, 19 Colo. 74, 34 Pac. 568, it is held that an attorney is not authorized to settle and dismiss his client's cause of action by the entry of a judgment upon the merits without his client's knowledge and consent.

In Askew v. Goddard, 17 Ill. App. 377, it is held that a power of attorney contained in a promissory note authorizing any attorney of the state to confess judgment for the amount of the note, with interest, together with a reasonable attorney's fee, did 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

not authorize an attorney who was acting for the payee to confess judgment for an attorney's fee in addition to the amount due on the note.

In Ohlquest v. Farwell, 71 Iowa, 231, 32 N. W. 277, the court says it is undoubtedly true that an attorney cannot consent to a judgment against his client without special authority, and this is quoted with approval by the court in Rhutasel v. Rule, 97 Iowa, 20, 65 N. W. 1013, in which it is held that an attorney under a general employment to prosecute a suit has no authority to dismiss it. These cases are followed in Kilmer v. Gallaher, 112 Iowa, 583, 84 Am. St. Rep. 358, 54 N. W. 697, in holding that an attorney under a general employment has no authority to consent to a judgment by compromise against his client, and the earlier case of Potter v. Parsons, 14 Iowa, 286, to the contrary, is regarded as being in effect overruled.

In Goodin v. Tinsley, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 45, it is held that an attorney employed to defend his client's title to property cannot voluntarily surrender it, and if he consents to a judgment to that effect, the client may have it set aside on the ground of fraud practised by the successful party.

In Anderson v. Sutton, 2 Duv. 480, it is held that an attorney appointed to defend for an absent defendant has no authority to consent to a judgment against him.

In Edwards v. Edwards, 29 La. Ann. 597, it is held that an attorney has no authority to consent to a judgment against his client without special authority to do so, the decision being apparently based upon a provision of the Code.

In Jubilee Placer Co. v. Hossfeld, 20 Mont. 234, 50 Pac. 716, a letter from a plaintiff, authorizing his attorney to dismiss a suit, was held not to authorize the entry of a decree on the merits.

In Hubbard v. Spencer, 15 Johns. 214, it was held that authority to confess judgment at one time does not authorize an attorney for a defendant to confess judgment at a later time, after plaintiff is out of court by his nonappearance.

In Timm v. Timm, 34 Wash. 228, 75 Pac.

In England, after some conflicting discussion, it seems now well settled, by the later decisions, that an attorney, by virtue of his general retainer, has power to compromise a suit, provided he does not violate the instructions of his client in so doing; and that such a compromise will bind his client, even if he does violate instructions, unless the violation is known to the adverse party. A distinction has been drawn between matters directly involved in the litigation and matters collateral thereto. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 362; Prestwich v. Poley, 18 C. B. N. S. 806. In America there is some conflict of authority, but the greater number of decisions hold that an attorney has no power to compromise a claim, action, or judgment of his client. Clark v. Randall,

9 Wis. 135, 76 Am. Dec. 252, note, 261, 262; Levy v. Brown, 56 Miss. 83, 88; Whipple v. Whitman, 13 R. I. 512, 43 Am. Rep. 42. Where the latter rule prevails, it has been said that the fact that a compromise made by an attorney in excess of his authority has been consummated by a consent judgment entered in pursuance of it does not render the compromise thus consummated binding on the client, although it will make the court less inclined to disturb it, and will render prompt action and a reasonable show of merit on the part of the client necessary to secure its annulment. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 362. On the other hand, it has been held that "in an action by a client to set aside a judgment against him, rendered without his authority upon 879, the court held that an attorney, in compromising his client's property rights in a divorce suit, acted beyond his authority, and reversed that part of the judgment which was based upon such compromise.

And in Watt v. Clark, 12 Ont. Pr. Rep. 359, a verdict and judgment entered upon a settlement made by a defendant's solicitor without express authority were set aside.

Effect of judgment by consent of attorney—presumption of authority.

Some courts will presume that an attorney who consents to a judgment has authority from his client to do so, in the absence of proof to the contrary.

Thus, in Davant v. Carlton, 57 Ga. 491, it is held that a confession of judgment by an attorney of record for a party will be presumed to have been authorized until the contrary is found by the verdict of a jury on the trial of that separate and distinct issue.

In Martin v. Judd, 60 Ill. 78, the court makes a distinction between a confession of judgment made by an attorney in vacation and one made in open court, his authority in the latter case being presumed until the contrary is shown, while in the former his authority must affirmatively appear.

In Dockham v. Potter, 27 La. Ann. 73, the court says that an attorney at law who consents to a judgment is presumed to have authority to do so until the contrary is alleged by the client under oath.

And in Williams v. Nolan, 58 Tex. 708, the court says that every reasonable presumption is to be indulged in favor of a settlement made by an attorney duly employed, especially after a court has entered judgment upon it.

—opening or setting aside judgment.

When a judgment has been entered by consent of an attorney without special authority, it will sometimes be set aside or reopened.

Thus, in Dalton v. West End Street R. Co. 159 Mass. 221, 38 Am. St. Rep. 410, 34 N. E. 261, it is held that when an agreement has been made by an attorney against the express prohibition of the client, and the parties may be put in statu quo, the court may vacate any judgment founded upon it.

In Blodget v. Conklin, 9 How. Pr. 442, where an attorney appeared and consented to judgment without the authority of one of the defendants, and no disposition was shown to hold the attorney pecuniarily responsible, the defendant was let in to defend the action, and the judgment and levy were left to stand as security.

In Jordan v. Russell, 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 467, a verdict and judgment entered upon compromise of a will contest, by an attorney for a contestant of the will, without authority, was set aside.

In Turner v. Fleming, — Okla. —, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 265, 130 Pac. 551, it is held that where an attorney compromises a cause without special authority, and causes an order of dismissal as per stipulation based on such compromise to be entered, it may be set aside upon prompt application of the client.

And in Huston v. Mitchell, 14 Serg. & R. 307, 16 Am. Dec. 506, a judgment entered upon an unauthorized compromise was set aside.

As a general rule, however, the courts are reluctant to interfere with a judgment entered by consent of an attorney without special authority unless fraud appears. Adkins v. Bryant, 133 Ga. 465, 134 Am. St. Rep. 211, 66 S. E. 21; Palen v. Starr, 7 Hun, 423; Adams v. First Nat. Bank, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 52 S. W. 642.

Thus, in Saleski v. Boyd, 32 Ark. 74, while the court recognizes the rule that an attorney has no right to compromise his client's case and consent to a judgment or decree against him without special authority, it holds that a consent decree entered by an attorney will not be set aside merely because he had no special authority, but the court will look to the facts, and open the decree if the attorney acted in fraud or under mistake or misapprehension of law or fact, and the interests of the client were thereby seriously compromised.

a compromise of his claim by his attorney at law, his right of recovery in the action in which such judgment was rendered will not be inquired into; but the judgment should be set aside, the suit be again placed upon the docket, and the case proceed in the same manner as if such judgment had never been rendered." Smith v. Dixon, 3 Met. (Ky.) 438. See also Dalton v. West End Street R. Co. 159 Mass. 221, 38 Am. St. Rep. 410, 34 N. E. 261. It is unnecessary to discuss the limitations upon this rule, such as a failure to make the application within a reasonable time, the question whether the parties can be put in statu quo, etc.

Under the English rule the authority of an attorney in regard to the litigation was analogized to that of a general agent. But, where that rule had been adopted, it has generally been declared that an attorney at law cannot make a compromise of a litigation and consent to a judgment or decree to carry it into effect, against the express instructions of his client, when such instructions are known to the other party. Thus, in Wharton on Agency, after the author had advocated the English rule,

In Holmes v. Rogers, 13 Cal. 191, it is held that there being no allegation of fraud, or that the attorney consenting to the decree was not authorized to appear in the case and answer for defendant, or that the attorney was insolvent, a decree fairly entered into by consent of the attorney will not be set aside, the court saying: "The judgment of counsel is trusted in the management and conduct of a lawsuit. He must decide, in the absence, at all events, of express instructions, whether or how long he will contest, what points he will take, and what abandon."

In Craven v. Canadian P. R. Co. 62 Fed. 170, it is held that while a court might not enforce a consent judgment, entered without authority, as between attorney and client, and perhaps should, on equitable principles, reopen a judgment at the same term, entered on agreement, if unauthorized, such a judgment would become final after the term.

In Bradish v. Gee, 1 Ambl. 229, 1 Ld. Kenyon, 73, the court says that when a decree is made by consent of counsel, it is binding on the client, though he did not really give his consent, his remedy being against his counsel; but if the decree was by fraud and covin, the party may be relieved against it by original bill.

And in Harrison v. Rumsey, 2 Ves. Sr. 488, the court refused to set aside a decree obtained by consent of counsel for both sides, but said it would be different if collusion on the part of counsel could be proved.

he says (§ 594): "If the opposite party knows that the attorney is without authority, or acts in disobedience to his client, the compromise will not be enforced to the injury of the client." Beliveau v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 68 N. H. 225, 44 L.R.A. 167, 73 Am. St. Rep. 577, 40 Atl. 734; Weeks, Attys. § 228; Brady v. Curran, Ir. Rep. 2 C. L. 314, 16 Week. Rep. 514; Strauss v. Francis, L. R. 1 Q. B. 379, 12 Jur. N. S. 486, 14 L. T. N. S. 322, 14 Week. Rep. 634, 7 Best. & S. 365, 35 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 133.

Not long before our first Code was adopted, the question of the authority of counsel was the subject of much discussion in England. In 1854 Samuel Swinfen died, leaving a will. Its validity was contested. Sir F. Thesiger, afterward Lord Chelmsford, appeared for the legatee, who was also the executrix of the will. He entered into a written memorandum of compromise, by one of the terms of which the estates were to be conveyed by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the defendant was to secure to the plaintiff an annuity for her life. It was agreed that either party could make this agreement a rule of court. A juror unauthorized action of his counsel in consenting to a decree is left to an action against the counsel for damages; at least, unless the counsel is pecuniarily irresponsible.

Thus, in Devenbaugh v. Nifer, 3 Ind. App. 379, 29 N. E. 923, and Thompson v. Pershing, 86 Ind. 303, it is held that the general employment of an attorney to appear in a case amounts to implied authority to agree that judgment shall be taken against his client without express authority, even though he knows his client has a good defense, and the client must look to the attorney for redress if he acts to his injury.

In Holmes v. Heywood, 1 Mich. N. P. 292, it was held that if counsel has consented to a decree against his client without sufficient authority, the client must seek the remedy against the counsel, and such a decree will not be set aside unless it is made to appear that the counsel is pecuniarily irresponsible.

In Dodds v. Dodds, 9 Pa. 315, the court says an attorney at law doubtless has authority to bind his client by confession of judgment, and when he does so without terms to show he exceeded his authority, the client is concluded by it, and left to an action against the attorney for breach of instructions.

In Chown v. Parrott, 14 C. B. N. S. 74, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 197, 9 Jur. N. S. 1290, 8 L. T. N. S. 391, 11 Week. Rep. 608, it is held that an attorney who consents to a compromise and entry of judgment against his client is not liable in an action for damages if he acts with reasonable care and skill, and the compromise is not made against his client's express prohibition.

was thereupon withdrawn, and the compromise was made a rule of the court of common pleas. Mrs. Swinfen insisted that the arrangement had been made not only without her sanction, but directly in opposition to her wishes, and she declined to perform it. A rule nisi was obtained against her to show cause why she should not be attached for contempt for disobedience of the rule. The three judges of the common pleas were of the opinion that she was bound by the consent of her counsel; but they thought that there was not sufficient evidence of a demand for performance and a refusal on the part of Mrs. Swinfen to justify an attachment. Swinfen v. Swinfen, 18 C. B. 485, decided in 1856. Another application for attachment was made, Crowder, J., delivered an opinion, declaring that Mrs. Swinfen was not bound by the compromise. Creswell, J., who, on the former hearing, had declared that the client was bound, now stated that, "as the validity of that agreement must be discussed before another tribunal, we are anxious that the question should be as little prejudiced as possible by anything that passes in this court;" but personally expressed his sympathy for the distinguished advocate who had been attacked. Swinfen v. Swinfen, 1 C. B. N. S. 364, decided in 1857. After the refusal of the attachment, Swinfen filed his supplemental bill, praying that Mrs. Swinfen be decreed to specifically perform the agreement for a compromise, or, in the alternative, that another issue devisavit vel non be directed. The master of the rolls held that there should be a new trial, and that the prayer for specific performance should be denied. He said: "Upon what principle, then, can it be said that an attorney has an implied authority to compromise the subject-matter of a suit which he is employed to conduct? How far does it reach? Does such implied authority extend so far as to enable him to sell the subject-matter of the suit? Yet, in point of fact, a compromise is nothing more than a sale between the parties, upon certain terms. . . . There may be cases in which questions of very considerable nicety may arise, as to whether a particular matter consented to is or is not properly one relating to the conduct and management of the cause. If it be, then I do not doubt that it is within the scope of the implied authority of the solicitor in the conduct and management of the cause; but, if it be not, then I think that it is not within the scope of his authority." Swinfen v. Swinfen, 24 Beav. 549 (1857). On appeal, the general question as to the power of counsel to bind their clients by compromising cases in litigation was not determined, but it was held that, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"under the circumstances of this case," the agreement was not one which a court of equity would enforce. Swinfen v. Swinfen, 2 De G. & J. 381 (1858). After this Mrs. Swinfen brought an action against her counsel, who had then become Lord Chelmsford, to recover the costs and expenses to which she had been subjected in the litigation arising out of the compromise. On the hearing in the court of Exchequer, the barons presiding were all of the opinion that, under the facts of the case, the defendant was not liable; but they were not agreed as to all the points involved. Swinfen v. Chelmsford, 5 Hurlst. & N. 890 (1860), 29 L. J. Exch. N. S. 382, 6 Jur. N. S. 1035, 2 L. T. N. S. 406, 8 Week. Rep. 545. In so far as the decision involved a difference between the authority of a barrister and that of an attorney in the management of a cause, such distinction is of little or no importance in this country. It will appear from the history of the Swinfen litigation that the client was finally held not to be bound to comply with the compromise which had been agreed upon by her counsel against her instruction, and made a rule or order of court; but, under the facts of the case, counsel was held not to be liable for the costs and expenses which had accrued to the client in the litigation arising out of the compromise.

In 1859 the case of Fray v. Voules, 1 El. & El. 839, was decided. An attorney of the name of Voules, against the directions of his client, compromised her case, and a consent order was taken therein. She sued him for damages; and it was held that "an attorney retained to conduct a cause, and having express directions from the client not to enter into a compromise, has no power, under such retainer, to enter into any compromise, even though it be reasonable and bona fide and for the benefit of the client; and, if he do so, is liable to an action for damages, though the damage actually sustained be nominal."

These cases have been somewhat fully set out, because shortly thereafter our first Code was framed and adopted, and they throw light upon the existing state of the decisions in England at that time. Three sections of the original Code are relevant to the subject under consideration. Section 382 has already been quoted in full. It referred to the authority of attorneys to bind their clients in any action or proceeding, by any agreement in relation to the cause, made in writing, etc. Section 383 declared that "without special authority attorneys cannot receive anything in discharge of a client's claim but the full amount in cash." Section 385 referred to relieving a party from the results of the conduct of an attorney who assumed to represent such party without authority.

Let us now review the decisions of this court bearing on the subject of compromises of litigation by attorneys, and their power to bind their clients thereto by consenting to judgments or decrees. It may be stated that the Code and the decisions generally follow the English rule, at least in part; and that the decisions hold that, if an attorney at law consents to the taking of a compromise decree in a case in which he is employed, it is binding upon his client, in the absence of fraud or of violation of express directions given by his client, and known to the adverse party or his attorney. But the writer has found no decision of this court in which it has been held that if an attorney consented to a compromise judgment in direct violation of his client's instruction, and this was known to the adverse party, the judgment could not be set aside. Nor has he found any decision of this court holding that a compromise of a litigation by an attorney would bind his client, in the absence of authority from the latter, except where a consent verdict, judgment, or decree was taken.

In Lyon v. Williams, 42 Ga. 168, it was held that a confession of judgment by counsel, without any special authorization to that effect, was sufficient to bind his client.

In Platen v. Byck, 50 Ga. 245, it was held that without special authority, an attorney could bind his client by an agreement for the dissolution of a garnishment and the depositing of the fund to await the event of the suit. In the opinion of McCay, J., occurs this significant statement: "It is no answer to say that Mr. Hardin [the attorney for the complaining party] acted unwisely, or even corruptly, in making this agreement, unless Byck [the other party] was a party to or had knowledge of the corruption." The intimation is that, if the other party had been affected with knowledge, it would have made a difference.

In Glover v. Moore, 60 Ga. 189, it was held that a married woman, who intrusted the defense of a suit at law to counsel chosen by herself, was bound by his acts to the extent that any other suitor would be; and that if her plea were withdrawn by her counsel on terms executed by the other side, and judgment were rendered against her without any fraud on the part of her adversary or his counsel, such judgment would be binding on her. No question of the making of a compromise by counsel against the express direction of his client was involved.

In Williams v. Simmons, 79 Ga. 649, 7 S. E. 133, it was again ruled that a decree 40 L.R.A. (N.S.)

rendered by consent of counsel for a married woman, without fraud, would bind her, as it would bind other litigants. In the opinion there are some expressions to the effect that it is no answer to a solemn judgment of a court, rendered by consent of counsel, for the client to come in and say that the counsel misrepresented the client's interests or wishes; and that, if the client were injured thereby she would have an action against the attorney. But such expressions must be taken in connection with the question under consideration. It appears distinctly that no question of any limitation on the authority of the counsel who agreed to the decree was involved, and no knowledge by the other party of any such limitation, though there was knowledge of an absence of express authority, which, under former rulings, was unnecessary. This appears from the statement of what the court construed the allegation of an amended answer under consideration to mean. It was said (p. 653): "She does not intimate that he was not retained as counsel for these causes in her behalf, or that his powers were more limited than the general powers which appertain to the position of counsel. Moreover, she does not allege any fraud on the part of her counsel or any collusion with him."

In Lewis v. Gunn, 63 Ga. 542, and Perkerson v. Reams, 84 Ga. 298, 10 S. E. 624, and other similar cases, no question of the violation of an express direction not to compromise, known to the adverse party or his counsel, was involved.

The question of the power of an attorney to bind his client by a consent judgment, in spite of a direction by the client not to compromise, was before this court in Rogers v. Brand, 133 Ga. 759, 66 S. E. 1095. The justices at that time constituting the court were evenly divided in opinion, Chief Justice Fish, Presiding Justice Evans, and the writer being of the opinion that the client in that case should not be held bound, but the judgment should be set aside, while Justices Beck, Atkinson, and Holden were of the contrary opinion. The judgment accordingly was affirmed by operation of law. In Rogers v. Pettigrew, 138 Ga. 528, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 852, 75 S. E. 631, the attorney for the plaintiff in the case last cited, who had made the compromise, sought to foreclose his lien for fees on certain land which was awarded to his client by the consent decree. It was held that an attorney who compromises his client's case against the latter's express direction is not entitled to any compensation. In the opinion Presiding Justice Evans cited Fray v. Voules, 1 El. & El. supra, and said: "A litigant has the right to insist that his case be adjudicated according to the established rules of law and procedure. When he instructs his attorney not to compromise his case, the attorney is bound by such instructions, and is not at liberty to violate them, even though the attorney honestly believes a compromise settlement would be to the best interest of his client." This judgment was concurred in by all the justices, except Atkinson, J. Between the dates of the two decisions, Holden, J., had resigned, and Hill, J., had been appointed in his stead. It cannot be readily understood how it can be held that a litigant has a right to insist that his case be litigated, and not compromised, and that, when he instructs his attorney not to compromise the case, the latter is bound by such instructions, and is not at liberty to violate them; and yet how it can at the same time be held that, if this want of authority on the part of the attorney is known to the other party or his attorney, such party can nevertheless bind the client by obtaining the agreement of an attorney without authority, who is known to be committing a breach of duty in making such agreement. A general agent can ordinarily bind his principal, within the scope of his agency, by an agreement with a person who is not aware of any limitation on his authority, but the principal has the power to limit his authority by instructions; and, if such limitation is known to the person contracting with the agent, there is no rule of law which will hold the principal bound by such wrongful contract. If a compromise so made by an attorney has taken the form of a consent judgment or decree, this can be set aside on proper proceedings duly instituted by the client.

Section 4955 of the Civil Code does not mean that, when a client employs an attorney to bring or defend a suit, it ceases to be the client's litigation; that he has no power to say whether he will litigate or compromise his suit; and that the attorney becomes the owner or absolute master of the litigation, so as to be able to sell or give away his client's property rights by contract, in spite of his client. This is a very different thing from the management of the litigation and agreements connected therewith, such as agreeing to a reference of the case to an auditor, or a submission of it to arbitration, to allow copies of papers to be used in evidence, to waive notices, and the like. Neither does the statutory lien which an attorney has upon a suit, which ordinarily prevents his client from settling or dismissing the case so as to defeat him of his fee, have the effect to entirely oust the client from the case.

It was contended that fraud, in order to set aside a judgment, must be fraud on 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the part of the adverse party or his attorney; and expressions of this sort have been used in some of the decisions. But they were cases where the magistrate forgot to notify a litigant of a time when a case would be heard, as he had agreed to do, or where the fraud alleged was that of some third party. In none of them was a violation of duty by an attorney, with knowledge of the adverse party, involved. If one knowingly obtains from an attorney at law or agent, by agreement, a surrender of the property rights claimed by his client or principal, in spite of instructions to the contrary, what name shall be given to the conduct of the party inducing the agent or attorney to violate his duty? In Holker v. Parker, 7 Cranch, 436, 3 L. ed. 396, the ruling actually made was that an attorney at law, merely as such, has no right, strictly speaking, to make a compromise for his client. In the opinion Chief Justice Marshall makes this pointed statement: "Though it may assume the form of an award or of a judgment at law, the injured party, if his own conduct has been perfectly blameless, ought to be relieved against it. This opinion is the more reasonable because it is scarcely possible that in such a case the opposite party can be ignorant of the unfair advantage he is gaining. His conduct can seldom fail to be tainted with some disingenuous practice; or, if it has not, he knows that he is accepting a surrender of the rights of another from a man who is not authorized to make it." If an attorney, under his general implied powers, has authority to compromise a case with one who is not aware of any express limitation on such authority, still this language is applicable if the adverse party knows of the violation of instructions by the attorney in making the compromise.

In the case before us it appears that a suit was brought by a married woman for the purpose of setting aside a deed and having the property described decreed to belong to the plaintiff, and also to have an accounting, to recover against the grantee, a national bank, double the amount of certain usurious interest alleged to have been paid, under § 5198 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3493, and for other equitable relief. By amendments the action was shaped so as to be one to recover such double interest only. It was held by this court that a demurrer to the petition as amended was properly overruled. First Nat. Bank v. Davis, 135 Ga. 687, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 134, 70 S. E. 246. When the case was returned to the superior court, a compromise was agreed upon by counsel for both sides. The amendments which had been made to the petition were withdrawn, so that the petition stood as originally filed. A consent decree was agreed upon by counsel for both parties and signed by the court. The plaintiff in the former action then brought the present equitable petition and alleged that her attorneys at law, who conducted the former suit, without her knowledge or consent, and in violation of her special instructions, settled the case by a consent decree which was entered; that her attorneys were expressly instructed that they might consent to a settlement and decree whereby the plaintiff would bind herself to pay the bank the sum of $5,000 in full settlement of all its demands against her; that this was known to the bank, but through its attorneys, and in collusion with the plaintiff's attorneys, it deliberately perpetrated a fraud upon the plaintiff by consenting to a decree which contained a judgment for $15,000 against her in favor of the bank; and that she was informed by her attorneys that the consent decree had been taken in accordance with her instructions.

By one of the amendments it was alleged that instructions of the character above stated were communicated to one of her attorneys named, through her husband, on the morning of the day on which the consent decree was entered; that such attorney communicated them to another of her attorneys who was present; that a third attorney of hers was not present and took no part in the management of the case; that she specially instructed her attorneys that she would not consent to a compromise or settlement of the case except on such terms, "and her said attorneys agreed that they would settle in no other way;" and that, through her husband, she had on several occasions just prior to the term of court fully apprised the leading counsel for the bank of the terms on which she would be willing to settle; but that such attorney fraudulently persuaded her counsel to disregard her instructions, and induced them to consent to a decree which was rendered, whereby she was required to pay $15,000 to the bank instead of $5,000. A copy of the decree was attached. It declared that the debt was that of the plaintiff, and not of her husband, and that the title to the land was in the bank. It fixed the amount of the indebtedness at $15,000, which was not to be enforced against her personally, but against the land, and provided, in regard to a restoration of title to the plaintiff upon payment of that amount in partial payments of $5,000 each, the passing of a certain part of the property to her upon payment of the first instalment, for allowing her to sell parts of the property at prices satisfactory to the bank, and credit the price on the debt for making sale in case of nonpayment of deferred payments, etc. On demurrer, the allegations of the plaintiff's petition on this subject must be treated as true. Of course we do not mean to express any opinion as to whether they can be sustained by evidence, or are in fact true, but we are dealing with the case on demurrer; and, in so far as the equitable petition sought to set aside the consent decree and to reinstate the parties in the situation which they occupied at the time of its rendition, it was not demurrable. The fact that the defendant had certain other attorneys than the leading attorney, who was charged with knowledge of the instructions given by the plaintiff to her counsel, would not affect the ruling above made.

It was contended that the plaintiff should be held to be bound by the agreement of her attorneys, and that she should be remitted to a suit against them for damages, if she were injured by their conduct. We have seen that the decisions have not held that the client was compelled to elect such a remedy, if there was a violation of instructions as to compromising, which was known to the adverse party. Unfortunately the members of the bar are not always opulent, and are sometimes even insolvent. Daniel Webster is said to have tersely described the career of a lawyer by the words "work hard, live well, and die poor." Leading and honored members of the profession not infrequently accumulate more learning than lucre. If it should be laid down as an absolute rule that a lawyer could in all cases bind his client by a compromise put into the form of a consent decree or judgment, regardless of instructions to the contrary, and regardless of knowledge thereof on the part of the adverse party, it will readily be seen that occasions might arise where a client's entire property involved in litigation might be agreed away, in spite of his protest, and he might be remitted to a suit by which nothing could be realized.

It was argued that the plaintiff had in the former case elected the remedy of suing the bank for double the usurious interest claimed to have been paid to it, and that she was bound by that election. But when the amendments to the former petition were withdrawn, and it was restored to its original condition, the election would seem to have been abrogated. Nor are we prepared to hold summarily, on demurrer in this case, whether or not the consent decree gave to the plaintiff all, or more than all, that she could have recovered under the former suit, with its numerous allegations and prayers. If the consent decree should be set aside, neither party should be cut off merely by reason of such decree from prosecuting or defending the litigation.

3. The present petition contains a good many allegations rather loosely and vaguely pleaded; some of them asserting that the deed which the plaintiff made to the bank was void for usury, others that she made the deed in payment of a debt infected with usury, in which case it would not be void. Harris v. Hull, 70 Ga. 831 (3). Other allegations indicated that the debt which the deed was made to pay was that of the plaintiff's husband, but still others were inconsistent with that theory. One paragraph of an amendment asserts that "she has made sufficient payments to the First National Bank of Blakely to entirely liquidate her own debt to said bank, and the deed to her land now held by said bank is a conveyance of her property to pay her husband's debts; and therefore said conveyances are null and void." It was then alleged that the bank was not an innocent purchaser, "but took such deeds to her land with full knowledge of the fact that they were made to pay her husband's debts." This again is inconsistent with other allegations of the petition, and some of those contained in the former petition, which was attached thereto as an exhibit. Besides, it is uncertain as to when the payments were made; and this was attacked by demurrer.

If the decree stands of force, none of the relief sought can be had. If it should be set aside, the original suit endeavored to include the substantial grounds of complaint sought to be set up in the present case, except certain allegations in regard to payments upon the decree and in regard to rents, issues, and profits. In view of this fact, and of the character of the allegations of the plaintiff's petition, and of the fact that nearly all of them were attacked by special demurrers, we think that the proper disposition to make of the case is to direct that all the allegations and prayers be stricken from the petition, except those in reference to the bringing of the former action, its termination in the consent decree, and the attack made upon such decree; that such striking shall not be an adjudication that the plaintiff has no cause of action or right of recovery in respect to these matters; but that the present case stands as one to set aside the consent decree, and reinstate the former case as it was before such decree was rendered; and we direct that this be done accordingly.

Judgment reversed, with direction.

(18 Idaho, 465, 110 Pac. 253.)

Intoxicating liquor — statutory definition.

1. Section 31 of the local option statute (Sess. Laws 1909, p. 18) defines intoxicating liquors as including "spirituous, vinous, malt and fermented liquors, and all mixtures and preparations thereof, including bitters and other drinks that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication."

Same — proof of intoxicating qualities.

2. Under the definition given by the legislature in § 31 of the local option statute (Sess. Laws 1909, p. 18), all "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors" are declared as a matter of law to be intoxicating, and it is unnecessary for the state to prove that any liquor or beverage falling within the enumerated class will in fact produce intoxication.

Same — necessity of proof.

3. Under the provisions of the local option statute (Sess. Laws 1909, p. 18, § 31, thereof), it is necessary for the state to prove the intoxicating quality of all mixtures and preparations used or intended to be used as beverages which do not fall within the enumerated class designated as "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors."

Same — purpose of statute.

4. The legislature, in the enactment of the local option statute (Sess. Laws 1909, p. 9), evidently had in mind a twofold object, first, that of discouraging, and as far as possible preventing, intoxication and intemperance in the use of intoxicants; and, secondly, and equally important, that of protecting the youth of the state from acquiring a taste for intoxicants and the habit of indulging in drinks and beverages that contain the intoxicating element.

Headnotes by AILSHIE, J.

Note. — Do statutes forbidding the sale of a certain class or classes of liquor include nonintoxicating liquor.

This question is the subject of notes in Luther v. State, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1146, and Bowling Green v. McMullen, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 895, and this note is supplementary thereto.

Upon the question whether proof of the sale of beer is sufficient to sustain a conviction under statutes prohibiting sale of APPPLICATION for writ of habeas corpus to secure petitioner's release from custody to which he had been committed for alleged violation of the local option statute. Proceedings dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hawley, Puckett, & Hawley for petitioner.

Messrs. D. C. McDougall, Attorney General, O. M. Van Duyn, J. H. Peterson, and F. A. Hagelin for the State.

Allshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner, Jacob Lockman, was arrested and taken before the probate court in Canyon county charged with selling intoxicating liquor in a prohibition district contrary to the local option statute. A preliminary examination was held, and the evidence taken has been made a part of the petition in this case. The petitioner insists that the complaint and depositions fail to show that he has committed any public offense, and that he is therefore held unlawfully and is entitled to his discharge. The undisputed evidence as developed at the preliminary examination shows that the petitioner sold to one Charles S. Paynter at the city of Nampa 4 quart bottles of malt liquor, commonly known as "near beer." It is admitted that Canyon county is a prohibition district within the meaning of the local option statute. Sess. Laws 1909, pp. 9-19. It is also admitted that this liquor, called "near beer," is a malt liquor. A chemist who analyzed the near beer purchased from petitioner testified that he found it contained 1.28 per cent alcohol, and 7.1 per cent malt extract. He also tesvinous, malt, fermented, or intoxicating liquors, see People v. Anderson, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 446.

As is shown in the earlier notes, the authorities upon this question are in direct conflict; the weight of authority, taking the view that where the statute expressly forbids the sale of a certain class of liquor, nonintoxicating as well as intoxicating liquors of that class are included within the prohibition. The same may be said of the more recent cases.

Thus, in LaFollette v. Murray, 81 Ohio St. 474, 91 N. E. 294, it was held that the statute imposing a tax upon the business of trafficking in "spirituous, vinous, malt, or other intoxicating liquors" included malt liquors, whether intoxicating or not. This decision was approved in State v. Walder, 83 Ohio St. 68, 93 N. E. 531. Prior decisions of inferior courts to the contrary must be considered as overruled. State v. Nunlist 9 Ohio N. P. (N. S.) 103; Graham v. State, 9 Ohio N. P. (N. S.) 174, 20 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 91.

The rule in Idaho is the same. See EX PARTE LOCKMAN.

Under § 1 of art. 3 of the Oklahoma act approved March 24, 1908 (§ 4180 of Snyder's Comp. Laws), forbidding the sale of "any spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquors, or any imitation or substitute therefor," it is necessary neither to allege nor prove that the liquor sold was intoxicating. The allegation and proof that the liquor sold was a spirituous, vinous, fermented, or malt liquor, as the case may be, or an imitation of or a substitute for one or the other of those liquors, is sufficient, and it will be no defense to show that the liquor was not intoxicating. Moss v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 247, 111 Pac. 950; Etter v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 230, 111 Pac. 957; Childers v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. Rep. 237, 111 Pac. 958.

The rule in Mississippi is that where the statute prohibits the sale of a certain named class of liquors as intoxicating liquors, such liquors cannot be sold though in fact they are intoxicating. Reyfelt v. State, 73 Miss. 415, 18 So. 925; Edwards v. Gulfport, 95 Miss. 148, 49 So. 620; Fuller v. Jackson, 97 Miss. 237, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1078, 52 So. 873; Purity Extract & Tonic Co. v. Lynch, 100 Miss. 650, 56 So. 316.

The court, however, was apparently inconsistent in holding also that the prohibition of the sale of "alcoholic" liquor does not apply to a beverage which contains less than $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent of alcohol. Fuller v. Jackson, supra.

Proof of a sale of "malt" liquor was held to be sufficient in Com. v. Burns, 38 Pa. Super. Ct. 514.

In State v. Stickle, 151 Iowa, 303, 131 N. W. 5, following Sawyer v. Botti, 147 Iowa, 453, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1007, 124 N. W. 787, cited in the note in 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 895, it was held that the trial court did not err in excluding testimony to the effect that the liquor in question would not produce intoxication, where it admittedly contained some alcohol and the statute forbade the sale of "any intoxicating liquor which term shall be construed to mean alcohol," etc., "and all intoxicating liquor whatever."

On the other hand, in Kentucky the rule has been adopted that a prohibition of the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors includes only liquors used as a beverage and when so used will produce intoxication. See Bowling Green v. McMullen, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 895, to which one of the earlier notes was attached.

This rule was approved in Com. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 140 Ky. 21, 130 S. W. 798, although the question was not definitely at issue. To the same effect, Gourley v. Com. 140 Ky. 221, — L.R.A. (N.S.) —, 131 S. W. 34.

So, in Sizemore v. Com. 140 Ky. 338, 131 S. W. 37, the court said: "This section only forbids the sale, directly or indirectly, of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors. It does not prohibit or punish the sale of 'any beverage, liquid mixture, or decoction of any kind which produces or causes intoxication.' An indictment under it should tified that this beer did not contain enough alcohol to intoxicate anyone, unless it would be in rare instances. He says that a person could not drink enough of it to secure sufficient alcohol to intoxicate him. It was practically conceded on the argument that this drink, designated "near beer," is classed among the "soft" drinks or "temperance" beverages, and is not ordinarily used as an intoxicant.

The only question to be determined in this case is whether or not the liquor or beverage called "near beer" falls within the purview of the local option statute, as the words "intoxicating liquors" are defined in § 31 thereof. That section reads as follows: "Sec. 31. The words 'intoxicating liquors' as used in this act shall be deemed and construed to include spirituous, vinous, malt and fermented liquors, and all mixtures and preparations thereof, including bitters and other drinks that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication."

The petitioner contends that the words, "that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication," refer to and modify "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors, and all mixtures and preparations thereof, including bitters and other drinks." In other words, the petitioner insists that the property or quality of producing intoxication is the test that must be applied in every case, whether the liquor be vinous, malt, fermented, or a mixture or preparation thereof, or any other drink. On the other hand, the state contends that the lawmakers have unqualifiedly and arbitrarily defined "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors" as intoxicating as a matter of law, whether they be intoxicating as charge the sale of spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, and this being so the accused cannot be convicted, unless the evidence shows that he sold, either directly or indirectly, spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, or a mixture of either with some other beverages, and that the beverage sold was intoxicating or one that the law would presume was. It is not, however, material under what name the manufacturer or vendor sells these liquors, or either of them, or the mixture of either with any other beverage, or by what name they are called or branded, if the evidence shows that the beverage is in fact one of these liquors, or a mixture of either with any other beverage, and is intoxicating or one that the law would presume was. It is what the liquor or beverage is, and not what it is called, that fixes its status. As the liquor or beverage the accused sold was a malt liquor or beverage, the indictment was properly returned under § 2557, and the accused, if it had shown that the 'Malt Mead' was intoxicating, could have been convicted for an offense against that section under the evidence that it was a malt liquor or beverage."

In Flanders v. Com. 140 Ky. 38, 130 S. W. 809, rehearing denied, 140 Ky. 659, 131 S. W. 495, the defendant was charged with selling common beer somewhat diluted under the name of "Doctor Fix." The court instructed the jury that if they found that the defendant had sold "ordinary beer, a malt liquor," they should find him guilty, but if they believed from the evidence that the liquor was a nonintoxicating liquor they should find the defendant not guilty. It is evident from the language of the chief justice in denying a rehearing that the court did not intend to depart from the rule laid down by the cases cited above; but the language in the principal opinion would indicate that the court, or at least the judge writing the opinion, took the contrary view. It was there said: "As therefore, the statute in terms prohibits the sale of malt liquors in local option territory, it is enough to inquire whether the liquor sold is malt liquor; if it is, the guilt is fixed. Whether it intoxicates some people or not, or is only a mild intoxicant, or whether defendant believed that it was an innocent soft drink, are immaterial."

And in Shreveport v. Smith, 130 La. 126, 57 So. 652, it was held that the term "malt liquors," as used in the provision of article 229 of the Constitution, which reads, "This restriction shall not apply to dealers in distilled, alcoholic, or malt liquors," and whereby political corporations, throughout the state, are left free to impose license taxes upon the dealers thus mentioned, without regard to the action or nonaction of the state in such cases, must be regarded as applying to malt liquors which are, or may be, used as beverages, and which are intoxicating, and as having no application to malt liquors which are not, or may not be, so used, and are not intoxicating. See also Shreveport v. Smith, 130 La. 132, 57 So. 655.

In State v. Maroun, 128 La. 829, 55 So. 472, it was held that the term "malt liquors," as used in act No. 4, Extra Session of 1910, to define the meaning of the term "grog or tippling shop," in prohibition districts, must be construed as including only malt liquors that are intoxicating. The intent of the legislature to penalize the sale of nonintoxicating beverages will not be presumed, especially where no such intent is expressed in the title of the act.

To these decisions State v. Durr, post, 764, is to be added, in which it was held that where the sale of "beer" is prohibited the defendant has the right to show that the "beer" sold by him was not intoxicating; the court further saying, however, that had the liquor sold been whisky, brandy, rum, gin, etc., the court would take judicial notice that it was intoxicating.

The word "liquor," as used in a statute imposing a tax upon "liquor" dealers, should be construed to apply only to intoxicating liquors. Austin v. Shelton, 122 Tenn. 634, 127 S. W. 446.

W. M. G.

a matter of fact or not. The state also contends that "all mixtures and preparations thereof, including bitters and other drinks" are to be tested by the proofs as to whether they will in fact produce intoxication. This case must be settled and determined upon the acceptance and application of one of these two views of the statute and theories of construction.

In support of the position taken by the defendant, he calls our attention to the following among other authorities: Campbell v. Thomasville, 6 Ga. App. 212, 64 S. E. 815; Stoner v. State, 5 Ga. App. 719, 63 S. E. 602; Ex parte Gray, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 83 S. W. 828; James v. State, 49 Tex. Crim. Rep. 334, 91 S. W. 227; Potts v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 368, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 194, 123 Am. St. Rep. 847, 97 S. W. 477. An examination of these cases discloses the fact that the Texas and Georgia courts construe somewhat similar statutes in harmony with the view maintained by the petitioner, and take the position that the statutes of those states were intended to prevent intemperance and intoxication, and that the test as to whether the liquor comes within the purview of those statutes is to be determined upon the intoxicating property or quality of the liquor or drink.

The state, on the other hand, calls our attention to a great array of authorities which seem to support its contention. Among the many cases cited, the following seem to be closely in point here: Sawyer v. Botti, 147 Iowa, 453, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1007, 124 N. W. 787; Luther v. State, 83 Neb. 455, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1146, 120 N. W. 125; State v. Frederickson, 101 Me. 37, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 186, 115 Am. St. Rep. 295, 63 Atl. 535, 8 Ann. Cas. 48; State v. Gill, 89 Minn. 502, 95 N. W. 449; State v. Piche, 98 Me. 348, 56 Atl. 1053.

In Sawyer v. Botti, the supreme court of Iowa as recently as February of this year had occasion to consider a statute somewhat similar to ours, and Mr. Justice McClain, speaking for the court, said: "The statute (Code, § 2382) prohibits the selling or keeping for sale, etc., of 'any intoxicating liquor, which term shall be construed to mean alcohol, ale, wine, beer, spirituous, vinous and malt liquor and all intoxicating liquor whatever,' except as otherwise provided. It is apparent, therefore, that the prohibition is twofold: First, of the sale of any liquor which is in fact intoxicating; second, of certain described liquors, whether intoxicating or not. In the second class are enumerated beer and malt liquor, and if the beverage in question is beer or malt liquor, then the fact that it is so manufactured as not to be intoxicating in its ordinary use as a beverage is immaterial. . . . 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The manufacturer cannot bring a malt liquor within the class of liquors not prohibited by the statute, by giving it some name other than that of beer, much less can he do so by adding a qualifying descriptive term to the word 'beer' used in the name. We reach the conclusion without the slightest doubt that the beverage in question, being a liquor manufactured from malted grain by a process involving fermentation, no matter how slight the fermentation may be, and irrespective of the amount of alcohol which it actually contains, and also without regard to whether it is in fact intoxicating, is within the statutory description of liquors the sale of which is prohibited."

In Luther v. State, the supreme court of Nebraska had under consideration a statute which provides that "all persons who shall sell or give away, upon any pretext, malt, spirituous, or vinous liquors, or any intoxicating drinks," without first having complied with the provisions of the act and obtained a license, should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, etc. In course of the consideration of that statute, the court said: "It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that it was the legislative intent to suppress the sale of intoxicating liquors, and that, although the term 'malt liquors' is used in the act, yet it was not the purpose to prevent the sale of malt liquors or liquids, unless they contained a sufficient quantity of alcohol to produce intoxication; or, stated differently, that the language used in §§ 11 and 20 must be construed to mean as if it read 'intoxicating malt liquor.' I cannot read the statute in that light. As well might we apply the adjective to the words 'spirituous' and 'vinous.' It is my opinion that the legislature realized and appreciated the fact that malt, spirituous, and vinous liquors are equally largely used as a beverage, and are alike injurious to the consumer, if not by producing immediate intoxication when taken in small quantities, by producing the same effect when more is taken and at the same time creating an abnormal appetite which leads to dissipation and inebriety. At any rate, the law prohibits the sale of 'malt liquors' without a license, and we must obey its plain mandate."

We quote the foregoing extracts to show what other courts have said of legislation similar to our own statute. It will thus be seen that courts of distinction and high standing and of states widely separated have taken contrary views of similar statutes. We shall therefore endeavor to ascertain from an independent examination what the legislature intended by the enactment of the statute under consideration, and in doing so our first consideration should be given to the natural, ordinary, and simple meaning and import of the language employed. The state contends that the words, "that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication," apply to and modify only the clause in which they are found, and refer to the mixtures and preparations named therein. This construction is in harmony with our understanding of the language used. On the other hand, if we should adopt the view taken by the defendant, we would have to hold that each kind or class enumerated commencing with the word "spirituous" is modified by the phrase, "that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication." The section written out in full, as defendant contends that it was intended, would read as follows: "Sec. 31. The words 'intoxicating liquors,' as used in this act, shall be deemed and construed to include spirituous liquors that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication, vinous liquors that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication, and malt liquors that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication, and fermented liquors that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication, and all mixtures and preparations thereof, including bitters and other drinks, that may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication."

We cannot agree with this contention. It is not to be presumed that the legislature would have entered into an enumeration of certain drinks commonly known and understood to contain the element of alcohol and to be intoxicating, if they had in fact intended that the test in all cases should be whether or not the drink is such as will produce intoxication. There would have been no reason for or object in enumerating these various liquors, distilled, vinous, malt, and fermented, if the legislature had intended that in all cases the test should be whether or not the drink is in fact such as will produce intoxication. The legislature, in the enactment of this law, evidently had in mind a twofold object: First, that of discouraging and as far as possible preventing intoxication and intemperance in the use of intoxicants; second, and equally important, that of protecting and preventing the boys and young men of the state from acquiring a taste for intoxicants and the habit of indulging in drinks and beverages that contain the intoxicating element. The legislature likewise recognized the fact that vinous, malt, and fermented liquors all contain, to some extent, the element of alcohol, although it may not be to such a degree as will produce intoxication. They therefore concluded when writing this statute defining the words "intoxicating liquors," to declare as a matter of law that all "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors" are intoxicating, irrespective of the amount of alcohol they may contain, and whether or not the particular kind of drink will in fact produce intoxication. They must also have had in mind the difficulty that would arise in the enforcement of such a law as they were enacting, if they left it to be proven in every case of the sale of a vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, whether or not the same was in fact such as would produce intoxication. If it were a question of fact in each case, one man might be convicted for the sale of a certain brand of malt or fermented liquor, while another man might be acquitted for the sale of the identical brand of liquor. Under that view of the statute, near beer might be sold in one prohibition district with safety and in another the sale prove to be a violation of the statute. This is a drink that furnishes great opportunities for violation of the statute. It was said by the supreme court of North Carolina, who evidently spoke from the record, in State v. Danenberg, 151 N. C. 718, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 890, 66 S. E. 301, that "although near beer properly made is a non-intoxicating beverage, the sale of it furnishes extraordinary opportunities for the violation of the state prohibition law; that it is made by those who make beer, sold by those who sell beer, and drunk by those who drink beer; and that 'it looks like beer, smells like beer, and tastes like beer?'"

In our judgment it was the clear and unmistakable intent of the legislature to say, as they had an undoubted right to say (State v. Frederickson, 101 Me. 37, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 186, 115 Am. St. Rep. 205, 63 Atl. 535, 8 Ann. Cas. 48; Woollen & T. Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 5, 114), that all "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors" should be treated as intoxicating within the meaning of this statute. The lawmakers also appreciated the fact that there would be many other mixtures and preparations used as a beverage that would produce intoxication, and which the lawmaking power could not specifically enumerate, and so they concluded that with reference to this latter class of drinks and beverages they would fix the test as one of fact in each case as to whether the drink or beverage would produce intoxication. We conclude, therefore, that § 31 of the local option law defining "intoxicating liquors" contains two divisions or classes of liquors or beverages: First, "spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors" which are declared as a matter of law to be intoxicating, and for which no proof is required except to show that they come within the enumeration; and, second, all other mixtures and preparations thereof which will in fact produce intoxication. In the latter case the state must prove that the liquor is such that it may be used as a beverage and produce intoxication. It is conceded that "near beer" is a malt liquor. It follows, therefore, from what has been said that it falls within the definition of § 31 of the local option statute, and is declared as a matter of law to be an intoxicating liquor, and cannot be sold in a prohibition district.

We conclude that the petitioner is properly held under process issued from a court of competent criminal jurisdiction. Petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Canyon county.

Proceeding dismissed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA

v.

E. W. DURR, Plff. in Err.

(69 W. Va. 251, 71 S. E. 767.)

Intoxicating Liquor — nonintoxicating quality as defense.

1. In defense of an indictment for selling intoxicating drinks, the article sold being labeled "Temperance Beer," the defendant has a right to show that it is not intoxicating.

Evidence — intoxicating liquor — sufficiency.

2. Upon trial of an indictment for selling intoxicating drinks, if the evidence show a sale of beer, the state has made a prima facie case for conviction, and need not give evidence that the beer is intoxicating; but the defendant may give evidence to prove that the beer sold is not intoxicating.

(April 25, 1911.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Randolph County to review a judgment convicting defendant of selling intoxicating liquors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. L. Wamsley, C. H. Scott, James Cobley, and W. E. Baker for plaintiff in error.

Headnotes by BRANNON, J.

Note. — As to whether statutes forbidding the sale of a certain class of liquor or liquors include nonintoxicating liquors, see note to Ex parte Lockman, ante, 759. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. H. G. Kump, for the State:

It is wholly immaterial whether all or any of the liquors are intoxicating or not, and no inquiry as to this fact can be entered into, and it would be no defense if the accused were able to prove that any of the prohibited liquors were absolutely free from all intoxicating qualities. The unlicensed sale of any or all of them is unlawful, because the legislature has so declared, and not for any other reason.

State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 53 Am. Rep. 79; 2 McClain, Crim. Law, § 1218; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 469; State v. Frederickson, 101 Me. 37, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 187, 115 Am. St. Rep. 295, 63 Atl. 535, 8 Ann. Cas. 48; Com. v. Bloss, 116 Mass. 56.

Mr. William G. Conley, Attorney General, also for the State.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An indictment charged E. W. Durr with selling, without license, spirituous liquors, wine, porter, ale, or beer, and drinks of like nature. He was found guilty by a jury, and judgment for $50 fine and sixty days' imprisonment was rendered against him.

On the trial the evidence was that he sold a drink called and labeled "Temperance Beer." The defendant offered to give evidence, by persons who knew and who had drunk and tested it, that it was not intoxicating, and that the stomach could not contain enough of it to produce intoxication. The court rejected the evidence proposed. The argument of the prosecution is that beer is specifically named in Code 1906, chap. 32, § 1, as a prohibited drink; that the sale of beer is unlawful without license, and no proof of its intoxicating character is required; that when once it is shown that beer is unlawfully sold the offense is proven, and there can be no evidence by the defendant that it is not intoxicating. I do not conceive that the word "temperance" before the word "beer" is material, any more than would be the word "apple" before the word "brandy." Whisky, brandy, gin, rum, and some other liquors are, by judicial cognizance, known to be intoxicating, and no proof that they are is required; nor is any evidence admissible to the contrary, when it has been proven that such liquors have been sold. 23 Cyc. 61. But we have the question in this case whether beer stands on like ground, though specified in the statutes. Is it, like whisky, to be held conclusively intoxicating? Where the thing sold is not by judicial cognizance known to be intoxicating, it must be proven to be so. "If the liquor be not judicially known as a prohibited liquor, then it must be alleged that it is an intoxicating, spirituous, distilled, malt, fermented, alcoholic, or vinous liquor, if the terms used in describing it are not judicially noticed as being descriptive of such liquor, and these allegations established by proof." Woolen & T. Intoxicating Liquors, § 78. Where whisky, brandy, or other known spirituous liquor is sold, it is not necessary to allege that the particular liquor was sold, because our statute prohibits sale of spirituous liquors, and, such drinks being known to be spirituous, it is not necessary to prove their character.

The cases of State v. Gillispie, 63 W. Va. 152, 59 S. E. 957; State v. Good, 56 W. Va. 215, 49 S. E. 121, and State v. Cool, 66 W. Va. 86, 66 S. E. 740, are not authority on the question before us; that is, can the defendant, selling beer, prove that it is not intoxicating? They do hold that, as to drinks not mentioned in the statute, such defense may be made; they do hold that, as to such drinks, intoxicating quality is the test. They involved drinks called "malt," "senoj cider," and "rikk," not by name mentioned in the statute, and not judicially known to be spirituous and intoxicating, and in such cases the intoxicating quality is the test, and open to proof on both sides; but in this case we have the sale of beer, a drink prohibited by name in the statute, and prima facie intoxicating. We hold that, when it is proven that a liquor called "beer" has been sold, the case is proven prima facie; but, as all beers are not intoxicating, the defense that it is not is admissible. Woolen & T. Intoxicating Liquors, § 76, says: "Whether or not courts will take judicial notice that beer is an intoxicating or malt liquor has been one of much contrariety of opinion, and this arises from the fact that there are many kinds of beer well known to be neither malt nor fermented nor intoxicating liquors. Therefore, upon a proof of a sale of 'beer,' and nothing more, many cases hold that it is not shown that there was a sale of either malt or intoxicating liquor. But by the better line of cases, on proof of a sale of 'beer,' even without additional words, the courts will construe it as a sale of fermented, malted, or intoxicating liquors, and the burden is upon the persons claiming it is not a malted, fermented, or intoxicating liquor to show that fact. These decisions are based on the primary meaning of the word 'beer.' 'Webster,' said the supreme court of Indiana, 'defines beer to be "a fermented liquor made from any malted grain, with hops and other bitter flavoring matter." In other words it is a malt liquor, which the same author declares to be "a liquor prepared for drink by an infusion of malt, as beer, ale, porter," etc. It may, therefore, be said that beer is a liquor infused with malt and prepared by fermentation for use as a beverage. As a consequence, when "beer" is called for at a place at which intoxicating drinks are sold, the bartender, having in view the primary meaning as well as the common use of the word, is justified in inferring and must reasonably infer that malted and fermented beer is wanted. If any other kind of beer is desired, it is expected that qualifying words will be used, such as spruce beer, root beer, small beer, ginger beer, and the like, thus attaching a remote and secondary meaning to the word "beer" as descriptive of particular beverages. When, therefore, a witness testifies to the sale or giving away of beer under circumstances which make the sale or giving away of any intoxicating liquors unlawful, the prima facie inference is that the beer was of that malted and fermented quality declared by the statute to be an intoxicating liquor, and the court trying the case ought to take judicial notice of the inference which there arises from the use of the word "beer" in its primary and general sense.' So, where the term 'lager beer' is used in testimony, the inference is that an intoxicating beer was meant. In days gone by, when the term 'strong beer' was in use to distinguish it from small beer, courts took judicial notice that it was intoxicating. Where a statute declares that lager beer is an intoxicating liquor, it cannot be shown that it in fact is not; for the legislature has fixed its status by a statute the courts cannot question. The courts cannot, however, take notice that rice beer is an intoxicant; that is a question for the jury."

We know as a court, people know, that there are beers innocent, and not intoxicating, and extensively used, and some that are intoxicating, and it seems consonant with reason, with justice, that one charged with selling "beer" should be allowed to prove that it is of a kind not intoxicating. In every case it is a jury question upon the evidence. State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 53 Am. Rep. 79, is cited. We do not think it is apposite in this case. It held that sale of cider or crab cider was not unlawful; the reason being that it was not named in the statute, and did not come under the head of spirituous liquors, and not a "mixture" or "preparation" known as "bitters," producing intoxication. As the court held it immaterial that crab cider was intoxicating, the state would use that case in this case to show that whether the beer sold was intoxicating is irrelevant and evidence on that question not admissible; but that case does not so direct in this case. It was under a statute (Laws 1877, chap. 107,

§ 1) prohibiting sale of spirituous liquors, and saying that all "mixtures or preparations known as 'bitters' or otherwise, which will produce intoxication, shall be deemed spirituous liquors." Since then, in 1885, the section (as amended by Laws 1885, chap. 17) was amended by inserting the word "liquors" in addition to "mixtures" and "preparations" (Laws 1887, chap. 29), and now cider would be a liquid, and, if strong enough to produce intoxication, would be, in law, deemed spirituous liquor, and evidence to prove and disprove its intoxicating properties would be admissible.

We think that the Circuit Court erred in rejecting all the evidence proposed to deny the intoxicating quality of the beer.

Judgment reversed; case remanded.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

PETER PETERSON, Appt.,
v.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

(149 Iowa, 496, 128 N. W. 932.)

Servant — unsafe working place — starting machinery.

1. A servant injured while attempting to clean the bottom of the shaft of a coal hoist,

Note. — Starting machinery as act of vice principal or fellow servant.

Upon the general question whether the duty of the master to instruct or warn servants is delegable or nondelegable, see exhaustive note to Anderson v. Pittsburg Coal Co. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 624.

Upon the question of whether operator of elevator or other hoisting apparatus is a fellow servant of other employees of the same establishment, see note to Judd v. Letts, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 156.

As to who are fellow servants of linemen, see the note to Shank v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 47. This note approaches the present note in those cases wherein the relationship of the person in charge and control of the current, to the linemen, is discussed.

Cases involving injury because of the negligence in starting trains have not been included in this note, since they are generally decided by rules which are peculiar to the operation of railroads. Cases involving injuries caused by the starting of an elevator without warning have been included in this note, since the principles governing such cases differ in no respect from the principles governing cases having to do with the starting of other kinds of machinery.

It is to be remembered in all cases turning upon the fellow servant doctrine that the test of the relationship between two by the starting of the machinery to raise a bucket while he is in a position of danger, cannot hold the master liable for the injury, on the theory that he had not been furnished a safe place to work, where the place was safe except when the machinery was running, which was a matter controlled entirely by another servant of the employer.

Same — act of fellow servant.

2. The act of a foreman in charge of the work at a coal elevator of a railroad company, in starting the machinery to raise a bucket while a servant was in a position of peril in the shaft, is that of a fellow servant of the latter, and not that of the employer.

Same — dangerous place — failure to warn.

3. The rule that a master is liable for any injury to an employee which may result from his being sent into a dangerous place to perform labor without warning of the danger does not apply to render the master liable, where the place is safe except when the machinery installed therein is started, and the only lack of warning is failure to give notice to the servant while he is in a position of danger, of the foreman's intention to start the machinery.

(December 15, 1910.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Cass County in defendant's favor in an action brought to coemployees is in some jurisdictions determined by the grade of the negligent employee and in others by the character of the negligent act. Wherever it is possible in the following note, this distinction has been noted, but in a large number of the cases it is impossible to tell to which test the case is referred.

At common law.

The general rule supported by the great weight of authority is that at common law the mere act of starting machinery is, in the absence of the qualifying elements which are noted below, the act of a fellow servant for whose negligence in connection therewith the master is not liable.

Thus, in English v. Roberts, J. & R. Shoe Co. 145 Mo. App. 439, 122 S. W. 747, it was held that where a servant was injured by the negligence of a person who occupied a dual capacity as vice principal and fellow servant in negligently starting a machine, such negligence must be deemed to have been committed in the capacity of fellow servant.

So, in Baier v. Selke, 211 Ill. 512, 103 Am. St. Rep. 208, 71 N. E. 1074, it was held that, in the absence of any evidence to show that the starting of the machinery pertained in any way to the duties of the foreman, the master would not be held liable for the negligence of the coemployee in recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Statement by McClain, J.:

Action to recover damages for personal injuries received while in defendant's employment. At the close of the evidence introduced for plaintiff, the court sustained defendant's motion for a directed verdict, and plaintiff appeals.

Mr. H. M. Boorman, for appellant:

An employee acting under the specific order of one who has authority to direct has a right to assume, in the absence of starting the machinery while the plaintiff was in a place of danger.

And in New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson, 136 Ind. 398, 43 Am. St. Rep. 327, 35 N. E. 7, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 467, the court sustained a demurrer to a complaint based upon the negligence of a foreman in sending a workman into a place of danger near machinery, and then permitting the machinery to be started without warning to the servant, upon the ground that the negligence of the foreman in failing to prevent the starting of the machinery was not shown to have been the omission of a duty expressly or impliedly delegated to him by the master.

So, too, in Sandusky Portland Cement Co. v. Rice, — Ind. App. —, 81 N. E. 213, it was said that the starting of machinery was not an act of the master, but that of a fellow servant.

The starting of a printing press by the pressman, whereby his assistant is injured, is merely the act of a fellow servant for which the employer is not liable to the assistant, although he is under the direction and control of the pressman in respect to the running of the press. Doerr v. Daily News Pub. Co. 97 Minn. 248, 106 N. W. 1044.

A foreman has no authority to bind the master by an agreement to watch a switch box and keep it open so as to render safe the place of work of a wire man, where, in the absence of such an agreement, there is no rule of law making the defendant liable. Guest v. Edison Illuminating Co. 150 Mich. 438, 114 N. W. 226.

In Vernon Cotton Oil Co. v. Catron, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 137 S. W. 404, where the employee's place of work in a cotton-seed house was dangerous when the machinery was not running, it was held that it would be the act of a fellow servant to give the signal to the seed house that the machinery was about to stop, because the signal was not a part of the system of work adopted and put into use by the master, nor intended to be used by him, nor relied upon by the deceased as a precaution or timely warning against the transitory danger of seed caving in on the feeder.

warning or notice, that his superior who gave the order will not, by his own negligence, make the work unsafe.

Labatt, Mast. & S. §§ 542, 580; Schminkey v. T. M. Sinclair & Co. 137 Iowa, 130, 114 N. W. 612; Taylor v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 121 Ind. 124, 6 L.R.A. 584, 16 Am. St. Rep. 371, 22 N. E. 876.

The foreman was a vice principal.

Carlson v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. 63 Minn. 428, 65 N. W. 914; Russ v. Wabash Western R. Co. 112 Mo. 45, 18 L.R.A. 824, 20 S. W. 472; Tills v. Great Northern R. Co. 50 Wash. 536, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 434, 97 Pac. 737; Newbury v. Getchel & M. Lumbar & Mfg. Co. 100 Iowa, 441, 62 Am. St. Rep. 582, 69 N. W. 743; Baldwin v. St.

So, an employee in charge of a derrick or other hoisting machinery does not represent the master in causing the machinery to start for the purpose of carrying forward the work. Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Harrell, 161 Ind. 689, 63 L.R.A. 460, 68 N. E. 262 (foreman of bridge construction company directed the raising of a large stone by means of a derrick so constructed as to swing over a track at a time when a train was passing); Adams v. Cabin Branch Coal Co. 147 Ky. 595, 144 S. W. 759 (servant in charge of a drum by which cars were raised up an incline in a mine); Berneche v. Hilliard, 101 Minn. 366, 112 N. W. 392 (foreman in charge of the construction of a building mere fellow servant in signaling engineer to start engine operating the derrick); Galvin v. Pierce, 72 N. H. 79, 54 Atl. 1014 (employee in charge of a steam crane used to lift stones out of quarry); Palmieri v. S. Pearson & Son, 128 App. Div. 231, 112 N. Y. Supp. 684 (foreman of gang giving signals for movement of traveling crane); Prengen v. Stone & W. Engineering Corp. 66 Wash. 204, 119 Pac. 193 (workman giving signals for movements of hoisting derrick).

In a large number of cases it has been held that the master was not liable for injuries caused to one servant by the sudden starting of the machinery by another servant, where the two servants were fellow servants; in the great majority of these cases, however, no mention is made of the peculiar nature of the act nor whether the duty to start machinery is a delegable or nondelegable duty of the master:

W. 875 (operator of machinery used to unload coal, and employee charged with duty to give warning to other employees in hold of the starting of the machinery, are fellow servants of such employees in hold).

As was suggested above, there are several qualifying elements which may enter into cases of this character so as to render the master liable.

In a few cases where the servant was injured by the starting of machinery without warning and the master was held liable, the liability has been predicated upon other grounds.

Thus, in Matthews v. Bull, — Cal. —, 47 Pac. 773, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 206, the master was held liable for injuries caused by the negligence of a stationary engineer in let-

U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914; Schminkey v. T. M. Sinclair & Co. 137 Iowa, 130, 114 N. W. 612; 4 Thomp. Neg. § 4664; Benak v. Paxton & V. Iron Works, 85 Neb. 836, 124 N. W. 461; Streicher v. Davenport Brick & Tile Co. — Iowa, —, 124 N. W. 327.

Messrs. Carroll Wright, J. L. Parrish, and J. B. Rockafellow, for appellee:

The act of a servant in starting machinery without warning is the act of a fellow servant, no matter what his rank is.

Barnicle v. Connor, 110 Iowa, 238, 81 N. W. 452; Scott v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 113 Iowa, 381, 85 N. W. 631; Helgeson v. E. B. Higley Co. 148 Iowa, 587, 126 N. W. 769; Galloway v. J. W. Turner Improv. Co. 148 Iowa, 93, 126 N. W. 1033.

ting the hammer of a pile driver fall without proper notice to the employee engaged in putting a ring on the pile, but the liability in this case was predicated upon the master's retention, with knowledge, of an incompetent employee as engineer.

And in O'Donnell v. American Sugar Ref. Co. 41 App. Div. 307, 58 N. Y. Supp. 648, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 322, the master was held liable for injuries due to the negligent starting of machinery at the order of a foreman, but the negligence was predicated upon the retention of an incompetent foreman.

So, in McCall's Ferry Power Co. v. Price, 108 Md. 96, 69 Atl. 832, the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of an engineer in starting his engine to raise a bucket loaded with sand and other material while the plaintiff was in a place of danger, but the liability of the defendant was predicated upon its negligence in retaining in its employment an engineer who was incompetent and whose incompetence was known to the employer.

Of course if the master himself knows or is chargeable with knowledge of the plaintiff's danger he will be liable. Model Automobile Co. v. Sterling, — Ind. App. —, 99 N. E. 51.

In Latting v. Owasso Mfg. Co. 78 C. C. A. 183, 148 Fed. 369, the negligent servant was admittedly a coservant of the injured employee, but the negligence complained of was not the starting of the machinery, but rather the manner in which the servant performed the work.

In Perras v. A. Booth & Co. 82 Minn. 191, 84 N. W. 739, 85 N. W. 179, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 328, it was held that whether the act of the defendant's superintendent in moving an elevator was an act of a fellow servant or of a vice principal was, under all the circumstances of the case, a question of fact for the jury.

It seems to be the general rule, supported alike by reason and authority, that where the master or his representative sends an employee into a place of work in close proximity to machinery, which will become

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time of receiving the injury complained of, plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant as a laborer, engaged in breaking up coal to be elevated in defendant's coal chute at Atlantic. When the coal was sufficiently broken, it was elevated by buckets to bins in the top of the building, from which it might be discharged into the tenders of engines. It was necessary, from time to time, for the plaintiff in the course of his employment to go into the pit at the bottom of the shaft in which the buckets were hoisted, and clean out the loose coal. This work was not dangerous in its nature, unless buckets of coal were being elevated at the same time.

dangerous only if the machinery is started, he owes such servant the duty of using reasonable care to prevent the machinery from starting while the servant is in such place, and the master is liable for injuries caused by failure so to do:

Mathews v. Daly-West Min. Co. 27 Utah, 193, 75 Pac. 722; Kirk v. Senzig, 79 Ill. App. 251; Bradford v. Taylor, 85 Miss. 409, 37 So. 812; Western Electric Co. v. Hanselmann, 70 L.R.A. 765, 69 C. C. A. 346, 136 Fed. 564, writ of certiorari denied in 197 U. S. 624, 49 L. ed. 911, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 800; Cristanelli v. Saginaw Min. Co. 154 Mich. 423, 117 N. W. 910.

So, in Hunter v. D. W. Alderman & Sons Co. 89 S. C. 502, 71 S. E. 1082, the court laid down a general rule that if the master assumes a special obligation to keep a place of labor safe by not starting the machinery, and the machinery was started by the direction of a person who was intrusted by the master with the authority to require an act to be done which would start the machinery, such act would be the act of the master and such person a representative of the master in that particular act.

The master is liable for the negligence of an employee intrusted with the responsibility of looking after the machinery at a mill and keeping it in proper repair, in starting the machinery while another employee was, under his direction, oiling the same and in a position where he could not see the act of the superintendent. Hughlett v. Ozark Lumber Co. 53 Mo. App. 87.

The vice principal who orders a workman into a place of danger and then, knowing that he is there and without warning, negligently starts machinery into operation by an act which, under ordinary circumstances, would have been performed by him in the capacity of a fellow servant, must be held to have acted as a vice principal in starting the machine, as well as in the previous act which placed the employee in the dangerous situation. Cody v. Longyear, 103 Minn. 116, 114 N. W. 735. To the same effect, Lohman v. Swift & Co. 105 Minn. 148, 117 N. W. 418; Wiggin v. Northwest Paper

In that event there was danger of coal falling from the buckets upon the defendant, working below. The work was in charge of one Dreager, as foreman, and he had personal charge of the motive power, and determined when the buckets should be operated. On one occasion not long prior to the accident in question, plaintiff had complained to Dreager that buckets of coal were being run up while he was working in the pit below, and he was thereby put in danger; and Dreager had assured him that thereafter the machinery would never be started while plaintiff was at work in the pit. The evidence tends to show that in violation of this promise, while plaintiff was at work in the pit and with knowledge of that fact, Dreager started the engine, causing a bucket of coal to be elevated, from which a large piece of coal fell, striking the plaintiff beneath and causing him the injury now complained of. The negligence relied upon was in not affording plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which to work and in negligently starting the hoisting apparatus while plaintiff was in a place of danger, thereby occasioning his injury. It is also contended that plaintiff was improperly ordered into a dangerous place to perform labor, without notice or warning as to the danger and hazard involved.

1. It is quite evident that there was no breach of duty on the part of the defendant in furnishing plaintiff a safe place to work. The place in which he was working

Co. 119 Minn. 273, 137 N. W. 1113; Kempfert v. Gas Traction Co. 120 Minn. 90, 139 N. W. 145.

And the master is also generally held liable for the acts of an employee admitted to be a vice principal ordinarily when such act was not performed while the vice principal was actively engaged in assisting the servant in the actual operation of the machine.

Thus, in Hess v. Adamant Mfg. Co. 66 Minn. 79, 68 N. W. 774, it was held that the act of a superintendent in turning the power onto an elevator which caused it to descend and injure an employee at work in the shaft below was an act of superintendence in which he represented the master, where his purpose in so doing was to test the power and to see that the machinery was running properly.

So, in Moore v. King Mfg. Co. 124 Ga. 576, 53 S. E. 107, it was held that the master was liable for the negligence of a general manager and superintendent in starting a machine while an employee was in a place of danger, if he started the machine while not actually engaged in assisting the plaintiff to operate the machine.

And an electrician in charge of the electrical apparatus in a manufacturing plant is not the fellow servant of his helper engaged in repairing a motor, where the electrician had promised the helper that the current would not be turned on while he was at work there, and the electrician was not himself assisting in the repairing. Marquette Cement Mfg. Co. v. Williams, 230 Ill. 26, 82 N. E. 424.

One operating a body maker in a can manufactory, having authority to direct the actions of the machine tender, and therefore representing the master in directing the tender to remove a can body which has caught in the machine, does not, by reason of the fact that it is his duty to start the machinery with his own hand, become a fellow servant of the tender in so doing, so as to relieve the master from liability for injuries to the tender caused by his starting the machinery before the tender has withdrawn his hand from within it. 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Norton Bros. v. Nadebok, 190 Ill. 595, 54 L.R.A. 842, 60 N. E. 843. To the same effect, Roebbling Constr. Co. v. Thompson, 229 Ill. 42, 82 N. E. 196, affirming 129 Ill. App. 20, where the plaintiff was injured by the sudden moving of the elevator by a foreman as he was putting a wheelbarrow on the elevator in accordance with the orders of the foreman.

A foreman who has full control and supervision over the operation of both the servants who started the machinery and of the injured servant, with power to employ and discharge them subject only to the approval of the president of the defendant company, acts as a vice principal in directing the machinery to be started. Sullivan-Sanford Lumber Co. v. Cooper, — Tex. —, 142 S. W. 1168, reversing — Tex. Civ. App. —, 126 S. W. 35.

So, in Nix v. Texas P. R. Co. 82 Tex. 473, 27 Am. St. Rep. 897, 18 S. W. 571, it was held that the railroad company would be liable for the negligence of an employee in applying steam to machinery while another employee was in a place of danger, where he had power to hire and discharge the injured employee, and the latter was subject to his orders in respect to the conduct of the work.

Where it is expressly admitted that the negligent employee was the vice principal of the defendant, it is not error not to give an instruction upon the fellow servant rule. Eastman Cotton Mills v. Suggs, 136 Ga. 388, 71 S. E. 667.

In holding that a lumber company was liable for the negligence of a sawyer in starting the carriage whereby one of his subordinates was injured, the court in Evans v. Louisiana Lumber Co. 111 La. 534, 35 So. 736, said: "In running its mill defendant intrusted the duty of working the saw, running the log carrier, and of applying the steam to the appliance and turning logs to the sawyer. Negligence of the sawyer, its servant in charge of a special duty, became the negligence of defendant."

And the master has been held liable for failure to maintain some system of warning where the motive power was controlled was entirely safe so long as the machinery used in elevating the buckets of coal was not in operation. The peril involved was in the improper method of performing the work, and not in any improper conditions under which the work was to be performed. The place in which an employee is directed to work is "safe," within the meaning of the law, "when all the safeguards and precautions which ordinary experience, prudence, and foresight would suggest have been taken to prevent injury to the employee while he is himself exercising reasonable care in the service which he undertakes to perform." Martin v. Des Moines Edison Light Co. 131 Iowa, 734, 106 N. W. 359. The injury to plaintiff was not due to the character of the place in which he was put to work, but to the fault of Dreager in starting the machinery while plaintiff was in such position that the hoisting of the bucket of coal would imperil his safety; and it is practically conceded in argument that the method of doing the business did not necessarily require nor involve the operation of the machinery while plaintiff was in such situation. There was nothing omitted, so far as it appears from the evidence, in providing a safe place and a safe method. What was omitted, resulting in the injury to plaintiff, was proper caution on the part of Dreager in starting the machinery under his control while the plaintiff was so situated as to be placed in peril.

2. It is contended, however, that Dreager at a distance from the machinery, so that the employees about the machinery had no means of knowing when it would be started.

Thus, in Hunter v. North Iowa Brick & Tile Co. — Iowa, —, 136 N. W. 515, it was held that a master who maintained two machines for the grinding of clay in one room, which were operated by an engine in another room, must establish and maintain a system of warning whereby the employees around the machinery would know when the engine in the adjoining room was to start.

And a ship carpenter designated by the foreman in charge of the construction of a ship to act as intermediary to transmit signals from him to those in charge of a winch operated by steam, by which cants or framing of the ship are raised to place and held until fastened, and which is needlessly placed out of sight of the foreman, whose signals are necessary to effect the proper adjustment of the cants, is not a fellow servant of the carpenters engaged in fastening the cants in place, and the master will be liable in case he negligently transmits the foreman's signal, in consequence of which the cant falls and injures a carpenter. Sroufe v. Moran Bros. Co. 28 Wash. 381, 58 L.R.A. 313, 92 Am. St. Rep. 847, 68 Pac. 896.

So, the operator of a logging engine is not a fellow servant of the men attaching the cable to the logs, where the engine is placed at such a distance from the place where the men are at work that they are unable to see the engineer and to guard themselves against his acts; consequently, the master is liable for the negligence of the engineer in starting the engine without waiting the customary signal from the men. Conine v. Olympia Logging Co. 36 Wash. 345, 78 Pac. 932.

The feeder of a machine for making brick, whose duty it is to signal for the starting of the machinery is not a fellow servant of another coemployee who is out of sight of the feeder and so is unable to tell when the machinery may start. Grosjean v. Denny-Renton Clay & Coal Co. 62 Wash. 196, 113 Pac. 570.

95 N. E. 627, it was held that the master was liable for the negligence of a servant in setting in operation electrical appliances by means of which were moved the heavy ingot buggies on the track whereby another servant was injured.

In Sturm v. Consolidated Coal Co. 248 Ill. 20, 93 N. E. 345, 21 Ann. Cas. 99, it was held that the engineer at the surface of a mine and the cager at the bottom of the shaft could not be said, as a matter of law, to be fellow servants of another employee whose duty it was to grease and keep in order the cable operating the cars.

So, the master has been held liable for failure to give a warning of the starting of machinery, where it is customary so to do and the employees relied upon such warning.

Thus, in Fitzgerald v. International Flax Twine Co. 104 Minn. 138, 116 N. W. 475, where it was customary always to give warning before the starting of machinery, it was held that this duty of giving warning was an absolute duty of the master which he could not delegate, and consequently the master was liable for the act of a foreman in starting the machinery without giving such warning.

So, where the servant's place of work will be rendered dangerous by the starting of machinery, and it is customary for a signal to be given whenever the machinery is started, the master will be liable for the act of the persons in charge of the machinery in starting it without giving such warning. Ondis v. Great Atlantic & P. Tea Co. 82 N. J. L. 511, post, 777, 81 Atl. 586.

A master engaged in the work of repairing a swinging bridge owes to his employees the nondelegable duty of warning them when the bridge is about to be moved, so that they may get to a place of safety. Haun v. Cincinnati, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 28 Ohio C. C. 422.

In Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey, 92 Va. 554, 24 S. E. 232, it was held that the master would be liable for the act of his superintendent in directing the starting of an engine used to draw a car by means of a steel cable, without giving the customary as foreman was vice principal, and his negligence was chargeable to defendant. For some purposes he may have been vice principal, but as to the particular negligent act on his part which caused injury to plaintiff he was his fellow servant. So far as the negligent act causing the injury was concerned, it might as well have been performed by another servant of equal rank with the plaintiff as by Dreager, who was for some purposes a superior. Such act was not, therefore, an act of the defendant in the discharge of its duty of supervision, but the act of a fellow servant in carrying on the work. If the engine had been in charge of another employee of equal rank with plaintiff, there could be no claim that the negligent act was not that of a fellow servant in the ordinary course of his employment. In this state we do not treat the relative rank of two employees as of controlling importance, and do not recognize the so-called "superior servant" rule. One who is for some purposes a superior servant or foreman, and authorized to direct the work of the employee who is injured, is nevertheless a fellow servant as to acts which do not involve the exercise of such superior authority. Scott v. Chicago & G. W. R. Co. 113 Iowa, 381, 85 N. W. 631; Barnicle v. Connor, 110 Iowa, 238, 81 N. W. 452; Beresford v. American Coal Co. 124 Iowa, 34, 70 L.R.A. 266, 98 N. W. 902; Helgeson v. E. B. Higley Co. 148 Iowa, 587, 126 N. W. 769.

3. The cases principally relied upon for warning, whereby the cable was straightened out with great force and struck an employee engaged in loading the car.

In Washington the master is generally held liable for the act of a superior servant in starting machinery without giving warning to other servants situated in places of danger, but it is not always possible to tell whether the liability of the master is predicated upon the grade of the negligent employee or upon the character of the act.

Thus, in Keller v. White River Lumber Co. 66 Wash. 153, 119 Pac. 4, it was held that the master would be liable for the act of a vice principal in starting the machinery in a negligent manner at a time when the plaintiff was in a place of danger, the same as the master would be liable had the vice principal given the direction to the engineer to start it at such time.

And in giving a warning by the whistle before starting the machinery of a mill, an engineer is performing a nondelegable duty. Comrade v. Atlas Lumber & Shingle Co. 44 Wash. 470, 87 Pac. 517.

The master's duty to properly control a cable used to lower tiles into the hold of a vessel is one which cannot be delegated to a fellow servant so as to relieve the master of liability for negligence in the starting of the cable at an unexpected time. Westerlund v. Rothschild, 53 Wash. 626, 102 Pac. 765.

A blacksmith who is in full control of the operation of a steam hammer and of the servant assisting him to operate it is not the fellow servant of such assistant, so as to relieve the master from liability for injuries caused by his negligently starting the hammer without notice. Dyer v. Union Iron Works, 64 Wash. 577, 117 Pac. 387.

In the following Washington cases the lumber company has been held liable for the negligence of a sawyer in starting the machinery of the sawmill without warning while employees were in a place of danger: O'Brien v. Page Lumber Co. 39 Wash. 537, 82 Pac. 114; Dossett v. St. Paul & T. Lumber Co. 40 Wash. 276, 82 Pac. 273; Maloney 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Stetson & P. Mill Co. 46 Wash. 645, 90 Pac. 1046; King v. Page Lumber Co. 66 Wash. 123, 119 Pac. 180.

Under statutes.

Under the employers' liability acts making the master liable for the negligence of a person to whom superintendence is intrusted, the master is liable where the act of the superintendent in causing the machinery to start is done while he is exercising the functions of superintendence.

Thus, where the superintendent of a factory had caused a machine to be stopped and had directed the operator to clean it, and, while the operator was so doing and was in a place of danger, caused the machinery to be started again, the master is liable. Kushnizki v. New England Biscuit Co. 210 Mass. 177, 96 N. E. 67.

So, in Cavagnaro v. Clark, 171 Mass. 359, 50 N. E. 542, it was held that the master was liable under the employers' liability act for the negligence of a superintendent in ordering an elevator to start while the plaintiff was in a place of danger, or of negligence in not countermanding the order after he had seen the predicament of the plaintiff.

A similar decision was rendered upon similar facts in Keating v. Hewatt, 212 Mass. 577, 99 N. E. 479.

And the master is liable for the negligence of an employee who has been charged with a duty of instructing a new employee, where the former, before the period of instruction was over, negligently set a machine in motion while the new servant was in a place of danger. Greco v. Pratt Chuck Co. 127 App. Div. 798, 11 N. Y. Supp. 1000, affirmed in 196 N. Y. 543, 89 N. E. 1101.

Under the New York employers' liability act it has been held that the superintendent of a factory is, in starting a machine after it had been stopped by the operator, performing an act of superintendence, so that the master is liable for resulting injuries. American Mfg. Co. v. Bigelow, 110 C. C. A. 77, 188 Fed. 34.

appellant are those involving negligence of the employer, acting through a vice principal, in sending the employee into a place which the vice principal knew or should have known was dangerous, without a reasonable appreciation on the part of the employee that such place was in fact dangerous. McGuire v. Waterloo & C. F. Union Mill Co. 137 Iowa, 447, 113 N. W. 850; Schminkey v. T. M. Sinclair & Co. 137 Iowa, 130, 114 N. W. 612. But here the place in which plaintiff was put to work was not inherently dangerous, either by reason of its natural condition, or the method in which the work was usually carried on. It became dangerous only by reason of the fault of Dreager in starting the machinery without proper warning. It is true that we have held that the duty to give warning in case of the use of dangerous explosives rests upon the master as a part of his duty of supervision. Hendrickson v. United States Gypsum Co. 133 Iowa, 89, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 555, 110 N. W. 322, 12 Ann. Cas. 246. But that case has been explained and limited in Galloway v. J. W. Turner Improv. Co. 148 Iowa, 93, 126 N. W. 1033, so that it is not applicable to the case before us. Indeed, the opinion in the Hendrickson Case itself involves the limitations which make it inapplicable here. The Galloway Case is directly in point, in holding that where two employees are co-operating in carrying on a piece of work, although one of them may be superior to the other in authority, yet if the injury

So, the act of a superintendent in starting a machine while the operator thereof had gone to another floor to adjust certain portions of the machinery was held to be an act of superintendence in Roche v. Lowell Bleachery, 181 Mass. 480, 63 N. E. 943.

While the running of an elevator in itself involves no "element of superior duty, supervision, or command" (see Gallagher v. Newman, 190 N. Y. 444, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 146, 83 N. E. 480), yet where a foreman runs an elevator up to a certain floor in a building, and directs the regular elevator operator to deliver a bundle on that floor of the building, and promises him to hold the elevator until he returns, the direction of the foreman and his assurance that the elevator would not be moved are acts of superintendence, and negligence in connection therewith renders the master liable. Martin v. Cornell, 136 App. Div. 585, 121 N. Y. Supp. 119.

In Guilmartin v. Solvay Process Co. 189 N. Y. 490, 82 N. E. 725, it was held that the act of a foreman in directing some of the men under him to repair a belt without stopping the machinery was an act of superintendence for which the master was liable.

In the following cases, which were decided under the New York employers' liability act, it was held that the master was negligent for the act of the superintendent in starting the machinery:

Smith v. Milliken Bros. 200 N. Y. 21, 93 N. E. 184, affirming 133 App. Div. 903, 117 N. Y. Supp. 285; Carlson v. United Engineering & Contracting Co. 113 App. Div. 371, 98 N. Y. Supp. 1036 (foreman superintending repairs on stationary engine); Boyle v. McNulty Bros. 129 App. Div. 412, 113 N. Y. Supp. 240 (the signal of one conceded a superintendent to raise an elevator when the natural signal would have been to lower it is an act of superintendence); Buckley v. Beinhauer, 136 App. Div. 540, 121 N. Y. Supp. 180, affirmed in 201 N. Y. 572, 95 N. E. 1124 (foreman took place of signalman in giving signals for raising and lowering of hoist). 46 L.R.A.(N.S.)

The mere fact that the superintendent himself performs the manual act of starting the machinery will not relieve the master.

Thus, the master is liable for the negligence of an engineer who directs an oiler to prize an engine off "top center" where the steam would not move it, when the engineer knew that the steam had been turned on and that the engine would turn rapidly the instant it was moved off the center; and the fact that the engineer had himself turned the steam on is immaterial. Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Austell, 161 Ala. 418, 49 So. 685.

So, if a superintendent is negligent in causing an engine to be started, the fact that he himself does the manual work of starting it does not relieve the master from liability. McPhee v. New England Structural Co. 188 Mass. 141, 74 N. E. 303, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 455.

In a few cases the superintendency of the negligent servant has been held to be a question for the jury.

Thus, in Gallagher v. Newman, 190 N. Y. 444, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 146, 83 N. E. 480, it was held that whether or not the act of a superintendent in starting the machinery while some employees were attempting to put a belt back onto a pulley was an act of superintendence was a question of fact for the jury.

And in Belding v. Lesure, 201 Mass. 486, 87 N. E. 904, it was held that it was a question for the jury to decide whether or not there was negligence on the part of the defendant's superintendent in negligently causing a machine to start when the plaintiff was engaged in pointing out defects therein.

Under the employers' liability acts, as at common law, the master is not liable for the act of a mere fellow servant in starting machinery, where such act is done merely to forward the work.

Thus, in Abrahamson v. General Supply & Constr. Co. 112 App. Div. 318, 98 N. Y. Supp. 596, the negligent servant was the leader of a gang of structural iron workers results merely from the failure of such superior to give warning to the inferior of his contemplated act which is a part of the ordinary operation of the work, the negligence in failing to give such a warning is that of a fellow servant, and not that of the master. No appliance can be provided which may not, under some circumstances, if used by one employee without warning or precaution, involve injury to a coemployee; and there was in this case no suggestion of any negligence in the method of doing the work which the master had authorized.

There was no error in sustaining the motion for a directed verdict, and the judgment therein is affirmed.

and received somewhat higher wages than the other members of the gang, but it was held that his act in giving a negligent signal for the starting of the engine was not an act of superintendence rendering the master liable for the resulting injuries, where the extent of his authority was merely to push the work along and to keep the men in his gang intelligently employed.

And, in Falk v. Havemeyer, 123 App. Div. 657, 108 N. Y. Supp. 140, it was held that where two employees were set at work to clean the sheaves of an elevator they were fellow servants, although one of them was only a helper and the other was to stand guard and give directions for the moving of the elevator. The court said: "The superintendence intended by the statute involves more than the mere authority to give direction to a helper in respect of some limited detail of the work."

So, the mere act of giving a signal to move an elevator does not constitute an act of superintendence if given by an employee, when every employee is at liberty to give it, and hence it does not come within the assigned duty of a superintendent. McDonnell v. Andrew J. Robinson Co. 136 App. Div. 598, 121 N. Y. Supp. 47.

The foreman of a gang of laborers engaged in removing materials from an elevator, who is charged with the duty of giving signals for the moving of the elevator, is not a superintendent. Croghan v. Hedden Constr. Co. 147 App. Div. 631, 132 N. Y. Supp. 548.

The act of a car shifter in starting a turntable is not an act of superintendence under the employers' liability act. Whelton v. West End Street R. Co. 172 Mass. 555, 52 N. E. 1072, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 615.

Negligence in the exercise of superintendence intrusted to an employee within the meaning of the Alabama employers' liability act does not exist in the case of an engineer whose duty it is personally to operate the engine, although he usually has a helper, where, in the absence of the helper, by the negligence of the engineer in starting the engine or in failing to prevent a third person from starting it, a person engaged in repairing the engine is killed, since the primary duty of the engineer is not that of superintendent, but that of a laborer. Dantzler v. DeBardeleben Coal & I. Co. 101 Ala. 309, 22 L.R.A. 361, 14 So. 10.

So, in Freeman v. Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. 137 Ala. 481, 34 So. 612, it was held 48 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that a stationary engineer who operated the engine which worked a steam shovel was not, in starting the engine, a superintendent within the meaning of the Alabama statute.

And in McKenna v. Gould Wire Cord Co. 197 Mass. 406, 83 N. E. 1113, it was held that the starting of machinery might have been an act of superintendence, but that the master could not be held liable therefor, because a reasonably prudent man could not have anticipated that the injured employee would have been in the place of danger where he was injured.

The master cannot be held liable for the unauthorized act of an employee in starting machinery.

Thus, in Quinlan v. Lackawanna Steel Co. 191 N. Y. 329, 84 N. E. 73, it was held that under the New York employers' liability act, an act of a foreman in starting machinery which he was unauthorized to do was not an act of superintendence for which the master was liable.

And the master is not liable for the negligent act of an employee in starting machinery, when such employee had no duty to perform in connection therewith and his act was merely a meddlesome act. Ramsey v. Arbuckle, 147 App. Div. 685, 132 N. Y. Supp. 579.

In Joseph v. George C. Whitney Co. 177 Mass. 176, 58 N. E. 639, it was held that the act of a superintendent in accidentally moving a shipper whereby a belt was shifted from the loose pulley to the tight pulley, was not an act of superintendence under the employers' liability act.

An offer to show that the turning on or shutting off of the power in a factory was an act of superintendence, was rejected in Gilmore v. Mittineague Paper Co. 169 Mass. 471, 48 N. E. 623, but chiefly upon the ground that the witness from whom this evidence was to be drawn was not qualified.

The engineer in charge of the engine which operates a pile driver, the connection between the engine and the hammer being made only by a rope, is employed on "another" machine than the employee engaged in ringing a pile in front of the pile driver, within the meaning of the California statute (Cal. Civ. Code, § 1970), so that the master is liable for the negligence of the engineer in letting the hammer fall without notice whereby the other employee is injured. Korander v. Penn Bridge Co. 16 Cal. App. 249, 116 Pac. 384.

CUDAHY PACKING COMPANY, Appt.

(83 Kan. 588, 112 Pac. 165.)

Master — safety of elevator pit — duty as to.

A laborer who as a part of his regular duties was ordered to keep the elevator pit in a packing house clean of refuse, was directed to notify the elevator operator whenever he entered the pit to do this work, and was told that the operator would warn him of the descent of the elevator. This was regularly done for some time, after which, when the laborer again entered the pit and notified the operator accordingly, the latter neglected to give the warning, in consequence of which neglect the elevator descended upon the laborer and injured him. It is held: (1) That the ordinary rule relieving the master from liability to a servant for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant does not apply; (2) the master was not relieved from the consequences of neglect to make the place of service reasonably safe by delegating the duty of giving the necessary warning to the operator, who failed to give it.

Rep. 554; Germanus v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 74 N. J. L. 662, 67 Atl. 79.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff, Iliff, was employed as a janitor in the packing house of the defendant company. His duties were to keep the floors clean and to clear out the refuse from the elevator pit. He was directed to notify the elevator operator whenever he entered the pit for the purpose of cleaning it, and was told that the operator would warn him when the elevator was about to come down. The plaintiff performed this duty for two months or more before he was injured, giving the notice and receiving the warning as indicated. At the time of the injury he had entered the elevator pit, after giving notice to the operator as usual, and was using a scraper and shovel in cleaning out the refuse and filth therein, when, without warning, the elevator descended upon him while thus at work, inflicting the injuries of which he complains. The operator had received the notice, but neglected to give the warning. It was claimed by the defendant that the plaintiff was ordered to clean out the pit only when the elevator was locked at noon, or after the close of the regular work of the day, but the general verdict for the plaintiff determines the issues in his favor, and, evidence having been given to prove the facts as above stated, they must be taken as true.

Errors are assigned upon the order overruling the demurrer to the evidence and in the instructions given. In support of the demurrer it is contended that the plaintiff and the operator of the elevator were fellow servants, and, as the injury was caused solely by the negligence of the operator, the plaintiff cannot recover under the rule relating to fellow servants. On the other hand, the plaintiff insists that, where the negligent act of one fellow servant which injures another violates a nondelegable duty which the master owes to the injured servant, the rule that a master is not liable to one servant for the negligence of a fellow servant has no application.

In Kelley v. Ryus, 48 Kan. 120, 29 Pac. 144, it was said: "It is the duty of an employer in all cases to furnish his employees with a reasonably safe place at which to work, and with reasonably safe instruments or tools with which to work; and if he delegates these duties to another, such other becomes a vice principal, for whose acts the principal is responsible."

It was said in Crist v. Wichita Gas, E. L. & P. Co. 72 Kan. 135, 83 Pac. 199, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 238: "If the master sends a servant to work in a place of danger, however temporary, and the danger arises from acts or omissions of other servants against which the servant has no means of protecting himself, it is the duty of the master to provide such warnings or to take such other steps as may be reasonably necessary to safeguard the servant so employed; and if another servant of higher or lower degree is delegated by the master to attend to such safeguarding he is performing the functions of the master, and if guilty of negligence the master is responsible." p. 139.

The defendant concedes the rule, but urges that, while ordinarily a master cannot delegate the performance of the personal duties which he owes to his employees so as to relieve himself from liability, yet this rule is subject to the exception that where the duty relates to a mere detail of the work it may be delegated to a fellow servant and the master be relieved from the negligence of the latter. It is urged that this claim is supported by the opinion in Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Co. v. Shanks, 69 Kan. 308, 76 Pac. 856. But in that case it was held that shovelers in a mine were not required to watch for shale thrown down by the drillers, of which warning was required, but was negligently omitted. It was said that "the shovelers were hired to work; not to dodge the drillers." p. 310. It was also said: "But whenever a negligent act violates any duty which the master himself owes to the servant, as, for example, the duty to make the service and the place in which it is performed reasonably safe, that fact controls, irrespective of the rank or grade of service between employees, and notwithstanding the circumstance that they are engaged in a common employment directed to a common end; and if, in the discharge of the master's duty, a warning be necessary, it is not enough for him to say that he has provided a competent person to give it; the warning must be given." p. 310.

In Brice-Nash v. Barton Salt Co. 79 Kan. 110, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 749, 131 Am. St. Rep. 284, 98 Pac. 768, where the method of carrying on the work involved the occasional dis-lodgement of masses of salt with such force as to expose employees to danger, and it became necessary to give warning of such dislodgement, it was held that the giving of such warning was a nondelegable duty of the master, and that its omission imposed liability for consequent injuries regardless of the question of coservice.

It is argued that the danger to which the plaintiff was exposed was not permanent, or constantly recurring, and that for this reason the rule requiring the company to make the place reasonably safe for the service does not apply. It will be observed from the quotation given that this view was not approved in this court in the Crist Case. It was also said in that case, in immediate connection with the language quoted, that the rule "has no iron-bound limitations as to whether the place be a permanent or a temporary one." 72 Kan. 135, 139. Authorities on this and other closely related subjects are collated in a note in 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 624-651. The assurance given to the plaintiff that he would be warned when the elevator was about to descend implied that he was expected to continue at his work until the warning was given. It was therefore not only his right, but his duty, to give attention to that work. While doing this he was injured without his fault through the failure of the company to give the warning it had undertaken to give. These facts afforded a cause of action.

It is also contended that the plaintiff should be held guilty of contributory negligence, because his work in the elevator pit was so intrinsically and plainly dangerous that he ought not to have undertaken it at all while the elevator was in use. The service however must be regarded in the light of the provisions for safety promised by the company; that is, upon the supposition that the warning would be given. When so considered, it cannot be said as a matter of law that the work was so glaringly dangerous that none but a reckless person would have undertaken it. The question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

The instructions complained of are in harmony with the interpretation of law as given in this opinion, and are not deemed erroneous.

Finally, it is urged that the verdict, which was for $2,000, is so excessive as to show passion and prejudice on the part of the jury. After reading the evidence, it is found sufficient to warrant the award.

The judgment is affirmed.

— act of master.

1. When the place assigned by the employer to his employee to work is safe for him, while certain machinery, with which he is obliged to come in contact and over which he has no control, is at rest, but is liable to become a place of great peril to him the instant such machinery is started in motion, and a previous method of warning him of such starting had been uniformly pursued by the employer through the act of another employee, who was in control of the machinery and had undertaken the duty of giving such warning, the neglect of the latter to give the warning is legally imputable to the employer.

Same — fellow servants.

Vredenburg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ondis, the plaintiff's intestate, was at work for the defendant in an uncovered pit or trench, about 5 feet deep from the surface of the ground, under the sidewalk curb adjacent to its warehouse premises, in Jersey City, and was killed by the sudden revolution of a powerful screw under his feet, which, in revolving, caught his legs and clothing, and almost instantly tore off his feet.

The deceased was engaged, in obedience to the orders of Mr. Parker, the superintendent of construction and machinery of the company, in bailing water from the bottom of the pit in which he stood, by reaching down and filling pails with water, which he then handed up to Mr. Parker, who was within his reach upon the adjoining bank. In order to retain his footing so as to accomplish this work, he stood within the pit, either upon, or very close to, the screw, which was then stationary, and partly inclosed in a U-shaped iron trough underneath the screw, and in which, when in motion, the screw turned.

The screw was revolved by electrical motors, operated and controlled from a switchboard by the engineer in his engine room, at a distance (not stated in the evidence) away from the pit, but completely out of the sight of any person, whether standing in the pit or on the bank adjoining it. Neither the engineer while in his engine room, nor the employee while in or at the pit, could see each other, nor was there any mechanical or other means of signaling between them.

The place in the pit where Ondis stood while bailing the water was entirely safe, so long as the electrical power was off, and the machinery and screw consequently were at rest; but the instant the power was turned on and the screw revolved, his position became one of immediate peril to his life. It is clear from the engineer's testimony that he was fully aware this machinery could not be started without extreme danger of fatal consequences to the man in the pit. This knowledge that officer expressly admitted. By these admissions it appears that Ondis had, on occasions previous to the accident, worked in the pit.

The engineer testified that on these occasions he would always find out where Ondis was, before he would start the machine; that, if Ondis was bailing water, when he got through with his job he (Ondis) would either come from the pit and tell him (the engineer) that the water was all out, or, if not, that he himself would go out and see Ondis, and see that everything was all right, and then come in and start it; "that he would go out there every time and look if the work was done, because he knew what it was, and knew the piece of machinery it was, and didn't want to see any man there; . . . and that he never turned on the power until he had ascertained in that way that everything was right."

It is thus evident that on all previous occasions when Ondis had occupied the pit, except the fatal one, the engineer's universal practice before starting the machinery had been to find out, either from his own view, or by the presence and statements of Ondis to him, that the latter had left the pit, and this course of practice Ondis must be presumed to have relied upon for his safety. But on the occasion of the accident the engineer, instead of first obtaining personal knowledge of the situation of Ondis, obeyed the order sent to him by Superintendent Parker to start the machinery.

The jury were warranted in finding from the testimony of three eyewitnesses of the occurrence, who were in close proximity to the pit, that Ondis was still standing in the pit, either upon, or in very close contact with, the screw, when it revolved after the machinery had been started. Not only so, but the very nature of the injuries inflicted upon the body of Ondis demonstrated this fact. The person who rescued him from the machinery after the accident said that he was obliged to cut intestate's flesh and clothing in disentangling him from the blades of the screw. These eyewitnesses also testified that no notice or warning of the starting of the machine was given by anyone in their hearing to Ondis before the accident.

It is true that Superintendent Parker, in his testimony, says that before he sent the order to the engineer to turn on the power (which he admits he gave) he had "told Ondis to get out of the pit;" . . . that he "had given him a hand to pull him upon the bank, and saw him upon the bank;" but the jury were plainly justified in coming to a contrary conclusion.

It is but just to the superintendent, in view of his testimony, to add that when he sent the order to the engineer to start the machinery he probably supposed that Ondis had gotten fully out of the pit upon the 46 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bank. Nevertheless, the jury were justified in finding under the evidence that the former was guilty of negligence in ordering the power to be turned on too soon. And the question to be now determined is whether his negligence is legally imputable to his employer.

We think this negligent act of the superintendent, who assumed to act in the place of the engineer, is chargeable in law to the company. As has been fully shown above, the engineer had, in practice, on all previous occasions when Ondis had been at work in the pit, kept in personal touch with him, and had, with the knowledge of Ondis, adopted and acted upon this method or system, under which Ondis' safety was assured. This was the company's method of protecting its employees, and it follows that the failure of Parker (who assumed to act, and acted in this instance, in the place of the engineer), to give Ondis warning that he was about to order the machinery to be started, was the failure of the company, and the former's negligence that of the company.

The case is thus brought within the principles settled by a long line of adjudications of our courts, one of the earliest and most notable of which is that of Belleville Stone Co. v. Mooney, 61 N. J. L. 253, 39 L.R.A. 834, 39 Atl. 764, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 195, 19 Mor. Min. Rep. 264, followed by Germanus v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 74 N. J. L. 662, 87 Atl. 79, and a reference to the Digest Annotations will show how undeviatingly it has since been approved and followed by our courts.

The plaintiff in that case was injured by a piece of rock thrown out from a blast, because the foreman had, through negligence, failed to give timely warning, according to a system or method previously pursued; and it was held that the giving of warning was embraced in the duty owed by the employer to his employees that the place where he sets them to work shall be kept safe; that the failure of the foreman to perform this duty carefully was imputable to the defendant as employer; and that such failure was not one of the obvious dangers of which the plaintiff, as employee, assumed the risk.

The place where the intestate was put to work by the defendant was liable to become one of exceptional peril to the former, and he had the clear right, under the settled rules of a long line of authority, to assume that his employer would take reasonable care to warn him before the danger became imminent and actual, and to proceed with his work in reliance upon this assumption; and, since his employer had assigned to other servants the duty of giving such warning to him (the intestate), he had the right to depend upon its due and careful performance by them. D'Agostino v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 72 N. J. L. 358, 60 Atl. 1113, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 554; Burns v. Delaware & A. Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 70 N. J. L. 745, 67 L.R.A. 956, 59 Atl. 220, 592, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 673; Albanese v. Central R. Co. 70 N. J. L. 241, 57 Atl. 447, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 135; and Pakusewski v. Ringwood Co. 81 N. J. L. 552, 79 Atl. 319.

These other servants were not fellow servants engaged in a common employment with him (the intestate), but are to be regarded as acting in this respect as the representatives of the master, and the only question is whether they in fact exercised due care. See page 754 of Burns v. Delaware & A. Teleg. & Teleph. Co. supra; Laragay v. East Jersey Pipe Co. 77 N. J. L. 516, 72 Atl. 57; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Hardy, 59 N. J. L. 40, 34 Atl. 986; Polo v. Palisade Constr. Co. 75 N. J. L. 873, 70 Atl. 161.

The counsel of the plaintiff in error ably argue in their brief that the engineer's testimony brings the case at bar within the principle of the case decided by this court, of Koneski v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 77 N. J. L. 645, 648, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 644, 74 Atl. 516.

In this case, as it was made by the plaintiff's evidence, it appeared that while he was at work for defendant at night, close to its tracks, shoveling ashes at an ashpit, one of the company's engines, running upon its tracks, struck and injured him; no warning having been given by bell rung, or whistle blown, upon the engine striking him. This court held, in reversing the plaintiff's judgment below, that the railroad's engineer, who had failed to give such warning, was to be regarded as a fellow servant of the plaintiff, for the reason that the duty of giving the warning, under the facts there presented, was merely incidental to his general employment, and his failure to perform that duty was not imputable to the common employer.

But it will be observed by an examination of the reasoning at page 648, of the opinion, delivered by the chief justice, that after a careful analysis of many prior adjudications upon the subject he distinguishes that case from one like the case before us, and I think it important to quote his language, viz.: "In our opinion, the present case comes within the principle of the Miller Case, 69 N. J. L. 413, 55 Atl. 245, rather than within the Belleville Stone Co. and Germanus Cases. If an employee of the defendant had been delegated by it to attend at the ashpit and warn those at work there of the approach of engines, and his failure to give warning had been the producing cause of the accident to the plaintiff, the case would then, in its legal aspect, have been parallel with those last mentioned." He adds: "But the duty of blowing a whistle, or ringing a bell, which rests upon the engineer or hostler in charge of an engine, is an incident in the operation of the engine, and failure to perform that duty, therefore, does not impose responsibility upon the master for injuries received by another employee in the common work."

This distinction, so pointedly drawn in the Koneski Case, is manifestly applicable to the present. The jury were warranted in concluding from the evidence relating to the practice of warning previously pursued and recognized by the defendant, that the engineer in charge of the motors had been delegated by it to personally ascertain whether or not Ondis was at work in the pit, and if in the pit to warn him, before he turned on the electric power. Under such method the intestate was justified in acting upon the belief that the company regarded it as a duty to adhere to that system of warning him to get out of the pit, before the engineer started the machinery. This duty, Superintendent Parker, acting for the company in the stead of the engineer, failed to perform. Neither the engineer nor Parker were engaged, therefore, in a common employment with the intestate, but must be regarded as acting, under the circumstances, as the representatives of the company.

The judgment below, which was for the plaintiff, should be affirmed.

Thorne v. Mosher, 20 N. J. Eq. 257.

Gummere, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the second district court of the city of Newark to recover the proceeds of a life insurance policy issued by the National Benefit Association upon the life of one Dora Cooper, and payable to Tera Thomas, the plaintiff. The trial of the cause resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff, and on appeal to the supreme court that judgment was affirmed. The propriety of the affirmance is now challenged by the defendant.

The principal contention made by the plaintiff in error, both in the supreme court and here, was that the policy sued upon is void, for the reason that the beneficiary, Mrs. Thomas, had no insurable interest in the life of the deceased; the policy requiring that "the beneficiary must have something more than a pecuniary interest in the insured, as speculative policies are not issued by this association." The uncontroverted proofs submitted at the trial showed that, when the decedent was about seventeen years of age, Mrs. Thomas, who was not related to her in any way, took her from an orphanage asylum, gave her a home, and took care of and supported her until she insurable interest in the life of a foster child. But there are a number of cases maintaining the insurable interest of a foster child in the life of the foster parent.

Thus, a young woman has an insurable interest in an elderly man sufficient to sustain a policy on his life taken out by him and assigned to her, where he assumed parental relations, although without legal adoption, to the extent of educating her, and gave her other assistance, and, from his conduct and promises, she had a right to believe that the quasi parental relation would continue so long as he lived. Carpenter v. United States L. Ins. Co. 161 Pa. 9, 23 L.R.A. 571, 41 Am. St. Rep. 880, 28 Atl. 943.

And in McGraw v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 488, it was said that, on authority of the Carpenter Case, supra, a jury would be justified in determining that a child had an insurable interest in one who had assumed parental relations to her, where it appeared that her father died when she was two and one-half years old, that her mother married again, and that insured, who was her uncle, had raised her and been a father to her all her life; that she had lived with her uncle until her marriage, and since her marriage next door to him, where he resided with his sisters, and that she always helped support them.

And in Berdan v. Milwaukee Mut. L. Ins. Co. 136 Mich. 396, 99 N. W. 411, 4 Ann. Cas. 332, a child was held to have an insurable interest in one who had assumed the relation of parent to him, where the facts were that the child was born out of wedlock, and at the time of his birth was accepted by a husband and wife as a member of their family, through an arrangement made with the infant's mother at the instance of insured, a sister of the wife, who was also a member of the household, and who, on the death of the wife, assumed charge of the household, and from her earnings took care of and supported the child.

The question whether a foster child or a foster parent is within the class of beneficiaries described by by-laws or rules of mutual insurance companies is not within the scope of the present note.

As to who is a member of the "family" within the contract of benefit societies, see note to Supreme Lodge, O. M. P. v. Nevins, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 334.

As to who is a "dependent" within statutes or rules defining beneficiary of mutual benefit societies, see notes to Caldwell v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 653; Royal League v. Shields, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 208; and Goff v. Supreme Lodge, R. A. 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1191.

was able to maintain herself, and that upon her death Mrs. Thomas took charge of the funeral and paid the expenses thereof out of her own pocket. It further appeared that, notwithstanding that Mrs. Thomas had never formally been appointed guardian of Miss Cooper, the latter looked upon her as such, even after she attained her majority. We think that these facts disclose an insurable interest under the terms of the policy. They show that the relation of the parties had been of such a character that each had reason to rely upon the other in time of need, and especially that Mrs. Thomas had a right to expect help and care during her declining years from Miss Cooper, if the latter was then in a position to render it. Although, as was said by Field, J., in Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. ed. 924, it is not easy to define with precision what will constitute such an interest, it may be stated generally to exist whenever the relations between the insured and the beneficiary are such as to justify a reasonable expectation that the continuance of the life of the former will result in advantage or benefit to the latter. It is not necessary, in order to create such an interest, that the insured shall be under any legal obligation, either financial or otherwise, to the beneficiary. It is not even necessary that kinship shall exist between the parties. If the insured is under a moral obligation to render care and assistance to the beneficiary in the time of the latter's need, then the latter has an insurable interest, other than a mere pecuniary one, in the life of the former. Opitz v. Karel, 118 Wis. 527, 62 L.R.A. 982, 99 Am. St. Rep. 1004, 95 N. W. 948; Chisholm v. National Capital L. Ins. Co. 52 Mo. 213, 14 Am. Rep. 414; Cronin v. Vermont L. Ins. Co. 20 R. I. 570, 40 Atl. 497.

The only other ground upon which a reversal of the judgment of the district court was sought in the supreme court was that the policy had lapsed during the life of the insured by reason of her failure to pay various premiums at the times when they respectively fell due, or within four weeks thereafter. The policy containing a provision that such failure should work a forfeiture of all claims under it. The failure to pay these premiums within the time required by the policy was not disputed at the trial; but the trial court found from the evidence submitted that there had been a waiver by the defendant company of its right to enforce the forfeiture, and that, consequently, the delay in the payment of the premiums constituted no bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery. The supreme court, considering that the question whether there had been such a waiver or not was one of fact, to be determined by the trial court, refused to review its determination thereof, there being, as it found, some evidence in the case to support it. It is now argued before us that there was error in this conclusion of the supreme court, the assertion being that an examination of the case will show no proofs upon which an inference of waiver can be supported. It is enough to say, in disposing of this contention, that we find counsel's assertion to be contrary to the fact.

The judgment under review will be affirmed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF TENNESSEE, Appt.,

v.

W. J. MASSEE, Resp't.

EX PARTE W. J. MASSEE.

(— S. C. —, 79 S. E. 97.)

Bail — fugitive from justice — habeas corpus proceeding.

1. One demanded by one state from another as a fugitive from justice, under the Federal statute, should not be admitted to bail in a habeas corpus proceeding to test the validity of the requisition, unless some departure from the requirements of the statute has been made to appear.

Same — showing of hardship.

2. One arrested as a fugitive from justice under interstate rendition proceedings cannot secure his release on bail by showing that, while he had violated the criminal laws of the demanding state, he had been guilty of no moral wrong; that the prosecution was a hardship on him, instituted to collect a debt, and that the governor of another state had refused to issue a requisition.

Evidence — to impeach governor's signature.

3. A requisition for a fugitive from justice under the official signature of the governor, and under the great seal of the state, cannot be impeached by affidavits of strangers that the governor stated that he did not sign the requisition.

Note. — No other case has been found as to the effect of failure of a prisoner who has been released on bail to appear at a hearing on habeas corpus.

As to the appearance by counsel on a charge of misdemeanor as satisfaction of the condition of a bail bond or recognizance, see State v. Johnson, 82 Kan. 450, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 943, 108 Pac. 793, and the note thereto.

Same — withdrawal of requisition — telegram.

4. The court may, in a habeas corpus proceeding to release one arrested as a fugitive from justice, consider telegrams from the governor of the demanding state and of the state upon which the demand was made, to the effect that the requisition had been withdrawn.

Interstate rendition — release of prisoner — absence from court.

5. One who, having been released on bail under a writ of habeas corpus from custody to which he had been committed in interstate rendition proceedings, as a fugitive from justice, cannot be discharged from custody and have his bond canceled during his absence from court.

(May 24, 1913.)

APPEAL by the State of Tennessee from an order of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Spartanburg County discharging accused under a writ of habeas corpus from custody to which he had been committed in an extradition proceeding to secure his return to the state of Tennessee, in which he was alleged to have committed a crime. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Horace Frierson, Jr., Attorney General, Nicholls & Nicholls, and Harry S. Stokes, for appellant:

Petitioner is charged with violation of the statute against extortion.

The petition must state facts, as distinguished from conclusions of law, so that the court may exercise an intelligent discretion in passing upon the application.
